THE NATIONAL CRISIS.

After a dreary period of seven years, unmarked by any large and decidedly good measure of reform voluntarily brought forward by the government, we have once again the satisfaction of hailing the dawn of a new era of improvement, the beginning of another struggle, involving consequences as important to the country as the imperfect though great measure of 1830. The present is not to be considered as merely a ministerial crisis, as the customary changing from tory to whig, or from whig back to tory—though the existence of the whig government may be involved in it—but as a national epoch; as the first authoritative acknowledgment, by the sovereign and her ministers, of the great principle that there is no longer to be protection of any one class at the price of injustice to all the other classes. This, at least, is the light in which we would fain view the measures proposed by the ministers;—narrow, and perhaps imperfect, in their actual being, but pointing to mighty results.

It is peculiarly satisfactory to radical reformers to be able to say, once in seven years, that their old friends and allies, the whigs, have really done something to redeem their character,—that they have "deserved well of their country." They have shown, at the eleventh hour, that which, though a tardy, looks like a genuine conversion, since it is displayed in amendment of conduct. The precise date of any political conversion is generally of trivial importance in itself, and the motives of public men placed in embarrassing circumstances will hardly ever bear to be too nicely scrutinised. Let their deeds speak for them. The ministers have not advanced far; that was perhaps impracticable, if they wished to carry any imposing force along with them; but they have moved in the right direction, under the now fairly unfurled banner of Free Trade, and in the strength of a good cause. They have offered the country a fair opportunity of getting rid of some of the most galling and pernicious imposts that ever indirectly crippled the energies, and directly robbed a people. They have made a formal assault upon the most oppressive and severely felt of those monopolies which plunder the wealthy and starve the poor—namely, the Bread-tax and the Sugar-tax. The first duty of the people is energetically to seize and and improve the occasion offered—to be up and to be doing!

If we were to measure the amount of what the government has proposed, by the fury and panic of the landowners, the East and West Indians, and other monopolists—so sensitive at all times to the approach of any thing threatening to touch their sacred privilege of pillaging the people for their own benefit, under the name of protective duties—the ministerial project were vast indeed. In reality, save as the hopeful commencement of financial reform, and as a distinct avowal that the present tariff system is vicious and rotten to the core, and fraught with ultimate ruin to every class, there has been nothing to excite the ferment we witness, unless conscience makes cowards of the guilty.

What awful thing was it that produced the commotion? The chancellor of the exchequer required money. The consequences of the monopoly of the sugar trade, and the heavy duties laid upon that necessary of life, together with the general distress and impoverishment of the people, had depressed the revenue. Those expensive warlike expeditions, and naval equipments, which the tories had either urged or sanctioned, had, at the same time caused an increase of expenditure which not only drained the public coffers, but left a considerable deficiency; and it was seen that, in the present state of manufactures and commerce, indirect taxation could be strained no farther. Of that important fact every man conversant with the subject is now convinced. There was, therefore, no resource left, but either some such scheme as that propounded by Mr. Baring, or a direct tax on property,* which would have excited a ferment among the monopolists, not much less than the announcement of the change of the sugar-duties and the revision of the corn-laws has done. So far as Mr. Baring's scheme went, and susceptible as some of its details might have been of improvement —particularly, as we think, in the proposed scanty abatement of the timber-duties—it was founded on larger and more statesman-like views than those that have been familiar to men in office in this protective country. Its tendency was to enlarge the basis of taxation, and to make the increase of the revenue of the government depend upon the increase of the consumption of sugar and timber, and, consequently, of comfort among the people. Although this unfortunate budget has been thrown overboard by the strangest combination of parties ever seen in parliament of planters and anti-slavery advocates, renegade whigs and high tories—the principle which it embodied has not perished with it. That must still be acted upon; and, probably, the more speedily for this very defeat. The cause of FREE TRADE, which is identical with that of national prosperity, not to this or that class, but to the whole people,—which to the labourer means full employment and competent wages, ample food, shelter, and clothing, and to the manufacturer the readiest and cheapest place for the purchase of his raw untaxed material, and for the disposal of his commodities the markets of the whole world, wherever winds blow and waters roll —that cause made a huge stride during the eight nights when the nation beheld monopolists and anti-monopolists in pitched battle on the sugar-duties. Men's minds had been gradually ripening by knowledge and by suffering, for the reception of the new ideas which that debate evolved; and many minds were already matured. Howsoever tardy, and, for themselves, critically timed, the demonstration of the whig ministers has been, there is, in our opinion, little doubt that those of them most worth reckoning upon as statesmen, have long been in their secret convictions FREE TRADERS. Those of them who thought at all on the subject, which latterly financial difficulties must have kept continually before them, could not miss to see the manifold evils of the twice-curst principle of the monopoly and protective system. We have no doubt whatever that Sir Robert Peel is as much aware of the bad policy, and of the real, if not immediate evil consequences of persevering in the present system of restriction and protection and unequal pressure, as Mr. Hume or Mr. Villiers. It would be disparagement to his understanding to think otherwise. When reluctantly put to the question the other evening, by the adroit tactics of his rivals, he distinctly avowed as much, when, amidst many evasions and sophisms, he stated that to the landed interest prosperous manufactures were of more value than any corn-laws—even than his favourite sliding-scale. He tacitly confessed his convictions on the question of free trade, when he would have avoided the deputation of the merchants and manufacturers of Manchester, who care not a whit whether the object they have at heart is accomplished by whig or by tory, provided they obtain it. ——Lord Palmerston was the colleague, and, in one sense, the pupil of Mr. Huskisson. He must have been an interested witness of the successful experiment of annihilating the East India Company's monopoly; of the fortunate consequences of lowering the duties on coffee and other articles, thereby immensely increasing their consumption, to the vast improvement of the revenue, and the spread of comfort and harmless luxury among the labouring classes. He was a party to the "glorious nibble," made on the restrictive system, by throwing open the silk manufacture to foreign competition: a small measure comparatively in itself, but great as an experiment, and a triumphant one; and all that could be attempted in that day of small things. To have attacked the West Indians—the slave-owners—the East Indians—or the corn-lords themselves, durst not then have been hazarded; though even so far back as that period, Lord Palmerston must in opinion have been opposed to the system. But opinion unfortunately does not always influence conduct. Lord Melbourne himself, whose recklessness of speech involves him in so many scrapes and apparent inconsistencies, though he uttered the hasty words with which he has been so often taunted, first by the anti-corn-law party, and latterly by the ungrateful tories, whom he and his colleagues have done so much to conciliate—afterwards, or previously, we forget which, modified his rash expressions about the madness of meddling with the corn-laws, by the distinct avowal, that if the nation insisted upon that measure, if they demanded it from the government, agitated for it, pressed for it, no doubt they must some time or other get it—though he had made up his mind not to yield—save on compulsion. Now, that a measure, or a half measure, of this sort, is voluntarily brought forward by ministers, it is to us doubtful whether or not the anti-corn-law party—that is the whole people—ought not secretly to wish that the landed interest and their allies may defeat Lord John Russel's scheme of a really high protective duty, as they have done Mr. Baring's budget. Their true wisdom would be quiet acquiescence in the diminished but still lavish protection, at the people's expense, which a fixed duty of 8s. a quarter, increased by other expenses of carriage, freight, and insurance, to the average amount of 18s. a quarter, would give them against all other corn-growers in the world. A blinded, obstinate, resistance might, in this case, be followed by the same fortunate consequences for the country, which the opposition of the borough-mongers proved in an analogous instance. Instead of a paltry measure of parliamentary reform, — an East Retford disfranchised, and Manchester invested with the franchise, that insensate opposition strongly helped the country to the reform bill. Let the landowners oppose the "fixed injustice" of a really high fixed duty, and the people will thereby be animated in their struggle for untaxed food—for total and immediate repeal. We rejoice to see that, while any instalment of justice is welcomed, the great principle of total repeal is not in one iota abandoned. There is, at the numerous meetings lately held, no whisper of compromise; the demand is total and immediate repeal of an impost which ensures a man possessed of acres a pension from the consumers of this country, as surely as if it were regularly paid to him out of the public treasury. The French, the people of the United States, nay, the whole civilised world, begin to perceive the monstrous injustice of our prohibitory and protective system, and the consequent sufferings of the productive classes, under its united wisdom and mercy; and there is justice as well as humour in the retaliatory associations which are said to be forming among the planters of the southern states of America, for effecting the emancipation of the white slaves of the British factories from the thraldom of the trencher-taxing lords and squires. We hope to hear more and more of food-tax abolitionists in America. But the complicated mischiefs and iniquity of the corn and provision laws are now tolerably well understood both at home and abroad. Streams of light have of late been let in on this irritating subject, which have penetrated and illuminated even a few tory landlords' craniums; and the colonial monopolies, and especially that of sugar, though also tolerably well sifted within these few weeks, still require investigation. Above all, the artful and hypocritical howl of "slavery"! "slave-grown produce"! raised to mislead weak minds, ought to be thoroughly exposed, though the base manœuvre has, we imagine, had but partial success. With the exception of one or two well-meaning individuals—the tried and sincere opponents of slavery, who have unadvisedly and inconsistently allied themselves with those men who struggled to the last extremity to retain their fellow-creatures in slavery, to the Anti-Slavery party thoroughout the country, without abating one jot in their principles, have indignantly refused to be made the convenient tools of the West India planters; who now grasp that monopoly which deeply injures the manufactures of Britain, and deprives the poorer classes of a necessary of life, quite as tenaciously as they did the cart-whip, until it was wrested from their hands. Not contented with a protective bounty of 12s. 7d. per cwt., which Mr. Baring's scale would have given on their sugar, they will hear of nothing less than the existing duty; which, with the scanty supply they have produced of late, and the exclusion of all foreign sugar, save at the almost prohibitory duty of 63s. per cwt., decrees that the labouring class shall have no sugar, or but the scantiest allowance.

* As a beginning, extending the probate duty to real property has been talked of. With certain modifications, and a graduated scale, no more equal measure of taxation could be devised.

Chain them, and task them,

Last year, and the year before, this impost, and the exclusion of Brazil sugar, from the ransom duty upon it, rendered sugar an article which the labouring classes, ground down by the corn and provision taxes, were compelled to forego. Hence a greatly diminished consumption of sugar in the country, and a corresponding falling off in the revenue. That our depressed manufacturers might find a little vent for their overflowing stocks, and some employment for their rusting machinery; that the labouring people might obtain sugar, though at a very exorbitant price compared with that at which it may be obtained by the people of other countries; and that the failing finances might be recruited by an attempt at a somewhat better mode of taxation, the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the slight alteration in the tariff which has been quashed by a combination of those monopoly interests, which even singly are still too powerful in Parliament. Now, how stands the case between the people of Great Britain and Ireland and these alarmed and angry planters? It is now seven years since the labour and capital of the nation was taxed to bribe them with twenty millions to do that tardy justice to their black fellow-creatures, for which the people of England had struggled long, and which these slavery-haters(!) had resisted for forty years. The gold was paid down, and the cruel grasp was at last unloosened. But the receivers of the gold were not yet done with us. We must continue to give them an annual bonus, in requital of their generosity in accepting our twenty millions,—which sum was by no means held payment in full. We must give them a monopoly of the sugar-market, and from four to six millions a-year in protective duty, taken directly from the pockets of the consumers of Britain to go into those of the planters, who had so shortly before divided our spoil. They were not, in their altered circumstances, longer able to supply even our diminished consumption; while they clamoured against our manufacturing classes seeking a supply from their customers in Cuba and Brazil, the allies of Britain. When will these reasonable gentlemen—with the price of their slaves in their pockets—allow that they have had enough of protection, enough of the people's money, and be in a condition to permit us to go to cheaper markets, to exchange our manufactures for sugar? It might be fancied, from the outcry made, that they were by the rejected budget, as they ought to be and will be, deprived of every farthing of protective duty. Mr. Baring dealt more liberally with them. He still offered them 12s. 7d. per cwt. beyond the price at which sugar might be obtained from other quarters; that is, nearly 1¼d. a pound. And is it at this they cavil? The original twenty millions of bribe, and the four or five annual millions of pension or bonus, in the shape of protective duty, have rendered them careless. The cultivation of their plantations has fallen off, from this and other causes; and they look to the tax-ground people of England to continue in all time coming—or how long would satisfy them? —to make good their losses, howsoever caused, and insist upon receiving monopoly prices for their diminished quantities of sugar. What Mr. Baring offered them, (12s. 7d. per cwt.,) is estimated to be double the price at which sugar can be and is produced. From an important document on this subject, still privately circulated, we cite the following passage:

When we gave the owners of slaves in our colonies twenty millions of money to reconcile them to the emancipation of their labourers, we deprived them of no more than has been described above—the power of ill-treating those labourers. The labourers remain; and the curse of Adam being upon them, as it is upon all of us, black or white, they must still earn their bread by the sweat of their brow. The only fund from which their subsistence could be drawn formerly, or from which it can be drawn now, is the produce of their labour. If they get a little larger proportion of that produce now than they did when slaves, what then? For what but for their advantage did we give our hard-earned twenty millions of money? If the planters are to have as large a share now as formerly, what claim can they put forward to one penny of the twenty millions? If they are to make the negro work as hard as he did before for the mere necessaries of life, so that their incomes are to be as large as ever, then have they swindled us out of the compensation money. The planters have clearly no shadow of claim to "protection," as arising out of the emancipation act. Upon what other plea, then, can they seek to make us pay a monopoly price for our sugar? Why, forsooth, because they are English planters, and it would be hard if the nation did not prefer their advantage to that of the foreign sugar-grower.

To this we may reply by asking, "where would be the hardship? why should we pay you four or five millions a-year more for your produce than will buy the same quantity from others? It cannot be called a national benefit that you, for your private advantage, shall be allowed to tax all the rest of the nation. Such a proposition would be evidently absurd. Either you are now pocketing, by means of the protecting duty, enormous gains to which you can have no title, or you are carrying on a business which causes an enormous yearly loss to the nation."

But then come the "practical men," as they are pleased to call themselves, but who should rather be called, par excellence, the "theorists;" and they insist that it is wise to pay this exorbitant price to your own people rather than encourage foreigners, because your own people lay out money with you in return. Why, so they do, and so must the foreigner if you buy from him, for he will not give us his sugar. But let us ask, do the West India planters buy from us? Is not the course of their dealings with the mother country rather, that out of every twenty shillings we give them beyond the price we need give to others for the same article, they take some fifteen shillings of that gift in the form of manufactures? In 1840 we paid them in the price of their sugar beyond what we should have paid the foreigner for the same quantity, rather more than five millions of money; and the whole of our fellow-subjects in the West Indies, planters, labourers, merchants, all together, buy from us their yearly supply of manufactures to the value of between three and four millions. Truly this must be a profitable game for Old England!

But the sugar with which we could be cheaply and largely supplied, and which would benefit the revenue to the estimated amount of £700,000, while it extended the comforts and fostered the moral habits of the people,* is produced by the labour of slaves! Although this argument had been found in purer mouths than those of the same men who defended slavery to the last extremity, it would still, in the present circumstances of the country, be objectionable. If Dr. Lushington, and those he represents—if he indeed represent any body save those who have taken up a hollow and hypocritical cry, to serve a purpose—if the excellent Doctor had come forward with a proposition, at once to suspend all commercial intercourse with slave countries—to receive no slave-produced commodities of any description—neither to touch, taste, or handle the accursed thing; this would have been an intelligible principle—a yielding to the force of moral obligation. But do we at present exclude slave-grown sugar? No, indeed; we import and refine it for the whole world, and, among others, for the planters of the West Indies, who find it better economy to send their dear sugar to us, and to supply themselves with the cheap slave-grown sugar, which we refine for them. And the slave-grown sugar becomes innocent to all of us, when it has undergone the purifying process of paying 63s. per cwt. of duty. There is no harm in using it after that. The West India anti-slavery men will permit us that indulgence. Those who in sincerity join in this cry, are of the kind of people who strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel. Suppose a man who has inherited great wealth from his father having grown enormously rich from slave-grown sugar,—suppose him with a pair of gold spectacles on his nose—gold, obtained, like every sovereign in his purse, by slave-labour in its direst form,—in the mines;—suppose him lolling in silken robe and slippers from Turkey, another land of slaves, sipping a basin of slave-grown coffee, or of rice-soup—rice being yet another slave product—or inhaling the bliss of a Havana cigar, or dipping into his golden reservoir for the powder of the "Virginian weed,"—all slave-produced luxuries—and philanthropically declaiming against the deep iniquity of permitting the labourers of England—the exhausted denizens of the workshops and factories—to recruit their strength and refresh their spirits by sweetening their tea-water, or gruel, with sugar one penny or three half-pence a pound cheaper, should we not call him fool or hypocrite? The consumption of sugar has fallen off one-fourth, owing to the high price and the general distress of the country. But we will be bound to say, none of this privation has affected the higher classes, and little of it the middle orders. The poor must bear all at the last. Those who always had little, now have less, or none. There never was grosser hypocrisy or more one-sided drivelling humanity, than in the outcry about admitting slave-grown sugar; and the real friends of the blacks, with few exceptions, must so view it. It is painful to see the venerable name of Clarkson affixed to this delusion—unconsciously on his part as this may have been done. At the head of some scheme for rigidly excluding all slave produce, however Quixotic the idea might have seemed, we could have understood it: not here. This precious humbug—this latest form of cant—has not, in the course of the whole discussions in Parliament, or in the country, been more effectually exposed than by Lord Palmerston,* in that masterly speech, which proves

* The temperance and tee-total associations have an interest in supporting this mitigation of the high sugar-duties; and we are glad to notice some of their champions rebuking the course taken by Dr. Lushington. According to the evidence of the cheap coffee-house keepers in London—establishments which are great supporters of the good habits of the working classes—the high price of sugar, which has necessarily heightened the price of the temperate beverages, has driven many to the beer and gin shops.

* Lord Palmerston's speech, especially where it bears upon the anti-slavery jesuitry, deserves to be put on a more enduring record than the newspapers. It told in the house; it must tell in the country—

"Do we not," he said, "encourage the slaves of North America to produce as much cotton as they can; and do we not send that cotton to South America, in order to induce them, by slave-labour, to produce as much sugar as they can? We say to the Brazils, "We can supply you with a quantity of cotton cheaper and better than you can get it elsewhere; will you buy it?" They say in return, "Certainly we will; and we will pay you in sugar and coffee." We say then, "No; that, whatever his official policy has hitherto been, his private judgment is hostile to monopolies. Sir Robert Peel also has had the becoming self-respect not to lend himself to the egregious cant of the quondam slave-holders.

The protracted debates which have been described as a pitiful party manœuvre—though they seem only a fair use of those Parliamentary tactics over which the Tories chuckle so loudly when they have the luck to jockey or over-trump their antagonists—compelled members either to speak out, or to have judgment recorded against them by the country in spite of their cunning silence. And above all, Sir Robert Peel: His comparative enlightenment on subjects connected with commerce and finance, his practicability, and his position, place him among the ways and means of reformers; who are become indifferent to which party improvement may be owing, so that it be effected. Sir Robert, forced to speak, has committed himself as little as possible; indeed, not at all, against the great principle asserted in the Whig Budget, and taken up by Lord John Russell's corn-law motion. He stands, indeed, by a sliding scale, but not the sliding scale. He commits himself in nothing. Details are reserved. The graduated sliding-scale,—that magic wand which was to effect impossibilities, was, it may be remembered, a hobby of the Duke of Wellington. And the duke, with several other great dukes, has still to be propitiated. Sir Robert—and it is a memorable declaration—tells the land-owners that "a prosperous state of manufactures is a greater support to agriculture than any system of corn-laws,"—nay, than even the sliding-scale. The Peel scale may still slide, but we suspect the range of its graduated operations would be considerably shortened. If prosperous manufactures are of the vast importance to landlords which is here ascribed to them, no one is better able to tell how manufactures are fostered than Sir Robert Peel.

So, whether our next government shall be whig or tory, there is a prospect of gain to the country. The whig measure may have been twice-blessed in opening that way for Sir Robert, which he clearly saw, but durst not have ventured to tread in his own strength. If the people be up and doing—if they be active and true to themselves—they have no cause to dread the accession of the tories, should a combination of circumstances render that inevitable. Six weeks since, it would have been safe to predict that the tories would gain very considerably by a dissolution. Now the event is doubtful: parties are breaking up; there is for the moment a kind of political chaos. But amidst all this confusion, the fate of the bread-tax is sealed,—save for the temporary respite which Lord John Russell's measure might obtain for it:—and it is really immaterial at whose hands it receives the death-stroke; though the field of politics has its laws as well as that of the chase, and those who started the game have a kind of prescriptive right to be in at the death. Difficulties in finance have often been the instruments of reform; and gold will no more ooze from the earth to flow into Sir Robert Peel's exchequer than into that of Lord Melbourne. There must be an improved system, and rigorous retrenchment. There is but one clear path to financial safety,—one means of winning back prosperity to manufactures and support to agriculture. The landlords themselves will perceive this after their eyes get a rubbing at the hustings. Within the present year a considerable change of opinion has taken place among middle-class tories as to the wisdom of the corn-laws; and the effect of the report and evidence of the committee on import duties has also been very great among them.

The impending discussion on Lord John Russell's motion on the corn-laws,—that final whig preparative for a dissolution,—will prove a more severe ordeal than the sugar-duties to many of our worthy representatives; and to many persons who never before joined in the corn-law repeal agitation, this discussion will place the subject in a much more imposing light; favoured as it is by the Queen, and formally brought forward by the cabinet. Here the slavery delusion cannot serve; nor can we think so meanly of the understanding of the most impenetrable dolt among the agricultural labourers, as to imagine he can be longer hoodwinked by the barefaced assertion, that the corn-laws keep up the rate of wages. His knowledge and reading may not be extensive; but he has a father and grandfather to question about what wages were when wheat was dear, or at the dearest, and he has memory and his own hungry experience to guide him. Some of the great and noble landowners are indignant at the idea of the Government taxing the people's food!—forgetting that, as they get a great deal themselves, the Government, driven to their wit's end for money, fancy they may obtain a small share for the public sugar and coffee are the produce of slave-labour: we are men of principle; and our consciences will not allow us to consume slave-labour sugar and coffee." But does the transaction end there? do we then take our goods to a free-labour market? No; we try to help them out of the difficulty: we say, "We will not consume sugar and coffee the produce of slave-labour; but the Germans are not so conscientious; take your produce there, and get for it money, which we have no scruple to accept." But the Brazilians say, "There is still a difficulty in this; Germany is across the Atlantic; we have very few ships fit to cope with the waves of the ocean." What do we then say? Our reply is, "Oh, we have ships in plenty; we will carry your produce for you." Slave-labour sugar shall not contaminate our warehouses, our shops, or our tables; but as to our ships, that is a very different thing. But the Brazilians say there is another difficulty—and, indeed, there is no end to them. The Brazilians say, "The Germans like our sugar; but they are fond of refined sugar; we cannot refine our own sugar, and the Germans are not willing to do so." But we again say, "Oh, we are aware of that; we will step in and help you; we will refine your sugar for you." So that, however sinful it may be to continue to use slave-labour sugar, there is no sin in refining it. We refine it, then, and think we have done. Not a bit; the Brazilians say, "We have a great deal more sugar than the Germans want; what are we to do with it?" And what do we say in reply? Why, we say, "We will buy it of you; we will not eat it ourselves, because we are conscientious men, but will send it to our West India islands, and to our distant settlements, there to be consumed by the negro or the colonist, who has no right to a conscience. It can do them no harm to eat slave-labour sugar; and, to prevent any difficulty, we tell you that if that will not do, and if through any accident our own sugar shall get dear, we will eat your slave-grown sugar ourselves." Now, without wishing to give the slightest offence, I ask, is not this the grossest hypocrisy? And are we to be asked to forego an arrangement which will be attended with relief to our commerce, and with assistance to our finances, upon pretences so hollow and so inconsistent with what we are doing every day?

service; that the whole need not go to bolster up the exorbitant rents which the bread monopoly has created. Tax the people's food for revenue!—for what lightens, or ought to lighten, their burdens in some other direction! That is an idea not to be entertained for a moment in free and happy England, where all the people wear broad cloth, and eat beef and pudding every day. Such benevolent individuals will therefore certainly oppose the "fixed injustice" of a high duty,—and 8s. is a very high duty, much too high.

One good effect of the whig measure is already apparent, in rousing the people from torpor and apathy as to their rights, and teaching them to feel that there is something to strive for, worth obtaining; to strive for, not indeed with the enthusiasm, and unlimited confidence, and cordial union which marked the reform struggle, but with perhaps better sense, and with more solidly-based, if more moderate expectations. There is still materiel left for a good fight: perhaps the anti-monopolists may conquer at once at the hustings; but, in the worst event, a powerful phalanx will be found in the next Parliament, pledged, in addition to every former pledge, to stand by the banner of Free Trade. Save for the handle which would be given to the tories to misrepresent the popular sentiment on that question, if they be brought into power by the results of a general election, the matter, except as a question of time, is, to genuine reformers, of small consequence. If the more liberal party be, for a season, excluded from office, the lesson may be useful. They have been long enough in power for all the good they have done,—and may be none the worse for a few months of the bracing and discipline of opposition, ever a quickener of whig liberality. These are general remarks, and by the by. We give ministers hearty praise for what they have attempted,—and, if they adhere to their professions, confidently foresee for them the returning confidence and warm support of the aroused people.

FREE TRADE FOR EVER, AND EVERY THING CHEAP!

AN EXCELLENT ELECTION SONG.

1.

LISTEN, my lads, to the joyful intelligence,
Melbourne proclaims a millennium at hand:
Ne'er did such tidings, by mail or by diligence,
Promise relief to a perishing land.
Trade will revive now, as sure's you're alive now,
No drones in the hive now shall slumber and sleep;
Monopoly totters, quite weak on her trotters,
And Whiggery vows to make every thing cheap.

Scan not the motives of man or of minister;
Never enquire if he's honest and true:
Whigs may have views that are selfish and sinister,
Pay is their purpose—but what's that to you?
Why should we grudge it, if sorry to trudge yet,
They brought in the Budget their places to keep?
Though oft we've been cheated, it won't be repeated,
So Free Trade for ever, and every thing cheap!

Sugar—you're licking your lips at the thought of it—
Soon will be down half a farthing a pound;
Slave-trading Cuba can grow such a lot of it,
Free British labour must fall to the ground.
Why should the masses, if fond of molasses,
Like soft-hearted asses o'er slavery weep?
Those great men of figures, your Humes and M'Gregors,
Hold planters, and niggers, and every one cheap.

Trust not the Tories for sense and sincerity,
All about nothing they make such a fuss;
Leave them to prate of colonial prosperity,
What are the East or West Indies to us?
Our free-trade opinions are true thick and thin ones:
Of all our dominions we'll make a clean sweep:
No good's to be had of them, France will be glad of them,
Sell her both commerce and colonies cheap.

Bury each feeling of old animosity;
Every weak prejudice lay on the shelf;
Open your ports, and ne'er ask reciprocity—
Foreigners just are as good as yourself.
The season's fast slipping—'tis time to be clipping
The wings of our shipping that cumbers the deep;
Nothing that's national ever is rational;
Glory's too dear for us—Free Trade is cheap!

Farmers, go hear our itinerant lecturers,
Only by them is the thing understood;
Quickly make way for our great manufacturers,
Want of protection is all for your good.
No fact can be surer—if once you're made poorer,
You're all the securer a profit to reap;
While lack of employment will help their enjoyment,
Who wish land, and labour, and every thing cheap.

Shout for free trade, while you've breath left to cry it with,
Pleasant the sound is whate'er it may mean:
Bawl for cheap bread till you've nothing to buy it with,
What it may cost will hereafter be seen.
Huzza! for confusion, deception, delusion,
The coming conclusion just makes my heart leap;
When Tories got under, leave Whigs free to blunder,
And pillage and plunder make every thing cheap!

From Blackwood's Magazine.

IDA AND ERMENGARD.

With goodly cheer, and vintage rare,
The board of Dais was drest
Alone they sat, the lady fair
And that benighted guest.

His bearing, frank and bold, appear'd
All form to cast aside;
Her new-told name the lady heard,
And scarcely seem'd to chide.

"Ida, thy sadness is a spell
That stirs my inmost heart;
Some fearful secret here doth dwell
That passeth common art.

Thy queen-like courtesy is paid
With melancholy grace,
And fear and woe have cast a shade
On that young lovely face.

"At this thy board, when none are nigh,
Thou speak'st below thy breath;
Thine eye still dwells on vacancy,
As on some sight of death.

Though I have known thee scarce an hour,
Love counts not time or space,
Fly with me; mine are wealth and power,
And an unblemish'd race."

Young Ida shudder'd, look'd around,
"We are not here alone,"
She said, and her sweet voice's sound
Died to a stifled moan.

"Though innocent in deed and thought
I bear a blighted name,
(Thus far the wizard lord hath taught,)
A heritage of shame.

"My mother! in my infant days,
So sweet and kind of mood,
Woe's me! I cannot speak her praise
As a loved daughter should:

Ere dawn of life—woe worth the star
That ruled my wayward fate—
She fled, and left Count Waldemar
To nurse his vengeful hate.

The wrongs that furrow'd his dark cheek,
Taught him the deeds of hell,
In dwellings of the dead to seek Vigil and demon spell.

Revenge was rife; these walls but ill
His sorceries withstood;
Blood flow'd, but his revengeful will
Was sated not with blood.

All perish'd; I am helpless here,
The only living soul,
The tenants of the charnel drear
Obey his fell control.

Mark'd ye the warder's stony eye
That oped the castle gate?
The gaunt and silent ministry
That spread the board in state?

Brave hearts and true! in vain they fought:
They spake of yore, and smil'd;
They serve, but see me, know me not,
Their own dead master's child.

When the wild huntsman sweepeth near
With ghostly horn and hound,
The din that others shrink to hear
Seems like a social sound.

Yet more!" His eye pursued her own
To where, behind his seat,
An armed form stood still as stone,
In plate and mail complete.

It was the same which he had eyed
At first with little heed,
As empty harness, set aside
To wait the wearer's need.

"A spell constraineth him within
To cumber upper earth;
Oh, had he perish'd shriv'n from sin,
Or never giv'n me birth!

His being, how in death sustain'd,
Thou would'st not bear the tale—
The fatal eve is now at hand,"
—Her damask cheek turn'd pale.

Sir Ermengard sprang from the board,
His brow with wrath flush'd high;
"Come man, come fiend! this trenchant sword,
Shall match foul gramarye.

Oft was it proved in Palestine
Through siege and battle bold,
And smote the wizard Maugretyn,
In his own desert hold.

This hand shall break the spell, my fair,"
—He strode her own to grasp;
The lady shrunk, and shriek'd "Forbear!
Thou'dst better touch an asp."

"Forbear!"—a deep voice answer'd, like
The echoes of a storm,
An iron arm was raised to strike;
—It was the mailed form.

A blue and momentary gleam
Through the barr'd visor shone,
The clanking arm dropt—all did seem
Again as still as stone.

"Oh, if thou lovest me as thou say'st,
Rash Ermengard, away!
Better bear all than see thee waste
A struggling, living prey.

"Few men his mortal strength withstood
Before that fatal hour,
And now his strange unhallow'd food
Bestows unearthly power.

Others, as madly brave as thou,
This vain emprize have tried,
I wept their fate, but none till now—"
A sigh the pause supplied.

"Know, too, that from this weird domain
To lead me none may dare,
But one whom sainted vows constrain
To penitence and prayer.

Oh! could such holy man arrive,
To break my nameless doom,
Then might some friendly cloister give
A shelter and a tomb."

This time to-morrow night!—he saw
Her horror-stricken look—
"Deem'st thou such devilries to awe,
By candle, bell, and book?

"The good Red Cross is bound upon
My shoulder and my breast,
And relics from Mount Lebanon,
Within my hauberk rest.

This sword hath shiver'd mail and plate
Stronger than that I see;
Vampyre, or fiend, he proves its weight
For love and loyaltie!"

* * * * * * *

A blue flame, ghastlier than before,
Flash'd from the visor'd face;
The iron Form strode on the floor,
And raised a ponderous mace.

BRITISH CONQUESTS.

The intelligence just brought by the overland mail confirms the view we have all along taken of the Chinese affair. Captain Elliot has been overreached by the Imperial Commissioner, who either acted without orders from the emperor, or was instructed to terminate hostilities by making concessions and promises which the court might afterwards refuse to recognise. It is still altogether uncertain, however, what course the Chinese authorities will pursue; but the probability is, that they will endeavour to wear us out by delays, counting much upon the unfavourable influence of their climate on the health and discipline of our troops. They will probably discover in the end that greater openness and honesty would have better answered their purpose; for by taking possession of Hong-kong we have planted our foot firmly in their empire, from which we shall never again retire until it becomes our own. We by no means intend to say that such is at present the intention of the British government. On the contrary, we believe its counsels to be guided by extreme moderation. But no one at all acquainted with the character of the Court of Pekin can doubt for a moment that it will equivocate, shuffle, and put in practice all the most dishonest arts of diplomacy, until it provokes our resentment, and brings down destruction upon its own head. Meanwhile it is quite evident, even from this distance, that Captain Elliot and all engaged in the Chinese expedition have conducted themselves any thing but wisely. It would seem as if the very refuse of the navy and diplomatic body had been selected to manage that unfortunate expedition. The most obvious advantages, when manifestly within our reach, have been thrown away. When Pekin was attainable they contented themselves with occupying Chusan, and when they might have established British authority over the whole of Qangtung Province, they have contented themselves with the miserable island of Hong-kong. A beginning has nevertheless been made, and unless our policy in China differ altogether from what it has been in every other part of the East, the result of the transactions now in progress must be what we have stated above. Indeed the correspondents of the Indian papers, writing from the spot, anticipate nothing less than the immediate renewal of hostilities. They say that the Commissioner Keeshen, having enacted the part assigned him, is to be recalled in pretended disgrace; while another Commissioner, more insolent and overbearing, is to be despatched from the court to supply his place. The emperor, who, but for our extreme forbearance, might ere this have been driven from his capital, affects to be highly indignant at the cession of Hong-kong, made he affirms without his permission, and contrary to his orders. He still meditates, therefore, opposing force with force, and the most active preparations are accordingly making at Canton for renewing the struggle with the English. We sincerely trust his majesty may persist in this plan. Nothing would afford us greater satisfaction. It must lead to our speedy conquest and occupation of China,—a country which would prove still more valuable to us than the vast possessions we already hold in the East. From India and Persia the news just arrived is equally gratifying. The Punjaub must immediately be annexed to our Indian empire, and the infatuation of the Persian Shah, which impels him to court the enmity of Great Britain, will, in all human probability, compel us to extend our dominions from the Indus to the Euphrates. Some politicians, we are aware, affect to deprecate such an event, and repeat the advice of Augustus to his successors. But imitative and second-hand policy only shows, like all other imitations, the weakness of those who are the authors of it. The wisest course for Great Britain is to push her conquests to the utmost,—to leave nothing undone that she can accomplish,—nothing unattempted which bids fair to succeed. Our possessions in Asia will continue to be incomplete until they abut upon the Mediterranean, and comprise the whole of Asia south of the Caucasian range. Until this great design is fulfilled in all its parts, we must be incessantly engaged in wars, either with or against our will. The conduct, for example, of the Khan of Bockhara towards Colonel Stoddart, merits the severest chastisement, and our Indian government will be wanting in its duty if it do not forthwith take the proper means for bringing him to reason. The same remark applies to the Shah of Persia. Our political agents have been driven precipitately from Herat, and a Persian army is said to be advancing, with the aid of Prince Kamran, to assail the western capital of Affghanistan. All the world will acknowledge that we must resist this invasion, and most persons will perceive the necessity of our punishing it severely. Prince Kamran must be ejected from Herat, and his forces replaced by a British garrison, otherwise our tranquillity will never be assured west of the Indus, nor will there be any end of our expenses. Nay, further, some portion of the territories of the Shah must be wrested from him, not only as a security against future aggression on his part, but to punish him for the hostilities he is at present carrying on. With respect to the wild tribes of Beloochistan, and the emirs of Scind, they may already be regarded as our subjects, though tranquillity will never be properly established in their country until they shall have experienced to a certain extent the influence of civilisation. Their turbulent and marauding youth must, moreover, be draughted off to recruit our armies, that we may complete, at the expense of these faithless barbarians, the chain of conquests necessary to protect the boundaries of our eastern empire, and to establish order and tranquillity within its proper limits. In executing the plans we have here sketched out, we shall achieve greater and more important advantages for the natives than for ourselves. They will be delivered, in the first place, from a cruel and capricious despotism, under which no man's life or property can be deemed his own; and, secondly, from a brutal ignorance more cruel and capricious still. For the first time since the days of Vieramaditya, they will be enabled to taste the blessings of peace, and the benefits accruing from the successful pursuits of industry. Who, therefore, that is in the least solicitous for the good of mankind, can desire to check the progress of the English in Asia?—Sunday Times.

HAPPINESS.

BY COUL GOPPAGH.

Not the deep ponderings of the reverend sage
Whose brows are wisdom's citadel, whereon
Shines a still glory, where within are stored
The mightiest weapons, fit for the strong arm
Of Truth impregnable, whose most firm stroke
Falls silent on the ear of centuries,
And ever shattering.
The laboured mail
Of systems and of schools, and the flashing sword
Of Learning, polished in divinest shades, Avail not.
Not the highest lay that poured
Ever from human soul, like the glory reigning
Among the mountain tops, and rolling forth
The ocean of its beams when waking day
Stirs the hosannahs of the summer world.
Not riches, though the wealth of Eastern kings
When they held highest monarchy of old,
Were heaped together, and each diamond, worth
The purchase of a kingdom's blood, did kindle
To a supremer blaze.
Not one of these
Can buy the secret of her hiding-place.
Meekly, within the heart of INNOCENCE,
She strays above the stars of heaven: she slumbers
Where God hath told the trees to welcome her
In his own garden; and, fast by the river
Of Life, she listens to its gladsome wave.
HE smiles upon her, and eternity
Feels a deep thrill through all its coming ages,
Telling the unborn years to honour her;
Yet is she meeker than the early lamb
That skippeth on the hills.

DOTAGE.

BY COUL GOPPAGH.

WHAT smiles be these; what inward mutterings;
Why play these poor pale fingers with the air;
What joy may this old wasted bosom bear,
That thus it breaks forth piteously and sings!
Mayhap, afar in Youth-beloved glen,
With mother or fond sisters now he strays;
Or haply to himself he mourns, as when
Of old he loved in long forgotten days,
That o'er the night-time of his heart do steal,
Like dim stars glimmering through the mist of age.
Ah, I could sorely weep,—but that I feel
In heaven, at close of life's long pilgrimage,
This childish mantle, falling shall reveal
A soul, full grown to Youth's immortal heritage.

ON THE DEATH OF A FAVOURITE DOG.

"MOURN for a dog, forsooth!" Wise friend, not so;
I mourn lost hours and joys for ever gone,
Wherein he shared,—ay, shared; each morning's glow
To me was brighter for his cheering tone;
His voice was ever cheerful; and if woe
And worldly cares their clouds around had thrown,
No "summer friend" was he to leave alone
The master, whom adversity laid low!
The self-same power, wise friend, that unto thee
Gave life, did give it unto him,—nay, more,
Gave kindness, courage, changeless constancy;
And shall I not, in heart, their loss deplore?
These live, 'tis true, with Him who gave them birth;
Right seldom are such gifts bestow'd on earth.

A RESIDENCE IN THE AZORES.*

Two gentlemen of the name of Bullar spent the winter of 1838–9, and the summer of 1839, in cruising among the Azores, or in making tours and short exploratory excursions into the interior of those islands. The one was an invalid, who went to the Azores in search of a warm and equable climate; his companion an M. D., and probably the brother of the invalid. They kept a regular journal, and have made a delightful addition to those numerous light and easy chit-chat narratives of travel, which are becoming so agreeable a feature in modern literature. Familiar as the name of this group of islands has long been to English ears, the scene of their travels and remarks is still comparatively new. Even on so late an occasion as that of the missing President steamer, many, otherwise well informed persons, among us, were at a loss about the island of Fayal, one of the Azores, to which it was hoped the unfortunate vessel had repaired, and in the port of which, Horta, there is now a depot of coal for the use, in a strait, of the Atlantic steamers. Yet, in the orange season, there has, for many years, been a considerable direct trade between London and St. Michael's and some of the other islands. The Azorean archipelago is divided into three groups: the western, including Flores and Corvo; and the central group, Fayal, Pico, St. George, Graciosa, and Terceira. The third is at the south-east extremity, and consists of the largest island of the whole, namely, St. Michael's with St. Mary's. These islands, we need scarcely say, are under the dominion of Portugal, from which they are distant about eight hundred miles. They are of volcanic formation, and their general aspect is exceedingly bold and picturesque. The Azores are still liable to tremendous visitations, and particularly to sudden and violent storms of wind and rain; yet the climate, though humid, is, upon the whole, equable and mild, and the soil is naturally extremely fertile, yielding an easy abundance to the mass of the native population, whose condition, as it is here represented, may, in several respects, excite the envy of the more intelligent hard-worked labourers of highly civilised countries. The name of the archipelago is said to be derived from the number of hawks which constantly hover about the lofty cones and cliffs of the islands, and which were named by the natives, at the period of the discovery of the group, Acores. The Azores have been colonized from Portugal and Spain, and our travellers traced Moorish blood in some of them. The inhabitants are now estimated at about 250,000, which is not a fifth part of what the islands, if moderately well cultivated, might maintain. Feudal tenures still exist there in unmitigated deformity. The large estates of the Morgados, or squires, are strictly entailed; and the tenants are subjected to all the tyranny, extortion, and capricious annoyance which marked the worst periods of the system in other countries. They, consequently, live on from hand to mouth, without industry, and caring little for improvements in husbandry, from which they would derive no personal or permanent advantage. England receives the greater part of the exported produce of these islands, which consists principally of oranges and lemons, with a small quantity of wine and brandy, for which, hardware, woollen and cotton cloths, and other things, are sent in return. The islands have also some trade with the mother country, and latterly, in coarse linens and wine, with Brazil and the United States of America. The United States have a consul at Ponta Delgada, in St. Michael's. This is the largest town in the islands, though the seat of the insular government, which is confided to a governor general, with two lieutenant governors, is at Anyra in Terceira.

For the Azores, the invalid and his companion embarked at Cowes, in a fruit vessel, in the middle of November, 1838. The discomforts of a voyage in a St. Michael's fruiterer may be left to the reader's imagination. They are graphically described, in a way which gives the reader some stomachic qualms, closely resembling incipient sea sickness. Yet, in salt water phraseology, the "passengers got their victuals," and, in spite of every hardship, enjoyed good health. The captain of the fruiterer must have been a rare bird in the St. Michael's trade. He had been a student of Shakspeare and Milton in his day, and had set up night after night to read the Waverley novels; yet he was still a true sailor. Nautical ideas on points of etiquette, or nicety, are illustrated as completely by the following brief anecdote of him, as they could be by a long dissertation:—

At breakfast this morning a long lurch brought down a black mangy hair brush into the little boy's tea. The boy looked meek, and held up his basin for a fresh supply. "What now! I suppose your stomach, then's, too delicate to drink that after my hair brush has been in it, he?" The boy's contrite silence said "Yes."

One or both the authors of the journal (for their respective shares are not discriminated) has a fine eye for scenery, and a lively feeling of the beautiful and picturesque in natural objects. Of this the volumes afford numerous proofs. They, or he, longed for a gale, if not a storm, in the Atlantic, and enjoyed their wish to their heart's content. On the fifth of December the ever-welcome sound of "land" was heard; and on the sixth they landed at Ponta Delgada, encountering considerable difficulty, if not danger, from the heavy surf through which they were dexterously piloted by the jabbering, screaming, Portuguese boatmen. But—

Notwithstanding all their apparent confusion they manage their boats skilfully, and are admitted to be excellent boatmen: they swim, too, like fish. "If de wave fill the boat, sare," was Peter the Italian mate's parting advice, "you catch hold of a Portugee, and stick to him: you no be drowned."

The first question we were asked on going into the custom house of St. Michael's, was, "Has Mr. Thomson (or some such remarkably named individual) arrived in England?"

The propounder of this simple yet difficult problem was a grave stolid little man, of some forty years of age, who looked up for a reply to his question with all the confiding simplicity of a child; and who, on hearing the unexpected answer, that we really could not say, seemed surprised and almost annoyed at so humiliating a confession of ignorance in the affairs of our own nation.

They had letters to the hospitable American consul, who next night carried them to a ball, given upon the occasion of the heiress of a deceased morgado coming of age; that is, having reached her twelfth year, when, by law, a young Azorean lady is entitled to take possession of her entailed property, and to marry. We hear nothing of the lady of the night; but obtain a lively idea of the festivities. They went at the early hour of seven, and found the ball rooms quite full, and dancing begun.

The house, which was one of the largest in the place, resembled externally the hotels in the Faubourg St. Germain. It was built on two sides of a quadrangular court-yard, one end of which was occupied by stables, and the other by a high wall and gateway. In the hall a heap of barefooted servants and link boys, mixed up with liveried men, women, lanterns, and jack-booted postilions, sat and lounged and laughed.

Two servants waited at the door, and with tapers in their hands ushered each visiter to the gallery outside the ball rooms. The suite of rooms was spacious, and the furniture, which was all in good taste, was Persian. So far as the dress and the dancing went, I might have fancied myself in an English or French ball-room, and was a little disappointed to see no peculiarity of national costume; and instead of fandangos or boleros, or Spanish or Moorish dances of any kind, to find about forty couples figuring away at the first set of quadrilles, and finishing with a promenade, just as they would have done on English ground. There was excellent music, pianos, fiddles, flutes, and fifes; there were glittering chandeliers, bright candelabra, vases of flowers, shining mirrors; there were gay uniforms, bullion epaulettes, long moustachios, of black, sandy or red; young dandies with long locks, and old gentlemen with stars and orders; there were judges, priests, and barons. What more could be wanted to make a ball all that a ball should be.

The hair of the younger ladies was turned up behind, and fell in front in large and luxuriant ringlets. So far they resembled my country women; but their complexions and cast of features were very different. "Pretty girls," light haired, fair, airy beings, such as England is so abundantly blessed with, there were none; but the proportion of really handsome women was great.

Some would have made pictures: their hair, black, glossy, and luxuriant; their eyes full, dark, and "unfathomable," (altogether different from the black sparkling eye, which seems to reflect at once the light which falls upon it.) They had fine teeth, which their full lips easily disclosed, and were generally of middle height, well proportioned, and rather tending to embonpoint. I saw none of those very small waists which so many English women attain to, by great endurance and much patient suffering.

The ladies were lively, talkative, and good tempered, with intelligent foreheads. They kissed acquaintances of their own sex on recognising them, and used the fan like the Spaniards; keeping it in incessant motion, opening and shutting it, and turning it in a thousand different ways, so easily, and, as it seemed, unconsciously, with such a concealment of their art, as was most graceful. Many of the younger ones had learned English, and spoke it fluently. Their pronunciation was remarkably good.

There were the usual proportion of ladies past their prime, with turbans, birds of Paradise, and shining silks; and a due sprinkling of conspicuous looking young men, who had happily not attained that age when "man suspects himself a fool." One custom differed from ours, and showed much kindness of feeling. A group of women servants, with their heads covered with white kerchiefs were lying upon a part of the staircase, from which they could look at the dancers over the heads of those who stood at the door, and thus they shared in the pleasures of the family.

The barbarism of opening a ball at the hour of six, and permitting the barefooted servants to have a peep of the amusements of their masters and mistresses, we leave to the mercy of the refined English reader. The state of social manners in these islands, in many points resembles what was general in England some centuries ago; and, particularly, in the abundant leisure enjoyed by all classes. Every other day is a holyday in the Azores; and the shop keepers deliberately lock up their shops, and go away to their dinners or their amusements. Competition has not there encroached on indolent enjoyment. Religion and morals are much in the same condition as they were in most Roman Catholic countries before the influence of the French revolution had been felt, either in reforming manners or teaching the priesthood to look more strictly after their flocks, and to assume the decent cloak of hypocrisy themselves. The English in Ponta Delgada have a chapel, to which they give but irregular attendance. There are a good many English in the place, several of them medical men. Sunday is the market day, as in other Catholic countries; and our author remarks:—

There is as little appearance of religion, as in a Protestant country on week days, or as in Hyde Park or the Zoological gardens on fine Sunday afternoons. All the market people, however, attend mass either before or after they sell their goods.

Went into one of the Catholic churches, where was a crowd of men, with no particular look of devotion in their faces. We soon perceived that the elections were going on, of "select men," who are to choose members for the Cortes. The scriveners and vote-takers were sitting in the middle of the church, round a table covered with scarlet cloth. There were priests quietly and narrowly watching all that went forward, and a small crowd of bystanders looking over the shoulders of those who sat at the table. The priests sit here officially. They are supposed to know every individual in their parish, and therefore to be able to detect personations—a deception very likely to be practised, where the suffrage is what is called universal.

In the corner of the church an aged man was burning the old ballot papers, by applying a candle to a heap that lay on the stone floor, and when they were burned he quenched the sparks with a few handfuls of holy water from the marble basin.

The streets of Ponta Delgada resemble the narrow streets of many of the old cities on the Continent.

The basement of the houses is used for shops, storehouses, or stables. The shops are lighted from the door, and have no windows. There is consequently none of the gay variety of shop fronts seen in England, but open doors display counters and shelves inside. The signs for different trades are hung out of these doorways. At one door, for instance, you see a dozen strips of printed cottons tied to a small stick, and fluttering like the ribbons on a recruiting serjeant's hat. This tells you that a linen-draper stands ready inside with tape and cottons.

Farther on, a small bundle of fagots, a bunch of onions, a few roots of garlic, and two or three candles dangle from another stick, and denote a grocer. A shoemaker's sign is a bunch of leather shreds; and a hatter's is a painted hat. A butcher ties up a bundle of empty sausage skins, or a rude drawing of an ox having his horn sawed off, the saw as large as the man who uses it. Over a milkman's door hangs a crooked red cow, such as may be seen in alleys in London. A green bough of faya,* which resembles a branch of arbutus, indicates a wine shop, and, by the addition of a sprig of box, you learn that spirits are sold there. Such was the custom in England, when the proverb was made that "good wine requires no bush." In other shops you see a small board suspended from a little stick, with Portuguese words signifying "good wine and spirits," coarsely painted on it. The names of the shopkeepers are not over their doors, as with us.

The first floor windows, immediately above the shops and stores, are very generally furnished with small wooden balconies of trellis-work, like that in our dairy windows, which is painted dull red, green, or white. Neat iron balconies are fixed before some of the windows of the larger houses. The eaves project considerably, and the corner tile is frequently shaped like a bird with outspread wings, or is made to turn up into a long point. * * * * Shoemakers sit at work in their door ways: in others, tailors squat, while the goose is seen in the street on a smouldering pan of charcoal. Those whom I saw sitting on a bench inside, seemed to have shaken off that constitutional melancholy which has been attributed to them, and to be indulging in obstreperous mirth. A few vehicles resembling somewhat the old race of hack cabs in London, hung on a long carriage with upright springs, and drawn by two small, spirited horses, with postilions in jack-boots, and men in dull liveries, swinging on behind, clattered through the streets with the rattle and jingle of empty post-chaises. Two ladies sat in some of these, dressed in by-gone European fashions; others had a single occupant. Some were closed in by heavy leather flaps and aprons, having two glazed holes, on a level with the rider's eyes.

Pigs and donkeys there were in abundance; the swine unusually large and fat, and the donkeys varying from those wizened and wasted forms that ruddle-men, small green-grocers, and "weary" itinerant knife-grinders, belabour and overload in England, to sleek and spirited animals of a size and strength they never attain in our colder climate.

* Myrica Faya.

There are fountains in the streets, with tanks by their sides, where asses stop to drink; and these, like market places, are spots where foreigners generally find amusement. The water is carried in barrels, and in pitchers of red pottery; the barrels, which are long and narrow, are frequently slung in pairs over the back of an ass, and the pitchers, which are made in the island, and, being porous, like the Indian gurglets, act in summer time as water coolers, possess as much beauty of form as some of those in the British Museum from the ruins of Herculaneum. The water of St. Michael's is peculiarly delicate and pure.

Such is the out-door aspect of Ponta Delgada. Two newspapers are published in it, affording a vent to ill-nature, or advocating the interests of the respective parties of the "Cats" and the "Pigs: the latter being the tories, or that party attached to the Constitution of Don Pedro; and the Cats the radicals, who "want something more."

One of the authors of this narrative must be an expert draughtsman, and his drawings of costume have received ample justice from the wood-engravings, which partake of the beauty of all those published by Mr. Van Voorst. Some of the designs represent the Carapuca; the very unwieldy and fantastic head-gear worn by the men of St. Michael's. It consists of every variety of material, according to the taste or circumstances of the wearer, but the form is alike in all ranks. It looks exceedingly awkward to strangers, but has its uses during the violent transitions of weather, and the heavy rains to which the Azores are liable. The women of St. Michael's wear heavy blue cloth cloaks with the stiffened hoods drawn over their heads, exactly like those worn by the Irish peasant women when seen at mass or market some years ago, and in many localities still. Neither men nor women of the common class wear shoes, save on great occasions. This our author considers a great beauty, and in that climate no hardship. The "better orders" of both sexes wear the post-dated dresses of Europe, many years in the rear of fashion. The children in the country are not over-burdened with clothing of any sort, nor does the climate require it. Among the reforms of Don Pedro, who suppressed the monasteries, in order, it is said, to restore public morals,—sadly deteriorated by the practices of those privileged nests of the vices —schools were established, where the children of the poor are taught free, and many parents are now availing themselves of the advantage. The children seen at a school visited by the Messrs. Bullar, appeared cheerful and intelligent, and not so awkward and loutish in their demeanour as poor English children. They were moderately well dressed. We are certainly, whatever may be the cause or causes, become, as a people, either the most sullen and reserved, or the most gruff and boorish in manners, among the civilised families of mankind. To this fact all travellers bear testimony.

The politeness of the people here is very striking to an Englishman. A countryman will hardly ever pass you without taking off his hat, even when his load may make it a real inconvenience to him; and as there is a serious composure about their courtesy, and an apparent absence of servility, these recognitions seem like tokens of sincere good-will. I do not know that there is more downright civility of purpose about them than there is in John Bull,—very possibly there may be much less. There is certainly more varnish; and a good watch looks better in a gold case, though it may go as well in one of Britannia metal.

We are sorry to find, that in spite of the protection of the ballot, the Pigs carried the election, owing to the influence of the priests, rarely, indeed, a wholesome influence, either in Catholic or Protestant lands, and very generally exerted on the wrong side.

The horses of the Azores are few and bad, the beasts of labour and burden being generally either bullocks, or mules and asses; which last abound of a strong and active kind, and form the ordinary monture of both ladies and gentlemen. Mounted on clever and strong, though self-willed Jacks, our travellers made frequent excursions in the environs of the town of Ponta Delgada, and visited numerous orange gardens. On asses they, also, made the journey from Ponta Delgada to Villa Franca, a town at fifteen miles distance. The road lay along mountainous ridges, through deep glens, and around cliffs overhanging the sea. The asses were found as sagacious and sure-footed, in these dangerous paths, as if they had been mules. At Villa Franca the travellers lodged with an amusing couple, for whom the English merchants had built a cottage, as a reward for the husband having saved the lives of some English sailors wrecked upon the coast. The wife, Thomazia, showed the temper of her race, by engaging in a very characteristic scolding-match with certain orange-gatherers, who had been her lodgers, and who had, by their slovenliness, incurred her displeasure. She, besides, very naturally for a landlady, wished to turn them out, to make way for better-paying lodgers.

Had an Englishwoman been in one quarter of the apparent passion, she would have exhibited for some hours afterwards, in her red and hot face, short breathing, and nervous agitation, the effects of her anger; but Thomazia was as cool and possessed after it, as if it were an every-day thing.

The house is a good specimen of a St. Michael's cottage. Below, there is one room, opening into the street, with a flood of hard earth, trodden flat and smooth by naked feet, and strewed with green rushes. In one corner is a neat clean bed, having a bolster fringed with muslin; two heavy wooden chests, like corn-bins, stand together against the wall; and there is a square piece of matting, on which the women squat by day, and the children sleep by night. A small iron lamp, ending in a crucifix, the lamp resembling those from Herculaneum, the wick of which protrudes from a small spout at one end, hangs against the wall, and gives a faint light.

In the day-time the room is lighted by the door, the upper part of which opens. A couple of pigeons fly and roost at discretion in the room,—fowls and chickens do the same; and the friend of the family, the pig, comes in and is driven out whenever the lower part of the door chances to be open. The bed and the walls are decked out with green branches of faya, and the staircase is screened off by a thin partition of platted reeds or canes, the glossy yellow sides of which look bright by the side of the dark stone walls, which in such cottages are left in the rough, without a coating of white-wash or plaster. The room above in which we are sitting, differs from the one below in having windows at the two ends, closed with rough wooden shutters, in place of glass. Behind the lower room is a kitchen, which, like that in old-fashioned farm-houses in England, has a stone hearth about three feet from the ground, on which the very simple process of cookery in the families of the poor is carried on. Near it is a small oven for baking the bread of Indian corn, and the festival bread for Christmas and Easter. We find no inconvenience from the absence of windows, (though the shutters are chinky;) so that what in England would be felt as a serious hardship, is not here even a deprivation.

This picture gives no idea of squalid misery, nor even of discomfort, to persons with the habits of Azoreans. The travellers visited a nunnery, to see the sight, though under the pretext of purchasing artificial flowers, which the nuns make very prettily from feathers. The usual apparatus of the turning-box used at all nunnery grates, seems to have been new to them, even in description. The scenery in the neighbourhood of Villa Franca is bold and fine, and the orange tree flourishes vigorously in the sunny glens and glades, opening to the sea.

Christmas arrived, bringing few signs of winter: there were neither fires nor fire-places; and the elder and cuckoo-pint were already bursting into leaf. Christmas is the great holiday of all Catholic, of all Christian countries; and on it the stranger in the Azores may see more of the manners of the people than in many months of ordinary time. Here

The appearance of the town was like that of an English village on Sunday. Every one,—man, woman, and child,—is cleanly, neatly, or even gaily dressed; no work is going on, no asses are to be seen, even the pigs have assumed an indolent holiday expression, and every thing indicates a complete cessation from all working-day occupations. The rooms of the poor are dressed out with boughs of evergreens, and some are strewed with rushes. In the afternoon, in most of the cottages of the poor, the women, girls, and little children sat cross-legged on the floor, their glossy black hair neatly arranged, shining with oil, and often fastened with high tortoise-shell combs. Some were sitting at the door-step in the sun. The balconies of the houses were occupied by women, who leaned over them and looked at the passers by. They are fond of bright-coloured shawls, with a preference for deep yellow or crimson; and these suit well their black eyes, hair, and dark complexions. The men lounged and chatted in the streets, or vigorously gesticulated in groups round the wine-shops; while their boys were in herds at play. The women are particularly gay about the feet. One wore a tawny pair of high shoes, with bright orange tassels; others white leather resembling kid; others what had the appearance at least of white satin; and one careful damsel, whom we accidentaliy interrupted in the outskirts of the town, was engaged in taking off and rolling up her smart shoes and open stockings, before setting forth bare-footed on her way home. She looked very much ashamed of herself, poor soul!

In the evening we wandered out and paid Thomazia's cottage a visit. She and her children and grandchildren were sitting up in all the enjoyment of their festival. In one corner of the room was the bed, which, in every cottage and on all occasions, is perfectly clean and neat, but to-day it was decorated with a finely worked muslin vallance, and a handsome coverlid of white quilted materials, on which were strewed a few flowers. The floor was spread with fresh rushes, the walls and ceiling were covered with green branches of the faya: and in the midst of this bower, just sufficiently lighted by a small crucifix-lamp to make a picture of the cottage interior, lay and lounged the family of the Bichos. There was Antonio stretched on the rushes in his hairy strength, sound asleep. Thomazia squatted in Moorish fashion with her elbows on her knees; one of her children with his head upon her lap, lay in motionless sleep; a girl in a bright red petticoat, laughing to her baby, and quizzing the foreigners to her black-eyed sister who sat beside her, leaned upon the bed; her husband with short moustachios and olive-brown complexion, rubbed his cat, and smiled at the notice taken of the cottage; and the youngest and brownest grandchild stood on the clothes chest in a small white shirt, wondering at us with child-like simplicity. All were merry, and all were more or less cheered with wine. They were well-pleased to be looked at and praised. All the attitudes were perfect, being the natural expressions of unfettered and healthy bodies. The single bright lamp in the dark leafy room; the strong contrasts of light and shade; the thin angular limbs, and more marked features of the older woman, compared with the rounded and feminine figure of her daughter, and the young children on the floor, altogether produced a most picturesque effect. In the day time, when talking to their neighbours or playing in the street, they all look exquisitely happy; and even the little child, who, in addition to its single white shirt, had been decked out with an orange-coloured jacket, seemed delightfully conscious that it was more smartly dressed than usual.

The sweet, juicy, refreshing orange is naturally associated with every Englishman's idea of St. Michael's; and in all stages of its growth, from hanging amidst the dark glossy foliage, green, pale yellow, or a glowing orange red, until packed for the English market, the orange was an object of interest to the travellers. We shall cite one or two passages describing its cultivation:—

March 26.—Accompanied Senhor B—— to several of his orange gardens in the town. Many of the trees in one garden were a hundred years old, still bearing plentifully, a highly-prized thin-skinned orange, full of juice and free from pips. The thinness of the rind of a St. Michael's orange and its freedom from pips, depend on the age of the tree. The young trees, when in full vigour, bear fruit with a thick pulpy rind and an abundance of seeds; but as the vigour of the plant declines the peel becomes thinner, and the seeds gradually diminish in number until they disappear altogether. Thus the oranges that we esteem the most, are the produce of barren trees, and those which we consider the least palatable, come from plants in full vigour.

Our friend was increasing the number of his trees by layers. These usually take root at the end of two years. They are then cut off from the parent stem, and are vigorous young trees four feet high. The process of raising from seed is seldom, if ever, adopted in the Azores, on account of the very slow growth of the trees so raised. Such plants, however, are far less liable to the inroads of a worm which attacks the roots of the trees raised from layers; and frequently proves very destructive to them. The seed or "pip of the acid orange, which we call Seville, with the sweeter kind grafted upon it, is said to produce fruit of the finest flavour. In one small garden eight trees were pointed out which had borne for two successive years a crop of oranges which was sold for thirty pounds. . . . . .

The treatment of orange trees in Fayal differs from that in St. Michael's, where, after they are planted out, they are allowed to grow as they please. In this orange-garden, the branches, by means of strings and pegs fixed in the ground, were strained away from the centre into the shape of a cup, or of the ribs of an open umbrella, turned upside down. This allows the sun to penetrate, exposes the branches to a free circulation of air, and is said to be of use in ripening the fruit. Certain it is that oranges are exported from Fayal several weeks earlier than they are from St Michael's; and, as this cannot be attributed to greater warmth of climate, it may possibly be owing to the plan of spreading the trees to the sun. The same precautions are taken here as in St. Michael's to shield them from the winds: high walls are built round all the gardens, and the trees themselves are planted among rows of fayas, firs, and camphor trees. If it were not for these precautions, the oranges would be blown down in such numbers as to interfere with or swallow up the profits of the gardens; none of the wind-falls, or "ground-fruit," as the merchants here call them, being exported to England.

Gathering and packing the fruit is merry work, according to our authors.

Suddenly we came upon merry groups of men and boys, all busily engaged in packing oranges, in a square and open plot of ground. They were gathered round a goodly pile of the fresh fruit, sitting on heaps of the dry calyx-leaves of the Indian corn, in which each orange is wrapped before it is placed in the boxes. Near these circles of laughing Azoreans, who sat at their work and kept up a continual cross-fire of rapid repartee as they quickly filled the orange cases, were a party of children, whose business it was to prepare the husks for the men, who used them in packing. These youngsters, who were playing at their work like the children of a larger growth that sat by their side, were with much difficulty kept in order by an elderly man, who shook his head and a long stick, whenever they flagged or idled. . . . .

A quantity of the leaves being heaped together near the packers, the operation began. A child handed to a workman who squatted by the heap of fruit, a prepared husk; this was rapidly snatched from the child, wrapped round the orange by an intermediate workman, passed by the feeder to the next, who, (sitting with the chest between his legs,) placed it in the orange-box with amazing rapidity, took a second and a third and a fourth as fast as his hands could move, and the feeders could supply him, until at length the chest was filled to overflowing, and was ready to be nailed up. Two men then handed it to the carpenter, who bent over the orange-chest several thin boards, secured them with a willow band, pressed it with his naked foot as he sawed off the ragged ends of the boards, and finally despatched it to the ass, which stood ready for lading. Two chests were slung across his back, by means of cords crossed in a figure of eight, both were well-secured by straps under his belly, the driver took his goad, pricked his beast, and uttering the never-ending cry "Sackaaio," trudged off to the town.

The orange trees in this garden cover the sides of a glen or ravine, like that of the Dargle, but somewhat less steep: they are of some age, and have lost the stiff clumpy form of the younger trees. Some idea of the rich beauty of the scene may be formed by imagining the trees of the Dargle to be magnificent shrubs loaded with orange-fruit, and mixed with lofty arbutuses:—

> Groves whose rich fruit, burnish'd with golden rind,
> Hung amiable,—and of delicious taste.

In one part, scores of children were scattered among the branches, gathering fruit into small baskets, hallooing, laughing, practically joking, and finally emptying their gatherings into the larger baskets underneath the trees, which, when filled, were slowly borne away to the packing-place, and bowled out upon the great heap. Many large orange-trees on the steep sides of the glen lay on the ground uprooted, either from their load of fruit, the high winds, or the weight of the boys; four, five, and even six of whom will climb the branches at the same time; and as the soil is very light, and the roots are superficial, (and the fall of a tree, perhaps, not unamusing,) down the trees come. They are allowed to lie where they fall; and those which had evidently fallen many years ago were still alive, and bearing good crops. The oranges are not ripe until March or April, nor are they eaten generally by the people here until that time; the boys, however, that pick them, are marked exceptions. The young children of Villa Franca are now almost universally of a yellow tint, as if saturated with orange-juice.

As the import duty is not paid on the quantity of oranges, but levied by the size of the box in which they are packed, the more that can be squeezed into a box the better, however the fruit may be injured.

Above 120,000 large and small chests of oranges were shipped for England in 1839, and 315 boxes of lemons, amounting, in estimated value, to above £115,000. A labourer in the orange gardens earns from sixpence to eightpence a day; but the number of holidays considerably decreases the amount of his yearly wages, and leaves the Azorean peasant not more in the year than the Irish labourer, if so much.

In a visit to the country residence of the American consul, which is in a beautiful and commanding situation in the valley of the Furnas,—i. e. of the Caverns,—the travellers first saw those hot baths which form the great attraction of the valley to visiters and invalids, and to which, considering the nature of the population, great numbers of persons, sick and healthy, are drawn every season. At the distance of many yards, the vapour of the hot springs may be seen ascending to the height of twenty or thirty feet. In some of them the water is soapy or creamy; in others slightly sulphureous. The principal spring is sulphureous.

It bubbles up through a loose bottom of broken rock; and the column of water in the centre, like the small Icelandic Geysers, described by Dr. Henderson, is usually three feet high, gradually lessening towards its edges until it merely ripples and undulates on the margin of the basin.

Suppose a conglomeration of half-a-dozen London New River Company fire-plugs spouting up their water into a large shallow basin, well furred with white stony matter; and then suppose this huge basin set on some enormous hidden fire, and made to boil at a rapid rate, and you will have as good an idea as I can convey to you, of the principal caldeira in this valley. But you will still want the concomitants that give something like sublimity to the boiling caldron of the Furnas. You must possess yourself with a feeling of insecurity,—you must imagine that it is just possible that the crust on which you stand may give way and divulge the hidden force below; for the ground trembles, and a pumping sound, like that of a powerful engine at a distance far below you, is going on with great regularity of movement, impressing you with the conviction that the ebulition on the surface of the ground is only the result of this pumping, and that the power at work beneath your feet, would, if it were not for the vents you see about you, blow up the whole surface on which you stand. So great indeed, formerly, was the fear of the islanders in general, that at one time, none but the natives of the valley came to this place; and it was not until the intelligence and enterprise of the father of the present Vice-Consul of the United States had brought him to the spot, and had thereby gradually weakened the prejudices which the citizens entertained against it, that his example was followed, until at length the Furnas became what it now is, the Baden Baden of the Island of St. Michael.

At a little distance from the principal caldeira is a deep smoking circular pit, in the bottom of which you see water boiling furiously; not, as in the other, running over in any quantity, but continually spouting up, and falling back, to be re-boiled. This has been but twelve months in visible operation. One day a long explosion was heard, and on coming to examine what damage had been done, the villagers found this new caldron: its cover had been violently blown off by the pent-up steam.

Clambering a little further, we came to the entrance of what looked like a deep and dark cave, and from the bottom of this is thrown up and down, without ceasing, boiling mud, of the consistency and colour of the creamy scrapings of Piccadilly.

The ground is hot; every here and there boiling water and hissing steam oose up through holes in the clay, like those made by worms on muddy English shores, and you stand in warm vapour, tainted with sulphureted hydrogen gas.

One of the journalists, probably the Invalid, praises the invigorating qualities of the luxurious bath which he enjoyed, which united pleasures of many kinds. The following description might almost tempt invalids to make the voyage to St. Michael's:—

While bathing, our man cooked eggs for us in one of the small boiling springs, and we afterwards went to the iron-spring for a draught. This flows from a stone spout into a hollow stone basin, and then trickles down a bank into a stream below: it has a strong but not disagreeable iron flavour, effervesces slightly, and is extremely grateful and refreshing. The bath and the spring seemed the two things best suited to the outside and inside of man, on first rising from his bed; natural luxuries when in health, natural remedies when sick;—luxurious without after-pain, remedies without misery in taking them;—both which evils seem to be inseparable from the luxuries and the remedies of our own invention. Most invalids feel that before breakfast existence is burdensome; but this bath and draught of liquid iron were as a breakfast in producing serenity and happiness, and were more than a breakfast in giving warmth and briskness, and a feeling of health as of the flowing of younger blood through the veins; and instead of destroying the power of making another, they rather increased it manifold.

After breakfast, we mounted asses and rode to see more hot springs on the shore of the lake we had passed yesterday. . . . . .

Close by these springs, an English gentleman, a member of the Yacht Squadron, has bought several hundred acres of land, with the intention (it is said) of building a house upon it. . . . . .

The evening was so cold, that we were glad to sit round some blazing logs of wood, and drink to the memory of the old year, in punch, concocted by a master's hand. The lemons were of a very fragrant kind, just picked from the tree. There was a freshness in their acidity, and a youth in their aroma, justifying Schiller's eulogy—

Herb ist des Lebens
Innerster Kern.

The difference between these fresh-gathered lemons and those we get in England, is about as great as that between fresh and bottled gooseberries.

St. Michael's has made rapid advances in comfort within the last twenty years,—or since that blessed era to all the world—the Peace! Then, glass in the windows was a luxury almost unknown; now, the windows of all but the poorest class are glazed; and, though they want many of those things necessary to our English ideas of comfort, chill poverty is unknown among them. The travellers hint, that though the repression of vice was the ostensible motive of Don Pedro for dilapidating the convents and religious houses, he mainly wished, in his necessities, to confiscate their property, and seize their revenues for his own purposes. Yet the lives of the priests are allowed to have been exceedingly dissolute; nor do their morals appear to be much amended by the late sweeping and severe reforms. The nuns of Villa Franca were in so unruly and discreditable a state, that commissioners were sent from Lisbon to search the convent, and to examine the nuns. They took up their abode within the convent one night, and were never more heard of. The story is not vouched for, though the use of the knife and the poison-bowl is not unknown in the Azores. The suppression of the monasteries and religious houses have had the usual distressing effects among the poor, who were partly or wholly supported by them.

There was a gay carnival at Villa Franca while the travellers were there, of which the principal amusement was, persons of all ages squirting and flickering water at each other. A sermon, which was preached at the commencement of Lent, and which appears a very rare event, created as great a sensation in the town as a Camp-meeting in the Back Woods. This Revival was followed by a religious procession. Of these exhibitions, the journalists remark—

To an unaccustomed Protestant eye they are often grotesque and ridiculous; but the people here regard them as very beautiful, and, in general, seem serious and reverential when they pass. And yet even to a Protestant, the scene in the square, where the image of Christ first made its appearance, was striking. The square is a large one, having the church of Misericordia and the adjoining hospital on the western side, and the principal church, with its esplanade and long flight of steps on the north. On these steps, between one and two hundred women, dressed in the indigo cloak of the country, and having their heads tastefully covered with white handkerchiefs, coloured shawls, or dark hoods, quietly knelt in attitudes of prayer. Men behind them, and children, scattered every where, were on their knees, with heads uncovered and their hands clasped before them. In the square below, and on the long steps of the church, with their solemn prayerful faces, all converging to one common centre, the same gay assembly as that on the steps and esplanade knelt in silence. The day was as bright as an unclouded sun could make it; and the stillness at this moment was like midnight. Associating as we do the hum and bustle of confusion with a large assemblage of persons, there is an impressive solemnity in a crowd suddenly motionless and mute. All—from the silver-headed old man to sleek curly-pated boys—waited in reverential attitudes, with a show of mute submissiveness, which impressed me by its apparent sincerity. But the sensation was a transient one; for no sooner had the image disappeared, than instantly the five hundred dumb figures quickly rose, covered their heads with scarlet caps and blue carapucas, and as suddenly resumed their every-day gesticulating gossip; while the crashing church bell once more rung out its clanking jargon, as if to sympathise with nasal jabber in the square underneath.

This is the time for general confession. A woman, who came to-day with her sick child, had just returned from "making a clean breast" in the principal church. She confesses once a year; others confess twice; others three times; and those, she said, who were "very good," four times. I asked her what questions the priest put to her. She laughed, hesitated, and at length said that he enquired whether she was faithful to her husband! what lies she had told in the past twelvemonths! what she had stolen, and of whom! whether she had slandered others! and how often she had cursed and sworn, or called on the "diablo!" All this she told him, I fancy, without mental reservation, and appeared light-hearted and relieved.

Although we are now in Lent, and people above the common sort wear black, small attention seems to be paid to the observance of a fast. A person living in a neighbouring street, on whom we called yesterday, said, in answer to necessary questions concerning her diet, that she ate fish, flesh, fowl, and beans, with rice and wine, for her dinner, (which, in common with the people of her rank, is generally eaten at noon,) and that her breakfast and supper were, as usual, of bread and butter, fried eggs, and coffee.

"But it is Lent! does not Senhora make some little abatement in her diet?"

"Oh! dear, no," was the laughing answer: and then, to save her Catholic reputation with heretics, she added through her interpreter, "At least there is very little difference in what I eat."

Previous to the revolution, when the clergy were powerful, they looked narrowly into the habits of their flocks; and would, we were told by a Portuguese gentleman, have visited with their displeasure any undue excess during Lent; but since the new state of things, the observances are much less rigid; and flesh and wine may now be indulged in during Lent without the same fear of church censures.

The priests, however, are very strict in compelling their flock, at least once a year, to confession: they insist on every individual confessing, until the sins of the whole inhabitants of Villa Franca, from the first untruth of the little child to the premeditated debaucheries of the worn-out roue, are safely locked up in the breasts of the dozen men who form the spiritual fathers of the place. The following specimen is perhaps below the average mark of the insular priesthood:—

In our walks yesterday we were accosted by a slip-shod Friar. His dress did not indicate his order. He wore a dingy linen jacket, reddish-brown fustian trowsers, the extremities of which were tucked into the tops of old Wellington boots, with a hat of high antiquity, now napless and rusty; and his mouldy looking beard, joined with a moist oystery eye, and a nose of intemperate tendency to red, called to mind the Spanish proverb that "there's many an old cloak that covers a good drinker." In his sitting-room were a few books:—a well-used Breviary in four volumes, one or two Latin prayer-books, an almanac, and a Portuguese work on Christian morals. On some of the volumes was an ancient crop of green mould that had flourished for a length of time in perfect peace. A snuff-coloured cloak hung in flabby folds from the same peg with his hat and sea-green umbrella; and below it a gallon flask of wine stood on the floor, with a goodly tumbler to drink it from. It had been made by his own hands from the grapes raised in his own garden, and was the best island-wine I tasted in St. Michael's. He frothed it out from the flagon with a liberal hand, and with the expression of one who loved good wine, "comme fait tout homme de bien." He showed us every thing in his house, from his bacon and wine-casks to the plot of flowers and sweet-herbs in the corner of his garden, and led us even to his bed, spread upon a mat on the floor, which partook of much of the slovenliness and dirt of its owner. Within arm's reach of the pillow was the plainest, and indeed the only proof of our friar's lingering attachment to the church, in the mouth of a London porter bottle, wherein was stuck, until by constant guttering it had glued and buttressed itself to the neck, a stout fragment of one of the solid wax tapers from a neighbouring altar. Although his abode was destitute of comfort or neatness, there was at the same time no indication that the abolition of his order had plunged him into poverty.

He talked of England,—or rather of London, for that was his word for Great Britain; enquired with a sort of incredulous expression,—like Miss Tabitha Bramble when she asked the Scottish lieutenant if his Indian squaw was a Presbyterian,—whether the English believed in Jesus Christ? in the Holy Spirit? in the Conversion of St. Paul? and looked surprised when he was told that they did. He asked if we had confession, and on the reply being made "Yes, to God, not to priests," he took his Breviary, and at once referred to the texts which he considered confirmatory of his views of confession, and of the authority of St. Peter's successor. His knowledge of England was about as extensive as our ignorance of his native place.

Our interview ended in a sturdy attack from the Friar on the unlawfulness of marriage among English clergy, pronounced with amusing gravity; and as the fact could not very well be denied, and he appeared to slight St. Paul's comparative approval of the marriage state, we ventured good-humouredly to remind him of the Catholic Padre in the Square, with his pleasant housekeeper and family of young children; and then left him at his door to digest the discrepancies between the theory and practice of a celibate life with priests of vigorous constitutions.

Dr. Bullar, wherever he went, found plenty of patients, who requited his services with blessings, prayers, and the expression of boundless gratitude. These medical calls gave the travellers an opportunity of seeing the houses of some of the Morgados, which, considering the rank and presumed wealth of the owners, appear much less comfortable than the cottages of the poor. But this privileged class also is improving. One of the patients was a nun, whose state of single blessedness, even after the suppression of her order, was not very deplorable.

Her rooms were ornamented with a multitude of small images of saints, in glass cases and glazed lanterns. Her habits are perhaps a specimen of those of the middle classes here. She rose as early as six, took a very light meal at eight, hardly deserving the name of breakfast, dined at twelve on vegetables, bread, fish or fowl, with wine, supped substantially on the same kind of eatables at eight, and went to bed soon after the evening meal. Since the nuns have been ejected from their convents they have been pensioned by government, and those I have met with seem to be in comfortable circumstances. She was elderly and stout, by no means coming up to the ideal of poetasters and books of beauty.

Provisions are tolerably cheap, though not in great variety, the place of meat being, as in all countries where agriculture is in a backward condition, supplied by poultry. Bread appears dear, but the people in general use Indian corn. Wages, as stated above, are what we consider low.

In January, the weather is represented as like an English October: the mornings and evenings cold, but the days fine. In March the weather had become warm and genial; and in April the journalists began to make long excursions, and to cruise about from one island to another. Their setting out from Villa Franca gives one a favourable idea of the amiable and primitive character of the people.

Thomazia looked sad as she said her last "viva;" her gypsy-faced daughter, with a brown bantling in her arms, taught the child to make its little bow; a group at the bottom of the street waved their hands with their parting "vivas;" several heads bowed and viva'd from as many balconies and doors; the asses clattered over the paved streets, with a sharp iron jingle; the good-tempered nun, from her wooden balcony, gave a cordial good-b'ye, and asked rapidly when we should return; others whom we passed, made like enquiries of our hasty drivers.

The travellers were bound for the town of Ribeira Grande, in the neighbourhood of which there are baths high up in the mountains, in the small crater of an extinct volcano. The baths were at this season a desert solitude, the huts built for the accommodation of the visiters being all shut up. The place seemed dismal enough, until brightened by the appearance of the presiding spirit of the springs—

The merry soul herself, who came laughing and singing into the room, dispersing to the four winds of heaven the whole host of dismals with which the place was peopled. Maria is her name, varied according to circumstances, and her own imagination, into "Maria of the Caldeiras," "the Child of the Mountains," "Maria the Shepherdess," and other such descriptive additions in suitable abundance. She is quite a girl, a lively and excitable being, with olive complexion, quick eyes, dark hair, and fine teeth, dressed after a fashion of her own, in a round straw hat, lined with green silk, a smock frock of printed cotton, (between a petticoat and a shooting jacket,) and across her shoulders she wears a white linen pocket like a gamebag, wherein she carries the keys of the baths and houses of the Caldeiras. She has taught herself to play on a guitar; has an excellent ear, is a wonderful mimic both of French and English; and sang the Marseillaise, as she had heard it from the lips of a fat-throated Englishman, as cleverly as Matthews could have done it. She said that Senhor Some-one had endeavoured to persuade her to go to England, and try her fortune there; but nothing would induce her to leave the Caldeiras, where, with her father, she will spend the remainder of her days. She could say a few words of English; and among them the emphatic sentence which expressed her determination never to leave St. Michael's; "Nao Senhor; me no go bode sheep; nao, Senhor." She is well fitted to be a guide to the beauties of the Caldeiras; and a more willing or more cheerful one it would be difficult to find.

The old father of this lively lass has the charge of these solitary baths, which do not appear nearly so inviting as those of Furnas.

In the voyage to Pico and Fayal in a Portuguese vessel, the travellers saw more of the character of the mixed part of the population of the islands. The town of Horta, (the depot for coal,) appears rather more advanced in exterior civilisation than Ponta Delgrada, the capital of St. Michael's. Between Horta and the island of Pico, constant intercourse is kept up by ferry-boats; but each of the islands retains its own physiognomy and costume, though the manners and customs are in most points almost identical. One of the travellers scaled the lofty peaks of Pico, and he gives a long and rather interesting account of the expedition, which reached even to the extreme edge of the great crater. After dawn on the second day, he and his guides and companions reached this goal, having, on their ascent, lighted a fire on the mountain side, and spent the dark hours in the open air. The view from the lofty cone of Pico was wide and magnificent, taking in many of the distant islands of the archipelago. The height of Pico has been variously estimated at from 6000 to 9000 feet.

In sailing from Horta, the journalists had for fellow-passengers two natives of the island of Corvo, who had been shipwrecked, and were now returning home to their families. When their native island came in sight, these simple-hearted islanders wept with joy. Their wives, children, and friends, who were waiting for them, received the lost men in the same vein of sad joyousness on their landing. Corvo is considered among the poorest of the Azores, and the manners of the people appear much more primitive than in St. Michael's or Fayal. There is truth and force in the following remarks:—

If poverty means the want of shoes, and mirrors, and oranges, and cane-bottomed chairs, certainly the people can boast of none of these. Their dingy clothes, too, which are principally homespun, give them rather an unwealthy appearance. But they are poor only in the sense that the other islanders are poor—in wanting European luxuries. "The man," says Cobbett, "who, by his own and his family's labour, can provide a sufficiency of food and raiment, and a comfortable dwelling-place, is not a poor man." They are a hard-working people, thrown very much on their own resources; rear pigs, poultry, cows, and sheep; grow maize, wheat, potatoes, and flax; weave their own garments, cure their own bacon; and, as we do in England, import their wine. Grapes, in the middle of summer, and abundance of melons, are their luxuries. Shoes they wisely eschew; no shoemaker lives at Corvo; and the priest is the only human being there who submits to such trammels, and his antique buckled shoes were, of course, an importation. American whalers occasionally touch at Corvo for provisions, and, as is usual with ships from England and America, they in no way improve the morality of the people.

The Corvoites seem to be happy, contented, and industrious people, in good condition, strong, and well-looking. They are one large family of 900, with a priest for their father. They all live in one village. The cottages are built of stone, and stand behind low stone walls;—some are roofed with coarse tiles, others are thatched; they have no glass windows, and all are chimneyless. They are built in tiers, one above another on the side of the hill, the lanes between them being narrow, stony, and steep. We walked into the village through a small wicket gate, that swung across the lane to keep the swine from trespassing into the fields.

We passed on to the house of the chief person in the island,—the priest of Corvo,—the Reverendissimo Senhor Joao Ignacio Lopez, Meritissimo Vigario na Ilha do Corvo, &c. (as a friend had written in one of his books,)—a man whose plain, honest, Wedgewood clay is perhaps more happily tempered than the most elaborate specimens of porcelain. His house stands just outside the village, and we found him in the yard before it. He welcomed us as if we had been old friends,—although we brought no letter to him, having heard that it was entirely unnecessary,—shook us heartily by the hand, and begged us to walk into his house, which he said was open to us. All this was done in right sincerity too. The very moment we entered the room, without waiting for us to unpack our own basket of provisions, or to ask or say any thing more than that we should be seated, he took a chair in his hand, mounted it, and from a wooden tray which swung aloft, beyond the reach of mouse or rat, he handed down first one loaf, then another, of a holiday quality, then a cheese, and then another, begging us to eat:—

> And, with blithe air of open fellowship,
> Brought from his cupboard wine and stouter cheer,
> Like one who would be merry.

There were barrels on the floor, and wine-bottles in his cupboard. Wine-glasses he had not, but he filled some goodly tumblers with wine, and pouring the rest into a white jug, drank it off by way of example. He was a bulky man, of about seventy, six feet in height, and somewhat bowed with years. His head was bald, having a few white locks at the sides; his eyes were moist and dim, his features massive, and expressive of quiet contentment; and every man we met with spoke well of the good old man. The boatmen called him "the father of the island," and looked up to him with respect when he spoke to them. The villagers who came into his room, seemed to regard him as the patriarch of the place: they bowed low, and kissed his hand, which he held out for the purpose.

The room in which we sat was lighted by one small window, with two stone seats in its recess. Above was the rough boarding under the tiles; three beds stood in three corners of the room, and, scattered on the floor, were stone jars, heavy chests, barrels, stools, and crockery; while a range of bookshelves, filled with volumes of Portuguese divinity, empty bottles, glasses, white jugs, and cups; and a cupboard well furnished with wine-bottles, glasses, and aged corks, clothed the walls. A twisted glass cup for holy water, and a dusty saint sitting amidst artificial flowers in a large glass lantern, indicated his religion; and his table-drawers stored with certain rare curiosities,—such as lucifer matches, the names of his few visiters, and the one Corvo watch carefully enclosed, first in its own outer case, and afterwards in sundry linen bags, pointed out his riches.

After we had accepted the hospitality of Padre Lopez, and had arranged to sleep at his house, we walked through the village. First we came to the cottage of Maurice, the elder of the two lost men, who, having met us in the way, begged we would come and see his house. It was of one story, with a flight of stone steps outside, leading to the upper room; was well floored and dry, and was divided from the bed-room by a wooden partition, fitted with shelves and drawers, which is in common use in the cottages of Flores and Corvo. At each end of the partition there is an opening, usually covered with a curtain, which leads to the beds behind. There were porter-bottles and a few pieces of white and coloured crockery-ware on the shelves, and a clothes'-chest and a new chair in the room. The place below was a sort of kitchen or outhouse, where the pig came in to feed, and the fowls roosted. In it were an oven for baking bread, a hearth with mouldering wood-embers, five or six sides of well-cured bacon hanging from a beam, hides of oxen on the ground, a large hoe, a few dirty baskets, and the water-tubs.

If this be poverty, would that all the working men of Britain, who ought not to be poor, were but half so well off as Maurice. The Corvoites are a handsome race, darker in complexion than the natives of St. Michael's, but better-featured. The costume of the women is picturesque. Like some of the islands of Shetland, Corvo is, in winter, cut off for months together from all communication with the other islands.

Having visited Flores and a few of the smaller islands, the travellers once more returned to Horta, in Fayal, in order to find a vessel to take them back to St. Michael's. From Ponta Delgada it was their purpose to repair to the baths of the Furnas. During the summer months, they spent their time here much as people usually do at remote mountainous watering-places, though their objects of observation present far greater novelty. As a specimen, we select this sketch:—

June 12.—While waiting for my bath this morning, Da Costa, an old man who attends at the baths, and who, having spent upwards of eighty years of his life in this valley, is still a riser at four o'clock, and green in his old age, gave me some of the gossip of the valley. I forgot to ask him whether he was a branch of the old Portuguese family of that name—the oldest, it is said, in Portugal—which traces in direct lineal descent from Donna Eva da Costo, who according to Portuguese heralds and those who quiz them, took her name from Adam's Costa, or side. Da Costa's gossip, or Pepino's rather, for by reason of a certain prolixity of nose his neighbours have nicknamed him Pepino or Cucumber, and according to the national love for nicknames, he is more frequently called by that name—was about his pastors, who seem neither "to take nor point the way to heaven," but to lead, like the rest of their fraternity in the island, immoral lives. The result of old Pepino's experience was, that generally speaking, there was not so much marrying in the Furnas as when he was a boy; that as for the priests, each one was a Cœlebs in search of a wife, and that the difficulty of finding was not great; that the padre of the village had one wife; but that the curate, like the woman of Samaria, had had many, and she that he then had was not his wife. He spoke lightly of their habits, as if he was not conscious of any impropriety in the priest following the example of his neighbours; could duly distinguish between the man and the office; and took off his carapuca with all politeness to the brawny curate, who shortly afterwards emerged, in heavy cloak and white napkins, from his luxurious warm bath, and mounting his ass, pricked homeward.

The peasants of Furnas are as proud of their valley as the Neapolitans are of their burning mountain: they will fight for its honour, though they do not like to exchange hard blows.

Unless, as we hope and believe, society is pressing on to some higher point than it has ever yet attained, or even soberly dreamed of, one might be tempted to cast a longing look back to those "good old times" when the Church of Rome petted, caressed, and amused the poor of its flock, and while it fleeced them, at least cheated them agreeably,—to cast a longing look to times when the manners of England very nearly resembled those still found existing in such countries as these islands in the Atlantic. There are great evils in the intermediate state. The festival of Whitsuntide is succeeded, at Ponta Delgada, by that of the Holy Ghost, which lasts for seven weeks, and is celebrated in every parish. It is thus described by Dr. Webster of the United States, who has published a very minute account of St. Michael's:—

On each Sunday, during high mass, the priest places a crown of silver on the head, and a sceptre in the hand, of a peasant previously elected by the people. He is proclaimed "Emperador," and is conducted to a seat beneath a canopy, prepared for him on one side of the church, where he sits during the remainder of the service. On leaving the church, the crowd attends him, strewing the road along which he passes with flowers, and, in return, he bestows his blessings upon them by flourishing his consecrated sceptre.

"It is usual for the emperador to have his cottage repaired, painted, and white-washed, if he can afford it, or decorated with branches of myrtle and flowers, to receive the numerous guests who return with him to the church, to dance and sing till late at night. The crown and sceptre are always deposited in the best room in the house, on a salver of silver, and tapers are kept burning about them. The dancing and singing are repeated every Sunday evening. In every parish, there is a rude stone building erected in the most public road, the floor of which is elevated some feet from the ground and an open arch on each side supports the roof. On the last, or seventh Sunday, of this festival, the emperador, early in the morning, takes his seat in this "theatro," as it is called; a table is placed before him, on which are bread and wine, and on his right and left are two or three of his particular friends. He remains here till night, during which time the pious bring offerings of bread, wine, eggs, and poultry, to be blessed by him. A certain portion of these is divided among the donors, and the remainder distributed in the evening to the poor. On the same day the populace elect the emperador for the ensuing year, to whom the crown and sceptre are delivered; he takes them home, and deposits them in a room prepared for their reception. The house of the emperador elect is open every Sunday till the next festival, on which he is publicly crowned and proclaimed; during this time it is the weekly resort of all his friends and acquaintance, who engage in dancing, singing, and various rustic games."

"The consummate worldly wisdom," remarks Mr. Buller, "is unquestionable with which the church of Rome adapts herself to popular habits and manners, however various, making herself all things to all men, so that she may win them. Here all the amusements of the poor are intimately connected with their religion. From one end of the year to another, there is a series of religious processions and observances, embodying, in a rude way enough, the great events in the life of our Saviour, or circumstances, often entirely fabulous, in the history of saints. At one time, every boy is armed with a squirt to celebrate one event, or with a hammer to mark another, and now these dances are going on for a couple of months in remembrance of a third. Similar scenes were once passing in England, the traces alone of which now exist, hidden in a few customs and observances, whose origin is only known to the antiquary. But with all our progress in riches and in science, what recreations are there in the nineteenth century for that large class, the laborious and untaught, who need amusement, and will have some kind or other? There are a few manly games for strong and active young men; and for the rest, fairs and mountebanks, dancers on tight ropes, drinking-booths, stalls of figs and gingerbread, travelling circuses, locomotive theatres, horse racing, with such in-door amusements, as gin-shops, beer-shops, and public-house taps most abundantly supply.

On other festivals, food in considerable quantities and wine is distributed among the poor, under the superintendence of the priests; and not in the sordid and disgusting manner in which a miserable dole is sometimes thrown to the degraded poor of this "highly civilized country," but with every appliance which may conciliate the regard and refine the feelings of the recipients of the boon. The scene is not only as little offensive and humiliating as such distributions can be made, but lively and agreeable. A temporary tabernacle or chapel of canvass was erected in the street, with the usual Popish accessories of tapers and tinsel ornaments.

From each corner of the chapel, which filled the body of the street, two rows of tables stretched down each side of the foot-pavement, a distance of five hundred yards. The tables were planks of deal, resting on empty tubs at equal distances asunder.—In each tub branches of the common yellow broom were stuck; and the planks, as well as the altar, were afterwards covered with white linen cloths.

The table-cloths having been spread, the ceremony of laying the dinner began. The allowance to each person consisted of five loaves, two pounds of raw beef, and a pint of wine, in a bottle of red pottery corked with a bunch of flowers. At the end of the long line of planks, the loaves, meat, and wine were handed out in basketfuls to about thirty basket-bearers. Each basket had two handles, with a man at each handle, who, with large napkins tied round the left arm, marched up the lane between the tables.

The bearers were preceded by two musicians, dressed in coarse flowing gowns of whity-brown serge, with Belcher handkerchiefs of glazed cotton tied tightly over their heads, and hanging down their backs. They much resembled the grotesque calico dressed men, who are occasionally to be seen carrying broad advertisements through the streets of London. One of these banged a crazy drum, and the other shook the empty hoop of a tambourine. In front of the merry-andrew musicians, or huddled with the procession, a languid, knock-kneed youth, dressed like the two musicians, lounged along with a faded crimson banner, on which a dove was embroidered, to represent the "Holy Spirit." The three chanted as they walked, in strong nasal tones, approaching almost to a yell;—

Ass intoned to ass
Harmonic twang! of leather, horn, and brass;
Such as from bellowing lungs the enthusiast blows;
High sounds, attempered to the vocal nose.

When the basket bearers were ready, "the band" struck up, and the procession proceeded at a leisurely pace to walk up the lane in a column. This was repeated until the whole tables were spread.

"In the midst of this scene, it was highly entertaining to see our acting landlord, triton among the minnows. On this occasion, besides a napkin on his arm neatly fringed with lace, he bore a wand of office, in the shape of three feet of sugar-cane, with which he worried all little boys who came within his reach. Did an urchin impertinently peep into the bread-basket, Thomas was ready with his cane; did a child creep under the tables into holy ground,—into the lane set apart for the carriers,—Thomas's eyes immediately spied him. He was evidently the great authority on all the little points of Whitsunday management. He was at the head of the procession, bustling along with mincing steps, turning back to see that the people followed, perspiring, hallooing to some offender in front, patronising some inoffensive being in the crowd, or petrifying turbulent boys."

"Human nature is much the same all over the world," especially human nature in brief authority.

The journalists are candid and charitable in their judgment of the Catholics of the Azores, believing them sincere and undoubting in their faith, whatever its errors may be, and punctual and serious in the observances which it enjoins. "Some Protestants," one of them remarks, "have told me they are formalists. . . . Unhappily any form of religion, even the simplest, may be made formal; and men may rely on doctrines as firmly as on the merest ritual observances."

In the end of July, the Invalid and his companion finally left St. Michael's for Lisbon in a large Portuguese trader. Some of the reflections to which the objects which they saw in this foreign vessel gave rise, carry a deep moral, at the present moment, to those who desire to see England's prosperity increase on the only sure foundation—extended commerce, the free markets of the whole world. The Journal states:—

"I am more impressed with the wealth and resources of England since I left it; but I am less surprised at them. The compass of this Portuguese vessel was made at Wapping; the quadrant in Holborn; the knives are stamped "sheer steel;" the bell for the watch, and the iron of the windlass, are from an English foundry; the captain uses an English watch, and calculates by John Hamilton Moore's "Seaman's complete daily assistant;" "Sailmaker" is stamped on one of the sails, and the passengers are dressed in Manchester prints or Leeds cloth. Every where it is the same; you meet in the solitary mountain paths of these almost unknown islands a pedlar with two square boxes slung on each side of his ass, and see him in the villages tempting the women with the bright handkerchiefs and gay prints from Manchester. In the obscurest village the neat blue-paper needle-case from Birmingham hangs from a string at the cottage door-way, to tell that English needles are sold within; and in crossing in an open boat between two of the remotest islands, Flores and Corvo, an English sailmaker's name and residence were printed legibly on the sail. V—— tells me that the other evening he had just landed in a fishing hamlet,—a lonely place at the mouth of a deep ravine which parts two gloomy mountain ridges,—when his reveries wese disturbed by a fellow-passenger, who having caught sight of some village girls, suddenly exclaimed, 'Look, those are all my prints!'"

Lisbon, Cintra, Mafra, and the other remarkable places in that neighbourhood, are too well known to detain us; nor need we be arrested even by Mr. Beckford's fairy palace of Montserrat, now lying, it is aptly said, "like the broken toy of a spoiled child of fortune." Byron, as a young man, fitly moralised on these ruins, and pointed his moral by a just reflection on the mistaken way in which the possessor had sought happiness: and then "the poet went his way, and in a few years did the same." But if Lisbon and Cintra are become stale and unprofitable, the young Queen of Portugal remains an object of great interest to her allies; and of her we have this passing but satisfactory glimpse:—

"Cintra, Thursday, August 8.—In passing the palace this morning, two small open carriages, drawn by four mules, and preceded by two outriders, drove into the yard, the first of which contained the Queen of Portugal and her husband, Prince Ferdinand of Coburg, who, by the birth of a prince, has acquired the right of being styled King of Portugal; the second, his father and some other relatives, who are visiting the Court. I walked into the court-yard to see the queen alight. No attendants from the palace were waiting for her, but the king gave her his arm up the steps. Before I saw her face, and recognised her as the queen, I thought she was a woman of that age which is so well defined by the three short words, "fat, fair, and forty," but her face, which is both fat and fair, undeceived me, and proved her to be still quite young. Her expression was good-tempered; she was very plainly dressed in an unadorned straw bonnet and light silk pelisse, of becoming colours, and looked quiet but unqueen-like. The king, a tall, graceful young man, with light German hair, healthy juvenile colour, and long legs, reminds you of a prepossessing young Englishman leaving Eton for college. He is said to be very devoted to his queen, and to mix but little with the Portuguese nobles. There was nothing in the carriages, mules, attendants, or principal personages, which marked their rank; every thing was plain, private, and slovenly; and I am told that it is the habit of the queen to omit ceremony, and to be much seen. Is this wise in the present day? That was a safe reply of a Spanish minister to the king.—"Omit, this affair; it is but a ceremony." "A ceremony! why, Sire, you are yourself a ceremony."

The travellers, after visiting Mafra, and witnessing a bull-fight, which, as here described, must be a very exciting spectacle, came to London by steam. In an Appendix, the adaptation of the climate of St. Michael's for invalids, and especially for those labouring under incipient pulmonary affections, is fully discussed. There is also a complete analysis of the waters of the hot-baths of the Furnas, with many useful observations, and information valuable to persons who mean to visit the Azores. These islands are not unlikely, we imagine, to obtain, even through the agency of these volumes, an accession of visiters, English and American. In this Appendix, we prize above every thing, the sensible remarks on the thoughtless or selfish cruelty, so often practised, of sending abroad individuals, far gone in consumption, to suffer, pine, and die in exile; by this means not only hastening their days, but subjecting them to discomfort, suffering, and privation, which persons in robust health could not easily encounter. In the early stages of consumption, judicious change of climate, a long voyage, and a protracted residence in a favourable locality may be of much advantage; but as to ten in every twenty of those sent away—in the name of common sense and common humanity, suffer the doomed victims to die at home in peace!

We now take leave of this lively and agreeable narrative, grateful to the intelligent authors for the information and entertainment they have afforded to us, and all who love leisurely to enjoy some of the best pleasures of foreign travel by their own snug firesides. Such travellers bring us the best foreign luxuries procurable. In extending our knowledge of our kind, they enlarge our love and charity.

THE QUIET CELL.

BY MAJOR CALDER CAMPBELL.

I FILL my quiet cell
With shapes of beauty bright,
Scenes fair, and inaccessible
To such as fix the dazzled sight
On all the whirling wheels of life,
Its canker'd cares and selfish strife!

I wear not here the mask
The curious world requires—
My energies I do not task
To ape the artificial fires,
The smiles, deceptions, guileful speech,
Which custom and the crowd will teach.

I summon from the past,
The fairest and the best,
The virgin pure, the matron chaste,
The patriot spurning his own rest
His country's weal t' ensure—the brave
Who knows to slay, yet dares to save!

The martyr who hath borne
Unflinchingly each pain,
The fire, the fetters, and the scorn,
And all to shake his faith in vain.
For why? His Saviour filled his breast
With strength to bear each cruel test!

The martyr in his cell,
Triumphant, bright, I see;
Freed from the pains ineffable,
Freed from the scourge, the cord, the TREE,
And crowned with glory, radiant now,
With "Angel" written on his brow.

Bright visitants are mine,
Forms of the lost and dead,
Whose eyes with wonted kindness shine,
With all to love and nought to dread:
And voices birdlike in the breeze,
Murmur celestial melodies!

But sudden as the wind
Over the bending trees,
A thought of dust—a touch unkind
Of man's—of earth's impurities,
Destroys the imagery of peace,
And fancy's fairy labours cease.

They flit, they fade away,
Chased in the worldly war
Of common cares; they fall the prey
Of sins and strifes; and flee afar,
As down doth from the thistle run,
When kissed too hotly by the sun!

Oh! for a home of rest!
Oh! for a spirit pure!
Oh! for the quiet of a breast
By sorrow cleansed—from sin secure!
Oh! that release from one sad thought were given:
A shadow, stalking 'twixt my soul and Heaven!

Notes on the United States. By the Right Hon. Sir Augustus J. Foster, Bart. London, 1841. (Unpublished.)

Sir Augustus Foster was Secretary to our Legation at Washington (the late Mr. Merry being then Minister) in the years 1804-5-6. After serving at the Court of Sweden and elsewhere, he returned to America as Envoy in 1811, and finally quitted it on the declaration of war in the following year. Since that time he has been almost constantly employed in his profession, and held till very recently the post of English Minister at Turin.

When Mr. Rush published his "Narrative of a Residence at the Court of St. James's," we could but express our apprehension that the example, notwithstanding his good intentions, candour, and real liberality of feeling, might be found to constitute a dangerous precedent. Were it to become at all a practice among gentlemen of the diplomatic order—more especially Ambassadors and Envoys—to publish descriptive sketches of the society thrown open to them shortly before in foreign countries, by reason solely, or chiefly, of their official character, it is certain that the personal privileges of their class would, ere long, be sensibly abridged; and there are graver considerations so obvious that it would be idle to point them out. We do not see, however, that the objection applies to such a performance as that now before us—even if it were to assume the character of a regular publication. Since Sir Augustus Foster last quitted the American shores nearly thirty years have elapsed;—of the public men with whom he mingled at Washington all have long since disappeared;—at least we do not remember to have met in his pages with more than one living name—that of the octogenarian Mr. Gallatin—and of him he has really nothing but the name. As to other matters, thirty years in the United States have been equivalent probably to a hundred in the case of any older nation:—where he left small towns, villages, even single loghouse taverns in the wilderness, mighty cities are now flourishing and daily extending. New States have been added to the Union. Many modifications have occurred in the constitutions both of states separately, and of the federal empire. Laws have been largely changed—the administration of them even more largely. Above all, the influences of laws and institutions which were young in his time, have been developed in social alterations, of which Sir Augustus could have formed but a vague and uncertain anticipation. No country, no people, no system of civilised life, have ever undergone more extensive changes in so brief a period. Under such circumstances the veteran diplomatist may produce his recollections and reflections without almost the slightest risk of wounding any personal feelings—without much chance, we must add, of ministering to vulgar curiosity. His Notes are now merely historical. Moreover, the Lives, Diaries, and Correspondence (public and private) of the most eminent American statesmen of the cycle to which these notes refer, have been printed and published; and since the world has had in this way such copious access to American criticism on the ministers and courtiers of England during her great conflict with revolutionary France, it seems but fair that we should be admitted to some of the results of similar opportunities afforded to Englishmen of rank and station in the America of the same epoch.

These "Notes" would possess a strictly historical interest for our Transatlantic friends themselves. Sir Augustus describes a period of their national existence as to which thinking Americans of the active generation must have a very peculiar degree of curiosity:—though it has not, in as far as we know, been either boldly or skilfully treated of in any department of their literature. It is the epoch of transition;—and in truth, when we consider how perseveringly and how successfully the contemporary novelists and dramatists of France have dealt with the social metamorphoses consequent upon their revolution, we are not a little surprised with this American neglect of scarcely less picturesque materials. It furnishes, we think, by far the most striking proof of their often alleged thin-skinnedness, that their best writers shrink from what they can hardly fail to regard as the richest field within their reach—that this should in fact scarcely have been touched upon except by equally coarse and weak daubings of flattery. Strange that a nation piquing themselves on nothing so much as their shrewdness, should be so conspicuously open to the grossest tricks of venal adulation. "Fulsome compliments," as Johnson said to Sir Joshua, "gratify nobody but a fool: they always disgust the wise, who, knowing them to be false, suspect them to be hypocritical."

Sir Augustus, in his very modest preface, expresses much regret that the views of American society put forth by several recent English travellers should have been so hastily drawn and so harshly coloured; he does not exactly impeach the veracity of any one of these writers—among whom he considers Mrs. Butler as the ablest, and also, on the whole, as the least unfair—but he asserts his belief that such of them as really had access to the better circles were either unfitted by age and experience for comparing different systems of manners in a just spirit;—or carried with them a narrow rancour of political prejudice which discoloured objects in themselves harmless—or else an overweening vanity which construed ignorance or inappreciation of probably absurd pretensions into deliberate contempt and insult;—or, finally, proceeding to the New World in the bitterness of disappointment, had failed in some object of personal interest or ambition which the journey was meant to serve—for Menander's adage is not more true than its converse:—

Δύναται τὸ πλουτεῖν καὶ φιλανθρώπους ποιεῖν.

Sir Augustus notices also the effects of partial observation:—the state of things in one district being applied to another, as different from it perhaps as Holland is from England, or Russia from Prussia; but this and various other sources of mistake and misrepresentation have been sufficiently dwelt on by ourselves upon former occasions.

Our readers cannot suppose that we should think ourselves entitled to criticise these unpublished "Notes" as a literary performance. Under the circumstances, censure and praise would be alike out of place—the latter probably more offensive than the former to Sir Augustus Foster. We proceed very willingly, however, to do all that seems to lie within our legitimate scope in such a case—namely, to select a few of those passages with which we have ourselves happened to be most pleased and interested.

As might be expected, a large proportion of his pages is given to the city and official life of Washington. The government of the United States fixed its head-quarters on this spot about the beginning of the century; and for some time afterwards, as the Spanish Envoy De Casa Yrujo told Sir Augustus, it was difficult to produce a decent dinner in the new capital without sending 50 or 60 miles for its materials. Things had mended somewhat before the writer's arrival, but still he found enough to surprise and bewilder him in the desolate vastness and mean accommodations of the unshaped metropolis. He attributes the selection of the locality, partly at least, to General Washington's partiality for the neighbourhood of his own paternal property; but seems to think the inconveniences attending such a choice would have, ere long, produced a removal to some already large and well supplied city near the Atlantic, but for certain considerations of a personal and not very dignified nature, which were of paramount importance with Mr. Jefferson, who was for the second time President when Sir Augustus first reached America. He says that "the richer and more respectable members of Congress had, for the most part, always inclined" to vote for returning to Philadelphia, or selecting some other town of established importance; but that every such proposal had been distasteful to the majority, it "being in a great measure composed of rough and unfashioned persons, to whom it is of consequence to be in a place where they would be attended to more than in a large city." This majority had usually found support in the government, "so long composed of Virginians, who naturally preferred Washington to any remoter situation;" but the removal could hardly, he apprehends, have been avoided, but for the determined personal opposition of Jefferson. This President alleged as his reason the danger of throwing open again a question so difficult and delicate as that of the choice of the seat of government—

'In fact, however,' says Sir A. Foster, 'his power was founded on the court he paid to the democratical party; and he could not have appeared in a great town, as he did in Washington, without attendants, when he took a ride, and, fastening his horse's bridle himself to a shop door, as I have once witnessed, when his nail was torn off in the operation, or in yarn stockings and slippers when he received company; neither could he any where else have had the members of the legislature so dependent upon him and the rest of the administration for the little amusement and relief which they could obtain after public business; his house and those of the Ministers being in fact almost necessary to them, unless they chose to live like bears, brutalised and stupified—as one of the Federalists once confessod to me that he felt—from hearing nothing but politics from morning to night, and from continual confinement without any relaxation whatsoever. Mr. Jefferson knew too well what he was about—he had lived in too good society at Paris, where he was employed as Minister from the United States previously to the French revolution, and where he had been admitted to the coteries of Madame du Deffand—not to set a value on the decencies and proprieties of life; but he was playing a game for retaining the highest office in a State where manners are not a prevailing feature in the great mass of the society, being, except in the large towns, rather despised as a mark of effeminacy by the majority, who seem to glory in being only thought men of bold strong minds and good sound judgment.

'Having mentioned Mr. Jefferson, it may be interesting to the reader to have the following description of his person as he appeared to me on my arrival in 1804: he was a tall man with a very red freckled face and gray neglected hair; his manners good-natured, frank, and rather friendly, though he had somewhat of a cynical expression of countenance. He wore a blue coat, a thick gray-coloured hairy waistcoat, with a red under-waistcoat lapped over it, green velveteen breeches with pearl buttons, yarn stockings, and slippers down at the heels; his appearance being very much like that of a tall large-boned farmer. He said he washed his feet as often as he did his hands in order to keep off cold, and appeared to think himself unique in so doing. . . . . Mr. Jefferson's father was a land-surveyor, who lived some time in Pennsylvania, and from thence went to establish himself at Monticello in Virginia, where land was cheap, and where he bought an estate for 100 guineas, but I could meet nobody who could tell me from what country he originally came or could trace him to his early years.'

Since Sir Augustus penned this 'note,' Jefferson's Memoir of his own early life has been published: he there traces his pedigree back to a grandfather, 'said to have been born near Snowdon in Wales,' and states that his father, whose profession he sinks, left him the lands of Shadwell, 'on which,' he says, 'I now live.' Monticello, therefore, was probably a name of his own devising for the porticoed villa which in due season replaced the paternal log-house.*

The president's official mansion at Washington was erected, it seems, by an Irish mason, who gave the plan of the Duke of Leinster's house in Dublin, on which he had been employed as a journeyman; omitting however the upper story, and forgetting the cellars—which last defect Jefferson remedied, though his predecessor took no notice of it. Sir Augustus says all the private houses in Washington were built by Irishmen or Scotchmen of the same class, and were equally slavish repetitions after Edinburgh or Dublin, not the least attention having been paid to the difference of climate. But it is to be hoped these edifices were not meant for a longer duration than those of the Crescents at Brighton, or our own fine lath and plaster in Regent street and Regent's park. Sir Augustus has lived too much in Italy not to be a connoisseur in architecture, and in censuring a universal fault in the Washington porticoes—that of the pillars being raised on plinths—he observes that it is the same with almost all the public buildings lately erected in London, except those of Mr. Decimus Burton, and that the fact of all classical antiquity being against this was disputed by Sir Geoffrey Wyattville and other English architects until he produced his authorities. We are not aware whether Mr. D. Burton designed the school house at St. Paul's, or Authur's Club-house in St. James's street —neither of which elegant buildings has the defect in question. Sir Augustus does not leave the public edifices at Washington without expressing his deep regret that any of them should have been destroyed by our army in 1812. He censures this as a violence for which there was no sufficient apology, and which, as he most justly says, could never have been desired or even contemplated by the authorities at home. We share fully in Sir Augustus Foster's regrets—but surely he cannot have read Mr. Gleig's admirable 'Narrative' of the campaign, or indeed any fair account of the properly military part of this particular procedure. There can be no doubt that the conflagration and destruction were caused by the wanton firing from those buildings on our troops after the city had been surrendered. We have heard the fact honestly admitted over and over again by American gentlemen here—though perhaps it is not the fashion to be so candid on the other side of the water coram populo, i. e., in newspapers or speeches.

* Since we have turned to this Memoir, we may observe that Jefferson, while a young law student, heard Patrick Henry's great speech against the Stamp Act in 1765. 'His talents as a popular orator were,' he says, 'great indeed; they were such as I never heard in any other man. He seemed to me to speak as Homer wrote.'

Sir Augustus says, 'Very few private gentlemen have houses in Washington. I only recollect three; Mr. Brent, Mr. Tayloe,* and Mr. Caroll.' He enumerates, however, several country seats within an easy distance, where there was abundant and even elegant hospitality; particularly those of Mr. Key, an eminent lawyer, originally an officer in the English service, Mr. Calvert, Mr. Ogle, and Mr. Lewis. Nevertheless, the life of diplomatic residents at Washington seems to have been in those days of the dullest—not so often enlivened by any pleasant occurrence, as by some new specimen of deliberate rudeness on the part of the ruling powers.

'They were but ill off when I first arrived, which was about four years from the time when Congress took up its residence, or rather squatted, upon this waste—being put to it to get even ordinary provisions, and having to send as far as Baltimore for the commonest articles of luxury; but what was more intolerable was the treatment they received at this raw and rude court, which exasperated them in their turn and led to perpetual jarring and quarrelling, being far different from what they had a right to look for, considering the respectability that had surrounded General Washington and the elder Adams, but particularly the former, whose example, considering his known good sense and the great services he had performed, might have been expected to serve as a rule to his successors, if not as far as regarded the hoops and full dresses introduced into his drawing-rooms, in imitation of the court of St. James's, at least in as far as depended upon gentlemanly bearing and that outward decorum that should be found in the social assemblies of the first magistrate of a great and cultivated nation. Mr. Jefferson too, being a Virginian, and, consequently, born an aristocrat, having besides lived in the best society in Paris, and long enough to see it give place to a disgusting democracy, might have been expected to have gone rather into the opposite extreme: but excessive vanity and speculative doctrines on imaginary perfection, together with the love of popularity and paradox, as also of running counter, since he could not run parallel, to Washington, were his weakness —and to indulge them he flattered the low passions of a mere newspaper-taught rabble, and seemed pleased to mortify men of rank and station, foreign or domestic, unless they paid him servile court, or chimed in with his ideas on general philanthropy.'

Jefferson himself says, in a letter of 1808 (Writings, vol. iv. p. 109,) 'I came to the government under circumstances calculated to generate peculiar acrimony. I found all its offices in the possession of a political sect, who wished to transform it ultimately into the shape of their darling model, the English government,' &c. &c. This 'political sect' was that of which Washington and the elder Adams were the acknowledged heads!

The first foreign minister who suffered under the new system was the Danish Envoy, M. Petersen—the one who suffered most was the Spaniard—but the English had their share.

'The President took care to show his preference of the Indian deputies on New Year's Day, by giving us only a bow, while with them he entered into a long conversation. I have now to speak of his change in the established rules of politeness, or even hospitality, as practised all over the globe on the occasion of a first entertainment given to a foreign envoy—to whom even savages would naturally endeavour to make the entertainment agreeable. I conclude Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison were too much of the gentleman not to feel ashamed of what they were doing, and consequently did it awkwardly, as people must do who affect bad manners for a particular object. I allude to the sudden alteration in the etiquette heretofore practised by General Washington and Mr. Adams on dinner being announced. Mr. and Mrs. Merry were so thoroughly unaware of this intention that they had not had time to think of what they should do on the occasion, and Mr. Jefferson had not requested any one present to look to the strangers; so, when he took to dinner the lady next him, Mr. Madison followed his example, and the Senators and members of the House of Representatives walked off with their respective dames—leaving the astonished Merry—(who was of the old school, having passed a great part of his life at Madrid)—gazing after them, till at last he made common cause with his better half: offering her his arm with a formal air, and giving a hint to one of the servants to send for his carriage, he took her to table and sat by her,—the half-ashamed and half-awkward President not even attempting an excuse. And this same scene was for consistency's sake repeated nearly in the same manner at the house of the Secretary of State. Ever afterwards Mr. Merry refused their invitations; messages were sent to beg he would dine with the President as Mr. Merry, putting aside his quality of British minister; but this he could not well do without, as he thought, sanctioning in some sort their previous treatment of the representative of Great Britain, as long as no apology was offered for the past: so he never met his Excellency any more at table, since the President, unlike our social monarchs of the north, keeps his state—neither he nor his wife accepting of invitations. Another mortification Mr. Merry had to submit to was the suppression of the privilege of a chair in the Senate on the right of the Vice-President, which had hitherto been enjoyed by foreign ministers—the question having been debated in the Senate and carried against him by a large majority.

'I am inclined to believe the object of these changes was to induce European courts to send out ambassadors and men of high rank, by treating envoys so ill—for they occasionally complained of the rank of the diplomatic agents not being sufficiently high in their own countries, and Mr. Madison took an opportunity of telling Mr. Merry that an ambassador would be treated with every distinction, but that an envoy could not expect any more favour in society than a private person: they had a particular fancy, too, to have a peer of the realm sent out to them, and were much disappointed when Lord Selkirk and Lord William Bentinck declined the honour.'

'The above questions of etiquette, it is true, were but of little real importance; nevertheless they occupied the thoughts of the republicans a great deal more than they need have done, and were consequently a source of considerable annoyance at the time to the mission, because some of the most vulgar of the democratic party took their cue from the style adopted at the great house, and in one way or other, either by remarking on her dress or diamonds, or treading on her gown, worried Mrs. Merry to such a degree that I have sometimes seen her on coming home burst into tears at having to live at such a place—particularly on seeing the affected unpoliteness of those who should have known better, but who, being ratters from the federal party, seeking for favour and place, made use of her assemblies in order to render their boorish humours, as well as their concurrence with the systematic manners of Mr. Jefferson, more conspicuous. Among these was one, of a stern, sour, and republican countenance, who had been used to the best society, but who purposely came to her parties in dirty boots, disordered hair, and quite the reverse of what he knew to be the fashion in European capitals. This was certainly difficult for a lady to digest; but I must be just, and add, that I found among the democrats many highly respectable and worthy persons, and even among the lowest in station of the members of Congress several droll, original, but unoffending characters. Such was the tavern-keeper who committed an act of great impropriety in my house, when I gave a ball for the Queen's birthday, and when, the drawing-rooms being left empty on the company going to supper, he thought (poor fellow!) that he was alone and unobserved; but two stray federal members who were rambling about espied his attitude, and the joke was too good to be lost, so they had it in all the papers and all over the States in prose and verse, ringing the changes on the extinction of the British fire. My poor guest wrote me an humble letter, saying he would rather burst another time; and I most graciously answered, and hoped to have gained his vote for peace by my soothing; but the graceless dog voted all the same for war, and proved how hard it is by any good words to sever a party-man from the mass of his political friends.

'Another original was a Philadelphian butcher, who used to frank his linen, there having been no limits to the privilege, and to send it to be washed at home; the weight, however, as some of the federalists assured me, was not so tremendous as might be supposed for the post-bag, since he was known to change his shirt only once a-week. I visited him at his stall at Philadelphia, and insisted on his giving me a feast on his beef, to which he agreed; and I, profiting by a general invitation, went to his home on the banks of the Delaware, where I really did get a luncheon of as fine beef as I ever tasted, and had only one regret, which was that my honest host happened to be absent. It was told of him that at the President's table, observing a leg of mutton of a miserably lean description, he could not help forgetting the legislator for a few moments, and exclaiming that at his stall no such leg of mutton should ever have found a place. I also heard that, being one day invited with several members of Congress to dine at the President's, he took his son, the young butcher, with him, who was a great country lout, and on going up to the President told him he had heard one of his guests had been taken ill and could not come, and therefore he had brought his son with him, who was very anxious to see him, and would not be in the way, as there was, he knew, a spare plate.

'Another eccentric member from the south, a printer and publisher, wrote as an answer to an invitation from the President, "I won't dine with you because you won't dine with me." Then there was a tavern-keeper from the north, who, when elected sheriff in his own county, used to hang criminals himself, to save a dollar, and make his son drive the cart; yet was he by no means an ill-meaning or uncivil person, though not particularly agreeable. Of Irish members of Congress there were no less than ten, and their voices, I am sorry to say, were in general against their mother country. I asked them to dinner occasionally, but was obliged to sort them with a particular set to avoid duels. One of the Irish used to ask me for news from Bounos Eares, and tell me of the columnious reports of the Secretary-at-War. We were, however, always on good terms, and they had not forgotten how to relish a glass of good wine. —As to the higher democrats, I was on the best terms with many of them, and they were, in point of fact and in habits, much more aristocratic than perhaps any of the federal party; some indeed had quitted or were about to quit the camp, for the very reason that they did not and could not approve the vulgarity, real or affected, of the men in power, and their consequent sympathy with the Jacobin upstarts of France: of these, one, Mr. Randolph, was particularly distinguished by pride of birth, being a descendant of a respectable old English family and a native Virginian princess, and he was as honourable and gentlemanlike a person as could be, and one whose slaves were by all accounts so much attached to him that they would not hear of being made free.

The foreign legation which 'seemed to be on the best terms with the Americans' was the Russian; for, 'strange to say, they have always had a leaning of affection to the most absolute of all governments, and have been publicly as well as individually assiduous in courting the good graces of the autocrat.' Sir Augustus mentions how surprised the Emperor Nicholas was when the celebrated John Randolph of Roanoke (the same eulogised above) dropped on his knees to present his credentials as envoy at St. Petersburg. This was but lately. Sir Augustus says his informant had the story from the Emperor's own lips. It is quite in harmony with the American ambition for having lord ambassadors at Washington, and also with all we have heard of the behaviour of our Jonathanising patriot Lord Durham, when his friends here, to get him out of their own way, sent him ambassador to Russia.

Buonaparte's minister was the General Turreau, famous for his Vendéan brutalities—a dignitary whose conduct and manners could not shock even the Irish rebels or butchers and hangmen-sheriffs of Congress by any contrast of refinement. The ruffian's wife was a jailer's daughter, who had favoured his escape from prison upon some occasion; and he had a secretary whose only accomplishment, that of playing on the violincello, was called into daily requisition, for the purpose of drowning the poor woman's cries while the representative of the great Napoleon was horsewhipping her; until the popular feeling was so roused on her behalf that a magistrate, with his posse comitatus, ventured 'to violate the sacredness of a diplomatic residence, and, forcing open the door, obliged this Bluebeard to let out his wife, and even to subscribe a paper by which he agreed to give her a separate allowance, which, however, was never paid.' She was during the brief sequel of her life reduced to great straits; and even the gentlemen of our legation had to subscribe for her relief. None of them ever saw her tyrant in society, the First Consul having, among other 'gentlemanly novelties,' ordered his minister not to meet the British envoy 'unless it should be at the President's house.'

The arrival of some foreigner of distinction gave variety now and then to their society, 'which was always, in some degree, like that of a bathing-place, being composed almost entirely of strangers to the spot, scattered about in single houses, here and there.' Among those who most excited his curiosity, Sir Augustus mentions Miranda, about whom neither we nor our readers care much; an audacious impostor, who called himself Count de Crillon, and once figured for a time in London; Count Andremi; General and Madame Moreau; and Jerome Buonaparte. Jerome had, not long before (1803), married Miss Patterson, after being, it would seem, the object of a highly flattering competition among the fair democrats of Baltimore:—

'The moment he arrived he had to defend his heart against some very warm attacks. A young lady whom we met on a visit, having invited him to a ball to be given at a house where he was not acquainted, and moreover having with unsophisticated simplicity proposed to go with him there in his own carriage, he took, or was supposed to have taken, on the way, liberties which afterwards necessitated an explanation; though other ladies would have it that his only fault was in not having proposed marriage. However that may have been, three challenges were sent to him, one of them from an Irish gentleman who insisted on instant satisfaction or an apology. Jerome very sensibly observed that a duel would not settle any thing about a lady's reputation, and that he was perfectly ready to affirm that he had not meant to offend her: the whole was a mistake, he said, that had arisen from his own corrupt European education and the simplicity of American female manners; alleging that at Paris a young lady who would go alone with a gentleman in his carriage will very rarely complain of the latter's attempting to embrace her; but in America it was otherwise, as he now saw, and he owned the superiority of American virtue, which could admit of such close contact between young people without causing the least alarm or any slur upon the innocence of the lady. Had he been longer in the country, he might have known that it is no uncommon practice, even at Philadelphia, to leave young persons, supposed to be attached to each other, together as long as they like after supper, the father and mother going to bed; but then there is always the duel at hand with the brother or some officious friend, in case the intimacy should not end in matrimony. He might also have known that in some districts there is a custom called bundling, which I am told exists also among the Swiss, and it is even added among the Welsh,* and is admitted by the parents of young girls, though it does not always, or unless consequences are apparent, end in marriage.

'I saw M. Jerome at Washington, at a party at Mrs. Smith's wife of the then secretary of the navy, and thought him a well-mannered young man. His brother Napoleon did not at all approve of his marrying Miss Patterson, and, not content with declaring the act null and void according to the laws of France,† endeavoured as much as he could to invalidate it in the United States, for which purpose he wished to induce her to take another husband:—no less a person than General Turreau, his minister plenipotentiary, who used all his eloquence to persuade her, proposing it as "une affaire de convenance," and urging that it was a shame she should vegetate in such a country, whereas at Paris she would shine in the first circles, and he would be created a Baron of the Empire. A condition nevertheless was added, viz. that her son should be separated from her. Madame Jerome, however, as was very generally reported, would not hear of his proposals; and no wonder if she rejected them with indignation, both as coming from such a man, whose conduct to his late wife was supposed to have occasioned her death, and out of consideration for what she owed to her own character, as well as to the interests of her child. The most singular part of Napoleon's conduct in this affair was his apparent disposition, while he was annulling the marriage of his brother with an American lady, to take advantage of his own family connexion by blood with her son; for soon afterwards, though this humour lasted but for a short period, an officer of the rank of colonel, a M. Toussard, was appointed guardian to the infant, and there were, as I have been assured, regular drawing-rooms at Madame Jerome's residence at Philadelphia, on which occasions the colonel would receive visiters in the ante-room, and present both ladies and gentlemen, the boy being styled prince, and his mother doing the honours. She then thought, no doubt, that Buonaparte would relent, and, as I have heard, expected to be created Duchess of Oldenburgh. It is not improbable that he might have entertained some such vague intention, at that time, of making use of the boy in his Spanish intrigues, from seeing him, as it were, made to his hand on the American continent; or, as he was then in the zenith of his glory, and intoxicated with the prospect of destroying all opposition to his power in the Old World, may he not, in conformity with his well-known exclamation, "cette vieille Europe m'ennuye," have conceived some gigantic plan for North America—which, along with other visionary projects, he was never allowed to ripen, and such as it would now appear too ridiculous to mention, but which there might have been political gamblers enough to second even in the United States, where there are, at all times, plenty of young adventurers ready to set law at defiance and to invade their neighbours' rights, careless of the consequences? What is certain is, that I have been assured the populace applauded most vociferously when Madame Buonaparte appeared for the first time at the theatre of Philadelphia with her child upon her lap.'

* There is no doubt of the prevalence of this custom in Wales; and every reader of Burns knows that one very similar is, or lately was, a common feature of rural life in Scotland.

It was during his second residence at Washington that Sir Augustus encountered Moreau. The General's appearance disappointed our author, who had, we suppose, expected something heroic. His conversation with the English minister seems to have been frank enough. He abused Buonaparte on all occasions as a 'heartless charlatan,' and even doubted his physical courage, 'though he allowed him courage of the head.' He spoke contemptuously of Marmont's abilities—not much better of Massena's—and indeed did not appear to have a very high opinion of any of Napoleon's lieutenants except Soult,—an opinion in which all the world now concur, but the expression of which in those days does credit to Moreau's sagacity.

Discussing in 1811 the probabilities of a French march upon the Russian dominions, Moreau said that Barclay de Tolly was a chief quite capable of conducting their defence successfully—and repeatedly laid down that the only plan would be to retreat perseveringly until the invaders should be separated by a vast desolation of snow and wilderness from their supplies. All this is curious, considering the date; for we believe it is not doubtful that the battles fought between the frontiers and Moscow were all in opposition to Marshal de Tolly's opinion.

Neither Moreau nor his wife at all relished the American society. The lady was a thorough-bred royalist, and moreover, extravagantly addicted to music and dancing, which she could not dispense with even on a Sunday evening. The General was tortured with 'the eternal questioning;' and by-and-by retreated to a villa where he had only one constant companion, a patient brother-angler, and of course brother-smoker, who could not speak one word of French, so that their only communication was in dumb show.

He told Sir Augustus, 'with some complacency,' of his answer to a lady who had asked him if they had any bridges in France as fine as that over the Schuylkill: 'Oui, madame; mais nous les faisons en pierre, pour qu'ils durent plus longtemps;' and repeated a saying of Talleyrand, 'that he could not bear America, because it was a country where a man would sell his favourite dog;' of which mot, however, our author doubts the parentage, and says at all events it is quite inapplicable to the 'old settled districts, where the people are fond of field-sports.'

'One was surprised to find a man of Moreau's rank and illustration using the very improper word, by way of oath or exclamation, which was common to all the lower orders of France, civil or military; but I conclude that he had acquired the bad habit during his campaigns, and afterwards found himself unable to get rid of it: however that may be, I never knew a foreigner, gentle or simple, who used it more repeatedly; every three or four sentences out it would come. But I must observe that I have many years ago heard even colonels' wives use it in France, and that, no sense being apparently attached to the sound, it must be classed with so many other dirty things that one has to shut one's eyes as well as one's ears to in travelling, as if they were neither heard nor seen; and the calling one's attention to which would be of itself an impropriety as great, if not greater, than the original sin.

'The English cavalry Moreau considered as very powerful in charging; but he observed that they had great difficulty in recovering themselves, on account of the fiery spirit of their horses; and he told me that on one occasion, in the year 1794, seeing the 8th light dragoons advancing upon him at a tremendous pace, he ordered a regiment to fall back among the hedges and fences, and to fire in among them while they were recovering, by which manœuvre they were nearly exterminated.

'Moreau assured me that there did not exist a single French regiment in Holland at the time when the British forces under Lord Chatham disembarked, and that they had to order troops from as far as Strasburgh to oppose him, being a distance of about 150 leagues. These troops, however, he said, did arrive before the English army had advanced twenty leagues. Had he been the commander of our Walcheren expedition, he maintained that he could have gone with Lord Chatham's army to Paris and back again, and that there was time enough for it before sufficient means of resistance could be organised.—At Antwerp there were no regular troops; but, because the burghers turned out in uniform on the walls, the English general supposed it contained a numerous garrison; and after such proofs of incapacity in the commander, Moreau observed that it was fortunate he escaped at all, although wherever the navy could assist him he was of course secure.'

Dull as Washington appeared to Sir Augustus on his first arrival, he speaks more favourably of it after he had visited other parts of the union. He then says, 'in spite of its inconveniences and desolate aspect, it was, I think, the most agreeable town to reside in for any length of time.' The opportunity of collecting information from senators and representatives belonging to all parts of the country—the hospitality of the heads of the government—and the corps diplomatique of itself—supplied resources such as could nowhere else be looked for:—

'Most of the members of the Congress, it is true, keep to their lodgings, but still there are a sufficient number of them who are sociable, or whose families come to the city for a season, and there is no want of handsome ladies for the balls, especially at George Town;* indeed, I never saw prettier girls any where. As there are but few of them, however, in proportion to the great number of men who frequent the places of amusement in the federal city, it is one of the most marrying places of the whole continent—a truth which was beginning to be found out, and became, by-and-by, the cause of vast numbers flocking thither all round from the four points of the compass. Maugre the march of intellect so much vaunted in the present century, the literary education of these ladies is far from being worthy of the age of knowledge, and conversation is apt to flag, though a seat by the ladies is always much coveted. Dancing and music served to eke out the time, but one got to be heartily sick of hearing the same song every where, even when it was "Just like love is yonder rose." No matter how this was sung—the words alone were the men traps; the belle of the evening was declared to be just like both—and people looked round as if the listener was expected to become on the instant very tender and to propose—and sometimes such a result does in reality take place, and both parties, when betrothed, use a great deal of billing and cooing, eat out of the same plate, drink out of the same glass, and show off their love to the whole company. Between these young ladies, who are generally not only good looking but good tempered, and, if not well informed, capable of becoming so, and the ladies of a certain time of life, or rather of the seconda gioventu, there is usually a wide gap in society, young married women being but seldom seen in the world: as they approach, however, to the middle age, they are apt to become romantic; those in particular who live in the country, and have read novels, fancying all manner of heroic things, and returning to the capital determined to have an adventure before they again retire, or on doing some wondrous act which shall make them be talked about in after-times. I myself in vain reasoned with a very beautiful lady to try to persuade her not to cut off a head of hair, one of the finest I ever saw, of an auburn colour, which she used to take the greatest pains to curl and keep in order, and had been evidently proud of; but it was all useless; she found out one day that it was a vanity, and vanity was a sin, and off she cut it and put it into the hands of her astonished and despairing husband. Others I have known to contract an aversion to water, and as a substitute cover their faces and bosoms with hair powder in order to render the skin smooth and delicate. This was peculiarly the case with some Virginian damsels who came to the balls at Washington, and who, in consequence, were hardly less intolerable than negroes. There were but few cases, however, of this, I must confess; though, as regards the use of the powder, they were not so uncommon; and at my balls I thought it advisable to put on the tables of the toilette room not only rouge, but hair powder, as well as blue powder, which had some customers. . . . . In going to assemblies one had sometimes to drive three or four miles within the city bounds, and very often at a great risk of an overturn, or of being what is termed "stalled," or stuck in the mud, when one can neither go backwards nor forwards, and either loses one's shoe or one's patience. . . . . Cards were a great resource of an evening, and gaming was all the fashion, at brag especially, for the men who frequented society were chiefly from Virginia or the Western States, and were very fond of this the most gambling of all games, as being one of countenance as well as cards. Loo was the innocent diversion of the ladies, who, when they were looed, pronounced the word in a very mincing manner. . . . . .

'Church service can certainly never be called an amusement, but, from the variety of persons who were allowed to preach in the House of Representatives, there undoubtedly was some alloy of curiosity in the motives which led one to go there. Though the regular chaplain was a Presbyterian, sometimes a Methodist, a Minister of the Church of England, or a Quaker, and sometimes even a woman, took the speaker's chair; and I do not think there was much devotion among the majority. The New Englanders, generally speaking, are very religious, but, though there are many exceptions, I cannot say as much for the Marylanders, and still less for the Virginians.'

On the whole, then, Sir Augustus seems to have been pleased with Washington and its environs, and he pronounces the society there to be such that it would gain, not lose, by a comparison with that of many an English provincial town—which is the only sort of comparison that any man really experienced in the world would ever have thought of subjecting it to. And he insists warmly on the injustice and absurdity of any traveller's presuming to judge of what American society really is, without having resided for some considerable time in the Federal City:—

'I would not, of course, compare the life we led at the American capital with the mode of spending time in any of the great European cities, where amusements are so varied, and manners are much more refined;—but, making allowance for its size and strange position, I cannot be so severe in describing it as some travellers have been, nor do I think those travellers justified in hazarding such prejudiced descriptions as they pour forth about America and the Americans, without having resided at the capital. What would be said of an American who should go to the British dominions to write about them and their inhabitants, and should take up his residence for the purpose at Connamara or Innishowen, and there, picking up stories of Whiteboys, or Peep-o'-day-boys, should set them down as characteristic of the whole population? Yet would he be more justified in doing so, considering that Connamara, as well as Innishowen, have been peopled or settled for ages, than are the English, who go to live in Kentucky or Tennessee—which have been settled but within the last thirty or forty years, and, for the greater part, by natives or the children of natives of Great Britain, Germany, Ireland, or the Atlantic States—justified in giving vent to abuse against the whole nation, founded on the wild conduct of a vagrant set of colonists. Neither are the manners of New York, or even of Philadelphia, or, at least, of those of the inhabitants who generally come into contact with foreigners, fairly to be taken as specimens of the native society, when it is considered how large a proportion of the leading commercial firms belonged to Europeans, and often to factors of British merchants, who, as they became rich, bought houses and villas, and lived away with great expense for a few years, till perhaps they became bankrupt, and were succeeded by others equally adventurous. Any body who has long resided at Philadelphia, especially, must remember how often such houses changed owners, and how difficult it was for a traveller, unless well recommended, to get intimate with the real ancient families and descendants of William Penn's companions, the "well-born," as they are styled, the Chews, Moylans, Petres, Ingersoll's, &c.; and at New York the Livingstones, Clintons, Van Courtlands, and Van Ransellaers. Besides, it was notorious that many respectable inhabitants were become rather shy and suspicious of prying and questioning authors, from having seen so many shallow books put forth, of which the writers appear more on the look out for anecdotes, such as are to be found in a Newgate Calendar, than for real information about the country. . . . . .

* George Town is very near Washington; so near, that it was wonderful they did not make it the nucleus of their capital.

'A traveller for information, and not a mere bookmaker, should pass one season at least at the federal city, to get acquainted with the ministers and members of Congress, and afterwards visit as many of these as he can at their several houses, which would be flattering to them, and at the same time offer the best means to himself of obtaining correct ideas with regard to the whole country; and, if he find not reason to be pleased wherever he goes, he will at least find that there is a great variety of manners in the States, and that some of them may be compared for good order, cleanliness, sensible institutions, and cultivation, as well as civilisation, with some of the very best districts of his own country, and are much superior to most provinces on the continent of Europe.

'Good stories there are in abundance, and I see no reason not to tell them from regard to the national susceptibility; but there are as many to be found in our own papers every year, and all America will not be supposed inculpated because of Anderson's act of impropriety in my drawing-room chimney, any more than all England is because of Jack Fuller's tirade against the speaker; or gouging be thought an amusement of high life in the United States, any more than burking in Great Britain. It is quite absurd to carry blame and ridicule so far as some late travellers have done—however they may be excused from the individual losses and disappointments that they met with. Such people are not fair judges, any more than Brissot and Liancourt, or Lafayette, who had motives for praising the States just as extravagantly as the others abused them; Lafayette more especially, whose vanity was so flattered by the notice which Washington bestowed on him at a time of life when all things appear delightful, that his whole after thought seems to have been an effort to imitate that general, and, no matter how unlike the countries, or what the cost in blood and money, to preach for the introduction of the American constitution every where.'*

'Is it to be believed that any new settlers, coming with real or supposed superior knowledge, and a disposition to be bitter critics of every thing round them, would be at all better received in a remote English county?—People must have rare good temper and make great allowances, as well as be very discreet, not to excite hatred, envy, and malice in any country town where they may go to fix their residence, and yet these grumblers, who leave the friends of their youth on purposes of speculation, expect to be better received almost by perfect strangers or rival settlers. Mrs. Trollope's stories might, for the most part, suit manners nearer home just as well as they do those of Tennessee."

We need not pursue this train of observation which, as our readers may remember, we opened at some length in a recent examination of Captain Marryat's travels.

Sir Augustus, having done with the capital, proceeds to describe his various tours through the different states, of which he is fullest and, we think, most entertaining on Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts. His first visit in Virginia was, in company with Mr. and Mrs. Merry, to the nephew and heir of General Washington, at Mount Vernon; but his description of the place is not different from others. He says:—

'On the occasion of the above-mentioned excursion, which calls General Washington so much to one's memory, I may as well here relate the little I have to say of that illustrious person, of whom, to his honour it may be said, there are perhaps fewer anecdotes to tell than there are of any other great man that ever existed. He seems to have been a plain, sensible, gentlemanlike person, and a brave as well as a clear-headed officer; who, though being of a good English family, and having originally the right English feelings of a British subject, when he was roused to take a part in the quarrel between the mother-country and her colonies, after well weighing his duty to both, and the reasons for and against either side of the question, being persuaded that the former was in the wrong, took at once his determination to abide by the latter; and, having entered and engaged himself in their service, to stick to whatever might be their ultimate decision. And such was exactly the part which any military man of a calm unimpassioned mind, owner of property in the colonies concerned, might have been expected to adopt; for it is now, I believe, pretty generally admitted that the Grenville administration, which first mooted the subject of taxing the colonies, went on a wrong principle, and were no more justified in drawing a revenue, without representation, from so populous and integral a part of the monarchy as the American provinces had become, than they would have been in drawing one under similar circumstances from Yorkshire: though I have heard Mr. Jefferson and his successor, Mr. Madison, express a belief that the timely concession of a few seats in the upper as well as the lower House of Parliament, by virtue of which representation and taxation should go hand-in-hand, would have set at rest the whole question: and the late Lord Liverpool's opinion even went further, for I have heard him say he was convinced that, if Mr. Grenville had not hesitated, and invited discussion by putting forth a pamphlet to pave the way for taxation, but had quietly let the duties, when once they were authorised by Parliament, be levied as a thing of course, there would, in all probability, have been very little stir made about them. But reasoning with Englishmen naturally leads to contradiction, and contradiction to grumbling, which easily opens the door to passion, as well as ambition; and all the colonies were driven to make a common cause by lengthened discussions and communications with one another, which might not have been the case but for such delay; North Carolina having, for one, refused her sanction to the rebellion until some time after all the others had come to an agreement.

'Such indeed was the force of habit, of common laws, or of common origin, involving almost every shade of the aristocratic as well as democratic element, that it required all the rashness of the Grenville administration to break through those delicate ties which bound the colonies to the mother-country, and which a Sir James M'Intosh might well represent as pervading our institutions from their earliest times, producing harmony between all classes, as well as preventing any exact line of demarcation from being visible between them; but by such perseverance in treating them as if they were our subjects instead of our fellow-subjects—by imitating the Athenians rather than the Romans—keeping them in dependence instead of sharing with them the honours and offices of the realm—we had nothing to work upon in order to counteract the effect produced by taxation, save awakened ambitions, which had to seek for gratification under a different sky from ours, where rebellion found an echo in self-interest, and where the gentry were too little numerous to counterbalance the disaffection of the towns.'

These reflections deserve to be most deeply considered by every one who aspires to the name of a British statesman. If our empire, our colonial empire, without which we should be almost nothing, is to be held together, it behoves us to profit by the dear experience of the past, and to ask ourselves whether the object is likely to be attained—unless we enlarge our minds to the wisdom and necessity of cultivating in our dependencies whatever institutions, civil or sacred, have been found to be most conservative in their tendencies here at home. A great colonial minister is wanted, above all other wants, for the honour, nay, safety of our national existence. It was well said by a living poet, that a statesman, combining the intellect of a Bacon with the energy of a Luther, would find more than enough to occupy him in that post.

'Mr. Gallatin told me he once met him, when he (Gallatin) was quite a young man, in the back country, and that he thought him heavy and rather stupid; he was in a small room, questioning some hunters about roads and distances. He seemed to take down every answer very leisurely, and was sometimes several minutes in drawing a conclusion. But Mr. Gallatin admitted that he had changed his opinion of him as he grew older. He then told me a story of a black slave, who said he was once saved from a caning by the general's looking at the cane before he raised it, and recollecting that it was given him by Dr. Franklin. He was very punctual, divided his occupations by minutes, and was not a little provoked when he did not meet the same punctuality in others: and this was the case with Stewart, the portrait-painter, who loved his bed dearly, and who told me that Washington, having fixed an hour to sit to him, and not found the room in order when he arrived, flew into a passion and gave a great scolding to the servant, which Stewart overheard as he came up stairs, but on his entering the room he found the general quite calm, as if nothing had happened. Mr. Gallatin thought the only instance of defective judgment in him was his fixing the site of the capital where it is. He considered him as a man who had naturally strong passions, but who had attained complete mastery over them; and he seems to have had fewer weaknesses than most people. His name was long a tower of strength to the federal party, because, although it was principally through his means that the revolution was accomplished, he was not a revolutionary man, but a lover of order and decorum: and Mr. Senator Giles, a leading democratic aristocrat, used to say that he would always talk of France when the others talked of Washington—as if the bloody, dirty, dishevelled French jacobin was in his opinion a fitting pendant to the portrait engraved on the hearts of his countrymen by Washington's noble countenance and manly, dignified figure.

'I have been assured, on good authority, that Washington, after he had thrown away the scabbard, repeatedly declared that, if the colonies should have the worst of the conflict, he was determined to quit them for ever, and, assembling as many as would follow, go and establish an independent state in the west, on the rivers Mississippi and Missouri. Our generals, however, saved him the trouble, having been too cautious and too fond of their beds, and thereby having, over and over again, lost opportunities for crushing at one blow the whole American force, in which there was great discouragement at one time, as well as great desertion.*

'Of a man so passionless, or so master of his passions, there can be but few weaknesses to dwell on; he seems to have never been a slave to female charms, and, as we have seen, hardly ever burst into anger—was very regular, cool, and sensible—an excellent man, in short, in his private as well as public character; but too faultless to be thought great by those who love excitement, keep their admiration for the scourges of mankind, and would imitate, if they could, those heroes in the eyes of all gamblers, a Buonaparte or a Cæsar: and such, I fear, are too many even of his countrymen; to whom it is a disgrace that, up to this day, no public monument has been raised over their greatest citizen. The Congress, it is true, did once demand of his widow the body of the general, and Mrs. Washington had consented, but there arose a debate about the dollars necessary to pay for its conveyance and for placing it in the Capitol. A dissolution of Congress meanwhile took place, a new set of representatives let the question drop, and the body was left to remain where it still is, in a leaden coffin, enclosed within a wooden case, and upon a heap of similar boxes, in a large vault under a hillock planted with cedars—and, I believe, not even within the vicinity of a church or any consecrated ground.

'Washington does not appear to have been ambitious of retaining power; but the excessive praise that has been bestowed upon him by some French authors for his moderation in this respect, is only a proof of their ignorance of the nature of public feeling in America at the time when he was either commander-in-chief or president, and of the slender ties which held together the different States; for, as matters were, with all his claims to the gratitude and veneration of his countrymen, he had great difficulty in preserving his popularity, which had been much diminished long before he closed his career, and might, perhaps, have been wholly eclipsed had he stood a third election for the presidential chair. Being in easy circumstances, if not wealthy, and desirous of repose, he acted wisely for his own interest, as well as consulted public feeling, in declining the attempt; but his example, which has hitherto been followed, of laying down all pretensions to office after eight years' service in the highest situation of the state, is any thing but favourable to stability of measures in the government; tends to the ruin of individuals who, after having risen to the rank of sovereigns, find themselves, while still in the full vigour of life, reduced to the necessity of re-entering the world as private persons, without fortune, perhaps, as without employment; and may have, some day, if we may judge from human nature and from history, the most disastrous consequences.'

Pursuing his excursion, he arrives at a place called Elkrun-Church, from a church which he found fast sinking into ruins—the roof fallen in, and the floor broken in every direction:—

'It had remained so, the people told me, ever since the war of the revolution, serving now but as a building-place for birds, and a local mark of the downfall of the Anglican church in this district of Virginia. The people about Elkrun do not indeed profess to be of any religious sect, or at least of any that they know of, as a man told me whom I met in my walk. It is not that they despise religion, he added; but the state legislature having resumed the glebes, and withdrawn the regular provision of the Episcopal church, no person can be found who will take the chance of gaining his livelihood by collections from the piously inclined. The private conduct of the clergy here and in Maryland before the revolution was, generally speaking, it must be owned, not calculated to insure respect to them individually, or continuance in their functions after the States had become independent. All agree in describing those established in Virginia in particular as a set of debauched fellows as any under the sun, commonly Scotch Presbyterians who turned Episcopalians, and contrived to get consecrated by the bishop of London, for the purpose of coming out here, and getting into livings, where they did as they pleased, and passed their time, without any control or shame whatever, in the most careless voluptuousness. The Virginian gentlemen of the present day are, for the most part, freethinkers. The lower classes are, on the other hand, very eager in attending Methodist and Baptist preachers, who contrive to get a very good livelihood by the theatrical appearance of their meetings, and the other allurements, including facilities of rendezvous, which they suffer the initiated to mix up with their religious exercises, while the passions of the zealous are excited to a degree that appears almost incredible.'

We are sorry to know that the absurd excesses of these Ranters and Methodists, with their camp meetings, whispering benches, &c. &c., are still such as Sir Augustus found them; but, on the other hand, the extent to which the Anglican clergy have since that time spread their influence in almost every district of the United States, is, of all the changes that have occurred, that which we consider with the greatest delight. We must add, in connection with our author's account of former Bishops of London in reference to the ecclesiastical affairs of British colonies, that the recent exertions of the heads of our church for improving and completing her apparatus in our existing dependencies afford lay statesmen an example which, if they be wise, they will profit by, in regard to civil as well as sacred matters.

The next halt was at a settlement of Mr. Downie, a Scotchman, who first introduced to Sir Augustus's acquaintance the inestimable beverage called mint-julep. He intimates a suspicion that, though celebrated as an American invention, it might have been imported from Downie's native regions; but here he is undoubtedly in the wrong. We should not, however, be at all surprised to find it largely adopted, by-and-by, in this country. In hot weather, when we have such a thing, it is altogether unrivalled; and last autumn, we understand, the niceties of the manufacture formed a favourite study among the scientific benchers of the Middle Temple. Sir Augustus adds to some eulogies of Mr. Downie's cheer—

'It is an extraordinary circumstance that I never met with a single dish of game during the month that I remained on this tour in Virginia on any table, whether public or private, which, as the woods are full of game, and this was the season for shooting it, I can only attribute to a want of skill on the part of the inhabitants in shooting birds flying—or, else, perhaps, to their not liking it: for it has been often observed that labourers and hard-working people do not like wild-fowl in European countries, where it is plentiful; and even venison is notoriously scouted at servants' tables. . . . . .

'I must admit that I was by no means edified by the accounts I heard of the pleasures of having property in the State of Virginia; the laws are so badly executed, and it seems so impracticable even for a man of large possessions to keep off thieves from his farm-yard and gardens. At many respectable houses where I stopped to dine I have been surprised at so seldom meeting with fruit, or even with eggs; and the greater number of small farmers whom I knew any thing of admitted that they live chiefly upon salted pork and dried fish—though at inns you get chickens.'

From Mr. Downie's it is fifteen miles to Montpelier, the seat of Mr. Madison, then secretary of state. This was their next stage:

'His father was Bishop of Virginia. No man had a higher reputation among his acquaintance for probity, and good, honourable feeling, while he was allowed on all sides to be a gentleman in his manners as well as a man of public virtue.

'There are some very fine woods about Montpelier, but no pleasure-grounds, though Mr. Madison talked of some day laying out space for an English park, which he might render very beautiful from the easy, graceful descent of his hills into the plains below. The ladies, however, whom I have known in Virginia, like those of Italy, generally speaking, scarcely ever venture out of their houses to walk or to enjoy beautiful scenery; a high situation, from whence they can have an extensive prospect, is their delight; and, in fact, the heat is too great in these latitudes to allow of such English tastes to exist—in the same degree, at least, as in the mother country. A pleasure-ground, too, to be kept in order, would be very expensive, and all hands are absolutely wanted for the plantation. Great estates, and consequently great wealth, were, it is true, in former days by no means uncommon in Virginia; and I have heard of a Mr. Carter, who possessed 80,000 acres; but the abolition of entails has nearly ruined them all, and many hard cases occurred after the act of Congress was passed for the purpose, in 1776; among which, I was told, by Mr. Randolph, of one that was in fact a great act of injustice on the part of Colonel Van, who, having received an estate entailed in 1775, took advantage of the act of the following year, and left it away from his sisters to his widow, who married again, and left the rightful heiresses penniless. At the present day estates are very much subdivided; and I believe that even so late as the commencement of the century nobody could be pointed out as possessed of 25,000 acres.'

Twenty-eight miles more brought the party to Monticello, where Mr. Jefferson was spending, as usual, the two hottest months of the autumn. The house is situated on a detached hill, separated by two deep gaps from the body of the Blue Ridge, upon a level platform of considerable extent, which had been formed by the old land-surveyor, his father. The building itself was entirely the President's work; and the description, part of which we extract, gives us some peeps into the character of the founder:—

'The house has two porticoes of the Doric order, though one of them was not quite completed, and the pediment had, in the mean while, to be supported on the stems of four tulip-trees, which are really, when well grown, as beautiful as the fluted shafts of Corinthian pillars. They front north and south: on the ground-floor were four sitting-rooms, two bed-rooms, and the library, which contained several thousand volumes, classed according to subject and language. It was divided into three compartments, in one of which the president had his bed placed in a door-way; and in a recess at the foot of the bed was a horse with forty-eight projecting hands, on which hung his coats and waistcoats, and which he could turn round with a long stick,—a nick-nack that Jefferson was fond of showing, with many other little mechanical inventions; one of which was a sulky upon four wheels, with the spring in the centre, a very rough sort of carriage, but which he preferred to any other, as having been made by an Irish mechanic at Monticello, under his own superintendence, and to praise which was a sure way to prejudice him in your favour. He had also got an odometer, which was fastened upon the axle-tree of the sulky, and would tell the number of miles gone over by the wheels,' &c. &c. &c.

Jefferson's printed correspondence is full of allusions to polographs and pantographs, and so forth. 'I have always observed,' says Sir Walter Scott, 'that a small taste for mechanics tends to encouraging a sort of trifling self-conceit, founded on knowing what is not worth being known by one who has other matters to employ his mind on, and in short, forms a trumpery gimcrack kind of a character.'—Letter to Miss Joanna Bailie, Life of Scott, vol. vi. p. 83.

'If the library had been thrown open to his guests, the President's country house would have been as agreeable a place to stay at as any I know; but it was there he sat and wrote, and he did not like, of course, to be disturbed by visiters, who in this part of the world are rather disposed to be indiscreet. The family breakfast hour was eight o'clock; and after breakfast Mrs. Randolph [the president's daughter] and the other female relations of the house set about cleaning the tea-things and washing the alabaster lamp, which I took to be designed as a catch for popularity. After this operation the president retired to his books; his daughter to give lessons to her children; her husband to his farm; and the guests were left to amuse themselves as they pleased, walking, riding, or shooting. The president took his daily ride at one o'clock, to look at his farm and mill; at four dinner was served up; and in the evening we walked on a wooden terrace, or strolled into the wood, Mr. Jefferson playing with his grandchildren till dusk, when tea was brought in, and afterwards wine and fruit, of which the peaches were excellent. At nine our host withdrew, and every body else as they pleased.

'Jefferson's opinions in regard to the mental qualities of the negro race were certainly not favourable; he considered them to be as far inferior to the rest of mankind as the mule is to the horse, and as made to carry burthens, while he augured but little good as likely to result from their emancipation—That the black race is, however, as susceptible of refined civilisation, and as capable to the full of profiting by the advantages of education as any other of any shade whatever, must be admitted, in contradiction to Mr. Jefferson's prejudices, by any person who has had the honour to be acquainted with the daughters of Christophe, who was supreme sovereign or emperor of Hayti during eight or nine years, and who spared no kind of expense in getting good European masters for his children. The early and melancholy fate of his sons prevents us from forming a judgment as to what they might have become in consequence of such care, but his daughters are well known at several European courts, and by many individuals of the best European society, especially at the Tuscan and Sardinian capitals, where, in spite of their colour and their rank, which made it difficult to mix familiarly in the great world, they were sufficiently seen, nevertheless, to let it be apparent that their wit and understandings, as well as their accomplishments, were of the very highest order. . . . . .

'I thought Mr. Jefferson more of a statesman and man of the world than Mr. Madison, who was rather too much the disputatious pleader; yet the latter was better informed, and, moreover, a social, jovial, and good-humoured companion, full of anecdote, sometimes rather of a loose description, but oftener of a political and historical interest. He was a little man with small features, rather wizened when I saw him, occasionally lit up with a good-natured smile. He wore a black coat, stockings with shoes buckled, and had his hair powdered, with a tail. Jefferson, on the other hand, was, as before stated, very tall and bony, and affected to despise dress: in conversation, too, he was visionary, and loved to dream eyes open, or, as the Germans say, "zu schwärmen," and it must be admitted that America is the paradise for "Schwärmers," futurity there offering a wide frame for all that the imagination can put into it. If he lived, however, on illusions and mystic philanthropical plans in the country, or in his bed, he was not the less awake or active in taking measures to ensure the triumph of himself and his party at the capital, and I doubt if Washington himself would so certainly have been elected for the third time to the presidential chair, as he would have been had he chosen to be put into nomination for it. But he preferred being consistent, and to follow in this respect the example of his great predecessor, while he had enough of independence of mind and love for even trifling occupations to enable him to bear the change with composure. It must, however, have been a painful necessity that induced him to sell his library. No doubt, it was prudentially done for the interests of his children, and patriotically sold to his country, yet still there was, I fear, also, the potent argument of poverty; and it was another great slur upon the character of Congress that they did not vote him the money and refuse to accept the books, at least until after his death.—Such men as Washington and Jefferson, and their contemporaries in the highest stations of their country, having had peculiar claims to its most generous consideration, particularly when we reflect on the nature of the sacrifices which they made in order to establish the Republic, and that such sacrifices never can possibly be equalled by any of their successors—I shall ever look upon it as a proof of degeneracy in the race of men succeeding to that of the founders of American independence that the great Washington was left unburied, otherwise than as we bury a dog—that Jefferson was forced to sell his library in his old age to enable him to live—and that Monroe was almost left to starve, after he, like others, had spent his patrimony in keeping up the respectability of the offices of Secretary of State and President.*

'America is fond of being called a young nation—but youth is seldom stingy, and we have yet to learn what are the beneficial effects which may be produced by referring all things to penurious motives and rigid maxims of economy, nothing being allowed out of respect for great characters and public services. Already they have reaped some of the evil consequences of such a system, corruption among their civil officers having fearfully increased since the front ranks have been thinned of those whose boyhood had imbibed its character from English principles as well as English Education, and whose gentlemanly examples still served to influence and keep in a straight course the age they lived in. From the date of the French Revolution in 1789, which was also the date of the new American Constitution, to the declaration of war by the United States in 1812, seven Judges had been, though I believe unjustly, impeached; a Vice-President was convicted of conspiring to overturn the government; three senators were said to have been implicated in the plot; a District-Attorney had to fly from New York to New Orleans on being convicted of peculation, carrying off 50,000 dollars of public property in his pockets; a son of a Secretary of the Treasury had to fly from Philadelphia on being proved guilty of swindling; a Secretary of State, as may be seen in the French envoy Fauchet's intercepted and published despatches, was guilty of having been bribed by the French; and many other instances might be added.'

In leaving Virginia, Sir Augustus observes that five out of the seven Presidents of the United States (from Washington to Jackson inclusive) were gentlemen from this one province. The extent of Virginia and number of its representatives in Congress might, he says, account partly for this;—but he attributes it far more to the facts that Virginia had a better supply of natural aristocrats, large landed proprietors, than any other State in the Union, and that these magnates, as comparatively speaking they might be called, found it safer to profess ultra-democratical opinions than the gentry of any other district of rival importance, because in Virginia—although she, like her sisters, sent deputies to the general legislature in proportion to the number of her population—"the mass of the people, who in other countries might become mobs, was composed almost exclusively of the gentleman's own negro-slaves.' We have already, however, seen how rapidly the estates were becoming subdivided in Virginia as elsewhere, and Sir Augustus mentions that the ruin of many families had been much accelerated by the vanity of keeping up old establishments with diminished means. 'I doubt,' says he, 'if many men of large estates are now to be found there. The new generation, too, of gentlemen produced since the peace appeared to be rather inferior, in manners at least, to their elders or predecessors.' The last circumstance, which Sir Augustus states very gently, does not at all surprise us. The mere fact that these gentlemen are no longer educated, as their fathers and grandfathers usually were, in the great schools and universities of England, would be quite enough to account for such a result. Virginia has but partaken in the necessary fate of the separated colonies generally:—they chose—or rather the inveterate shortsightedness of the old country at length drove them—to drop the main connexion they had had with the established systems of social refinement—and time must elapse before America can hope to supply the blank from her own native resources. Let us only ask ourselves what would happen as to the manners of any country town, or commercial city, or even separate county town in Great Britain, were it by any misfortune deprived of intercourse with the old central seats of elegant learning and the controlling examples of courtly politeness.

* The Times of May 5, 1841, quotes this paragraph from the Louisville Journal:—'A few weeks ago we saw a very long letter from General Jackson to a gentleman who had drawn on him for one hundred dollars. He acknowledged that the money was due; but stated that he was so miserably embarrassed by his security debts as to be utterly unable to raise the small sum necessary to meet the draft. He said he had some blooded stock which he was willing to give up, but one hundred dollars in money was out of the question.'

The weight of Virginia, notwithstanding all that has been said, was thrown into the scale of peace whenever, in Sir Augustus Foster's time, the question of war with England was mooted in Congress. The landed gentlemen of that State, however inclined to support ultra-democratical views in other cases, were too well aware of their own patrimonial interests to go readily into measures of which the immediate effect must be to cut off the best markets for their produce. The case was different as to South Carolina, although that State had within it a class of still richer gentry than Virginia. There, however, while the slaves were counted as elsewhere for settling the number of deputies, but could not themselves vote, the rich landlords found themselves already reduced to political insignificance by the increasing population of whites in the middle and lower classes of society, who engrossed gradually the influence of the elective franchise, and exerted it almost uniformly in favour of 'briefless lawyers and soi-disant doctors, ambitious or envious of their more prosperous neighbours, who had nothing to lose and every thing to gain by commotion.' These were the war-hawks; and 'most probably,' says our author, 'this State will from these circumstances ever be ready to take up arms, with or without cause, merely for the sake of gratifying young fellows of eloquence and ambition lacking preferment.'

The Baronet, in his Notes on other States, gives some instructive specimens of the practical results of radical supremacy. For instance—in North Carolina a large district of land belonged of right to the heirs of Lord Carteret. Sir Augustus conversed with the American lawyer, Mr. Key, who conducted the business for the claimants, and was assured that, though the equity of their claim was 'universally admitted,' it was in vain to proceed with it, as the judges and juries year after year 'purposely evaded giving any decision,' and the popular feeling against the foreigner was so strong that it could never 'be safe for any court of justice to settle the question in his favour.' In Georgia, Whitney's patent for cleaning cotton, though protected by an act of the State Legislature, was openly violated; and our author was assured by the patentee's friend, Mr. Day, of New Haven, that 'the sheriffs were pledged, on being named to their office, to impanel only such jurymen as would be unfavourable to the claim.' Sir Augustus says, 'let us put these examples alongside of the respect paid by Parliament to the Duke of Atholl's absurd rights in the Isle of Man, and to the Butlerage of the Ormond family in Ireland, and then draw a conclusion as to which form of government is most favourable to the principles of equity and honourable conduct.' But the treatment of the Penn family, which he mentions in another Note, was at least as flagrant as its injustice, and marked by a more deliberate shabbiness of cunning. Their lands were seized, during the revolutionary ferment, without any lawful pretext, and divided into numberless very small sections—because no appeal lies to the supreme court of the whole Union in the case of pecuniary claims below a certain amount, and thus the Delaware and Pennsylvania juries were sure to have the matter entirely in their own power. After fifteen years of struggle the Penns found it impossible to obtain a verdict in any one case, and they at last in despair accepted of some trifling compensation for their lost principality, not from the States which owed every thing to their great ancestor, but from the government at Washington itself.

Maryland at the beginning of this century had the advantage, Sir Augustus says, of being governed by 'as respectable a set of persons as could be found in America; but in the course of a few years the ultra-democratical influence displaced them, and they were succeeded by 'perhaps the meanest and the worst, and who had become notorious for shabbiness and bad faith.' He mentions two instances:—first the seizure for jobbing purposes of the funds—subscribed by private persons before the war—for the support of a seat of education on a liberal scale at Annapolis—the only pretext alleged being that 'the majority of citizens could derive no benefit from such an institution;' and, secondly, the dexterous specimen of attorneyocracy exhibited in relation to a claim which the old government of the Province of Maryland had had to a sum of £200,000 invested in the English funds. After the war, though the British government might, as he says, have justly retaliated upon the treatment of the heirs of Lord Carteret, Mr. Penn, and many others, 'with that almost romantic love of justice which has hitherto always characterised it, it consented to give up the sum.' Bills had been issued on the strength of the securities, and circulated like other stock during the course of the war. They had become depreciated in the market, but still the actual holders were the only persons who could have any right to the money. The new government, who had just been elected when the British decision was announced, issued a proclamation accordingly, and ordered the claims to be sent in within a definite period. But presently they, by a summary edict, curtailed the term thus fixed—in consequence of which trick a very large proportion of the real claimants were wholly baffled and defrauded, and the far greater part of the sum was 'appropriated' elsewhere. 'It is on such occasions,' says Sir Augustus, 'that nations find out the bad economy there is in employing persons of gross and envious dispositions, many of them alien refugees, instead of gentlemen of property and education, who have a different compass to steer by than that of some paltry jealousy or mere love of lucre.

'There were a great number of rich proprietors in the state of Maryland. In the district nearest the city of Washington alone, of which Montgomery county forms part, I was assured that there were five hundred persons possessing estates which returned them an income of £1000. Mr. Lloyd a member of Congress, on the eastern branch, possessed a net revenue of between £6000 and £7000, with which he had only to buy clothes for himself and family, wines, equipage, furniture, and other luxuries. Mr. Ringold possessed, near Hagerstown, a property yielding him an income of 12,000 dollars a year; and he rented his lands to tenants (whom he was at liberty to change, if he pleased, every year) for five dollars per acre, though he was to stand the expense of all repairs: Mr. Ringold kept but 600 acres in his own hands for stock. Mr. Tayloe, also, whose whole income exceeded £15,000 per annum, had a great portion of it in Maryland, chiefly at Nanjimoy, where he held 3000 acres, which his father bought for £500!!! His property, too, must by this time be very considerably augmented, for he was said to lay out about 33,000 dollars every year in new purchases. He possessed 500 slaves, built brigs and schooners, worked iron-mines, converted the iron into ploughshares—and all this was done by the hands of his own subjects. He had a splendid house at Mount Airy, with a property round it of 8000 acres, and a house at the federal city; and he told me that he raised about twelves bushels to the acre of the best land. Mr. Carrol, of Annapolis, grandfather to Lady Wellesley, the Duchess of Leeds, and Lady Stafford, was said to be still more wealthy, having, besides great accumulation in the funds, 15,000 acres of the best land in Frederic county, and several other estates.* He let a considerable portion of his property, too, to tenants, with an agreement that he was to receive a fine on the transfer of a lease; which arrangement is very profitable in a country where land is so often liable to change its occupants. I am induced to mention these instances of men of property and good family settled in America, from having observed what great ignorance still prevails among even the higher classes of Englishmen, in regard to the state of the colonies before the revolution; many persons supposing them to have been in a great measure peopled by convicts: whereas, whatever were the importations of such persons as are now sent to Botany Bay, they were too few in former days to affect the general character of the colonial population, and were probably restricted to Pennsylvania, which is still an omnium gatherum for people of all countries and religions, and to Georgia, which only began its political existence in the last century.'

In Pennsylvania and Delaware the influence of the new body of landed proprietors, created chiefly by the honourable manœuvres above alluded to, was already sufficiently apparent. 'None of the Pennsylvanians in Congress,' says Sir Augustus, 'were much distinguished for talents, though generally great democrats, and ill-mannered, as well from the effects of their education as from affectation,'—(Αγροικος ειναι προσεστι σικυος ων)—'and perhaps that wanton enjoyment of freedom which German bondsmen may be supposed to indulge in when they look back to the times in which they were under the yoke of some petty count or baron of the empire.' 'Many Germans were attracted by the relations of the Hessian soldiers that remained after the war; and a German who has just arrived is like a great cart-horse turned loose upon a plain, kicking and snorting in all directions; they revel in their new state, and appear to be delighted with rolling about in the mire of democracy.'

'He was travelling in the back country districts, was driving a gig, and had left his groom at a considerable distance behind him, riding at a quiet pace in order to bring the other horse in cool. On coming to a log-house to get some water he found several wagoners in possession of the place who were very noisy and would not make way for him; but on his remonstrating, winked to each other, and agreed to have some fun out of the gentleman. They formed a ring, made him get down, and told him to dance. It was useless to argue with them; they began smacking at him with their whips, and he to caper and jump about from one to the other, till, at last, to his great joy, he espied his groom coming up, when rushing forward he knocked down one of the fellows in his way, and hastening to the saddle horse took out two loaded pistols which were in the holsters. "Now, you rascals," he hallooed out, "it's my turn!" and, cocking his pistols, he ordered them all to lay down their whips, giving one to the groom, which the latter was ordered to lay about him as hard as he could, and when they had all got a good threshing he ordered them off with their wagons, and took his repose, after having been complimented by the landlord, who secretly rejoiced at the lesson his brutal customers had received. On another occasion, a traveller got the better of one of these blackguards, to the satisfaction even of his companions, to whom the bully had made himself formidable; he chose to challenge the gentleman to fisticuffs, thinking him too delicate to stand the trial—but he had caught a Tartar; the gentleman happened to have been a disciple of Jackson. Such adventures it is to be hoped are now becoming rarer—in the long settled parts, at least—or it would be unadvisable to travel about otherwise than in stage coaches.'

The same feelings which Sir Augustus has mentioned, as deciding, in his opinion, the retention of Washington for the federal capital, had operated already in transferring the seats of many of the state governments to small places: that of New York, for example, to Albany, 150 miles up the Hudson River—that of Pennsylvania from Philadelphia to Lancaster. Philadelphia was, he says, in those days, by far the richest town in North America—several of the citizens represented families known from an early date, and possessed large incomes—some as much as £20,000 a year.* These gentlemen, however, and their connexions, seemed to be determinedly set aside in all the provincial elections, as well as in those of members for the Congress:—

* Sir Augustus elsewhere calls Mr. Carrol 'the richest man in the Union;' but we suppose he forgot at the moment the late patroon of New York, Mr. Van Rensellaer. Mr. Silk Buckingham, in his 'America,' just published (vol. ii. p. 327), states the patroon's income at a million of dollars, or 200,000 pounds per annum. We doubt if any English subject has such a revenue at his command in 1841.

'The well-borns—an expression introduced or applied to the rich Philadelphian families by the Germans—appear to have but little chance. Mr. Schneider, a tanner, was then governor of the state; and there was even a question of removing the seat of government from Lancaster to Harrisburgh, quite a new place, above forty miles further west; its chief recommendation being that the legislature would there be less exposed to the influence of the rich and well educated than it is in a city so little removed from the great world as even Lancaster is—so jealous are these land owners, of all kinds of aristocracy, which will never be able to raise its head until the inland towns become more populous than they are.'

The change to Harrisburgh, which is 100 miles from Philadelphia, has since been effected—though Sir Augustus does not seem to be aware of the fact.

The inferior functionaries of this state are described as most unprincipled partisans. For example:—

'The inspectors are sometimes so lax in regard to questioning the voters, that a senator told me he had once seen fifty sailors brought up to vote for a candidate, who, but a few hours previously, had been taken to the house of a tax gatherer in the interest of the democratic party, where they each paid a fifteen penny-piece into his hands to enable them to swear that they had paid the taxes. And this puts me in mind of an old woman, in one of the sea-port towns, who kept a cradle, made for the purpose of rocking full grown British subjects who were to be converted in a hurry into American citizens, that, when testimony should be called for to prove their birth, she might with a safe conscience swear she had known them from their cradles.'

Of the society in Philadelphia Sir Augustus speaks very highly:—

'I never met with more hospitality any where,' he says; 'and as there exists a great deal less of that nervous susceptibility as to the opinion foreigners, or rather Englishmen, entertain of America than is to be found farther south, or even at New York, the dinner parties were more without restraint, and very agreeable. They might have made one forget one was not in England, if it had not been for the occasional pronunciation of some common word. . . . . It is in such society, too, and among similar sets of individuals, whose names are too numerous to mention, that one learns the esteem in which the English are still held by their Transatlantic relations of the good old stock. I must repeat that any hatred entertained for us, as far as my knowledge of facts can go, was in a great measure confined to individuals, refugees, or discontented emigrants from the British islands, and their connexions.'

Sir Augustus says a good deal of pictures by West, Sully, Stewart, and others, at Philadelphia. He adds:—

'The statue gallery had very good casts in it, which was all that it could be expected to have: the collection was exhibited to ladies and to gentlemen separately, which I thought a very stupid kind of regulation by way of a delicate one, all restraint being thereby removed from the remarks and observations of either party; and that it is so was proved by some lines, written with a pencil, which I spied here and there, in a female hand, upon the legs of statues of the gods Cupid and Mercury, which the keeper of the rooms assured me must have been done during a late visit of some young women. The latter, being generally educated at boarding schools, are consequently not much under the influence of that timidity and reserve so characteristic of young ladies in Europe; and when they get together they are said to be extremely plain spoken.'

From the aspect of the city itself he glides into some reflections on American banking, which just at present may have interest for our readers:—

'The city of Philadelphia is built too much in the shape of a chess-board to be beautiful. There is nothing surely so unfavourable to architectural ornament as long lines of broad streets cutting each other at right angles, and yet this is the plan on which most modern towns are constructed in this part of the world, arising, I conclude, in a great degree, from the circumstance that the architects employed were generally, in point of fact, mere masons who had emigrated to seek their fortunes in the colonies. Mere workmen of no genius, being of course fond of what is easiest to do, imitate as much as possible—and, where they have some appearance of originating, it is by omitting a part of what they copy from, and spoiling its proportions; as those who build upon the plan of the Pantheon at Rome generally take but six of its eight columns, though they cannot prevent the eye from being offended at the change, which makes the building appear wire-drawn and discordant with itself. Such streets as those of Philadelphia might in fact be built on ad infinitum, and the architect never have to get out of his bed, but simply to order the next house or the next street, to be built like the preceding one; I have often fancied myself in Eighth or Ninth street when I was in Tenth or Eleventh street, and had to retrace my steps a great way to find the number out. How much more beautiful is a city where no such regularity prevails, but where each man builds according to his own fancy! No proportion of height can exist where length is extended in long perspective; and without proportion what is architecture! In London every step you take gives you new outlines, and in St. James's street or Pall Mall the Club houses may be viewed, each of them as an individual work of art, independent of shops or low houses on either side. So, who would not prefer the Strada Nuova of Genoa, with its curved line of palaces, to the regular architecture of the Dora Grossa in the Sardinian capital!

* Mr. Silk Buckingham, no great authority perhaps, speaks of the late Stephen Girard, of Philadelphia, a native of France, as having been still richer than the Patroon of New York, or even old John Astor, of the same state, to whom he ascribes the decent competence of two hundred and fifty thousand pounds per annum (vol. i. p. 47.) This is the founder of Astoria, immortalised by Washington Irving.

Long lines of houses, in fact, weary one physically as well as morally, in the same manner that a long straight road wearies when one is eager to get to the end of a journey. There are some handsome buildings, nevertheless, at Philadelphia; and if Mr. Latrobe, who is a real good architect, and was employed by the nation, could not alter the original sin of the plan on which that city was built, he has, at least, done something to adorn it. The Bank, though the columns stand on plinths and are rather too long, is a handsome piece of architecture, and is faced with white marble, an expense which the establishment could well afford, although, even at the time when I was last in the country, they were trembling for their charter.

'This charter Mr. Eppes, son-in-law of Mr. Jefferson, declared in Congress, had begun in party, continued in party, and must end in party: yet, with all their federal or aristocratical tendencies, what great influence had the Bank Company on the election of Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, or Jackson?—But the Democrats, particularly those of the back parts of the country, can suffer no opposition, and are blind to the consideration that the states have not too many ties to connect them with one another: they see an aristocrat in a well dressed banker, who, used to order, naturally dislikes their rowing, noisy, bullying ways; and, reckless of the consequences, they pursue the institution with an inveteracy unworthy of the chiefs of the party, but which these latter submit to, where they don't provoke it themselves, for their own especial ends. This policy was first introduced by Jefferson; he saw where the elements of power would be found when the great Washington should have departed, and paid his court accordingly, as I have sufficiently shown in the account of my residence in the federal city, where it was amusing to see the game going on, while Jefferson had still so much respect for European opinion as to take occasion to tell me how often he washed his feet,—no doubt, lest I should suppose from his dress that he was really an unclean animal.'

After detailing some of the many dangers through which the American banks passed between those days and our own, Sir Augustus concludes with the furious measures of Jackson, and says—

'In England, though we love to subdue opposition, yet we like it to subsist and be respectable: the Americans, on the contrary, must trample it under foot and break the elements of which it was composed. It is to be hoped the time may never come when they will do worse, and take the bloody democracies of the middle ages for a model.'

The chapter on the city and state of New York is equally interesting. He says—

'In conformity with the pettifogging jealousy towards the real capital that exists in many other parts of the United States, New York, like Pennsylvania, is forced to fix the seat of government in a small town, Albany, where the rustic legislators may not be subject to have their feelings wounded by seeing fine horses, equipages, or dress, or any other outward and visible mark of superiority of style to their own. One would have supposed that such great politicians might have preferred to live in the centre of arts and sciences, trade and commerce, where minds of every description meet and improve one another by mutual interchange of ideas, and the polish of social life which emollit mores nec sinit esse feros; but the dreams of philanthropists are destined to be deceived in this respect as in many others, and the poor commonplace passions of envy, jealousy, and parsimony, as well as a certain want of concern for the dignity of the government, lead the other way—while the paltry argument about a central spot being necessary, as if the whole state were a wheel, is opposed by the majority to any advantages of humanisation or instruction to be derived from the chief members of the state residing in a large city. Thus men in office are to be found in one place, where, from having no other occupation, being generally without their families, they overdose themselves with politics from morning till night—and the men of business or pleasure live at the opposite extremity, with little or no influence upon the counsels of the government. No wonder foreigners feel the effects of such a schism, and, according as they are clever mal-contents or mere travellers, rule the social world at New York, or rail against it. It is the intermixture of all classes that renders the great cities of Europe generally the centres of civilisation; but here, in this New World, a preference seems to be given to twopenny-halfpenny considerations of personal or local importance, and Albany will, no doubt, have to yield in time to some upstart place, like Harrisburgh in Pennsylvania, which was said to be about to carry the twenty-cents-per-mile legislators away from Lancaster.

'I know of but one country in Europe where the principle has been acted upon of fixing the seat of government arbitrarily in the centre of the land, and that has certainly not held out a fortunate example, Madrid being notoriously a forced fruit, even at the present day, which would soon be reduced to its original insignificance without the presence of the court. Had Charles V. or Philip II. established his capital at Seville or at Lisbon, when one or the other might have done so, what a different degree of interest would not Spain have then taken in questions of trade and commerce, and what a magnificent city her metropolis might ere now have become! . .

'The jealousy against the English system of inheritance is even stronger in the American states than it is in France; yet, do what they will, either of them, they cannot prevent there being classes in society, and the existence of very rich as well as very poor persons; and even if we could arrive at establishing infinite divisions of property among scores of children, how would the inhabitants of towns be supported? How could watchmakers, cabinetmakers, coachmakers, &c. &c., and all those who are settled, not on a rich soil, but on granite pavement, contrive to exist? It is the selfish vanity of paltry little purse-holders, without taste or talents, which is at the bottom of it all; they would, if they could, all of them be lords; and yet what else is the English system but an attempt to regulate this love of distinction natural to man, by urging us to acquire through honest or honourable deeds of every kind and description? We have a class, of which the main part, it must be owned, have been elevated by accident of birth; but it is necessary to have a nucleus somewhere, and human imperfection does not admit of a better.'

States, where he found far more to please him than in the south or the west:—

'Never did land answer better to its name, or better bear the comparison of being a scion from its parent tree; and if many of our bilious travellers—who come to America to get rid of tyranny, they say, but really of bile, of which they go back with a double portion—if they were but half as fond as they pretend to be of honest, simple manners, rural felicity, and plain, independent good sense, without any mixture of brawling ostentation, or the Utopian nonsense of ultra-political ranters and constitution-hunters—they might here find ample satisfaction, and the accomplishment of all that the march of intelligence can effect, with the aid of morality and sound religious zeal.

'The soil of Connecticut certainly is not the most fertile, but it is perhaps the best cultivated of any in the Union. The inhabitants are a hardy race, very thickly located for America; and the country, which is full of hills and valleys and granite rocks, abounds in beautiful villages, with neat white churches—while there is a cleanliness and an English air about every thing, even to the labourers, who take off their hats in passing you, which one meets with nowhere else on the American side of the Atlantic. What will surprise our grievance-seekers too, is, that this state, though its constitution be perhaps the most democratic in theory of any in the world, is, in its relations with the federal government, looked upon as the main-stay of aristocracy, and its deputies were, I believe, to a man, the most uncompromising opponents of Mr. Jefferson's policy: but order, good breeding, and a strict attention to religious duties, which are all qualities universally to be found in this small district, would necessarily pass for aristocratic habits among the liberty-boys of the west—while towards the south they was acquired by a life spent among slaves, or a boisterous white population, tyrants at home, for the most part, and democrats abroad, are just the very reverse of those which render the people of these parts democrats at home and aristocrats abroad; for such is the strange contrast to be observed in comparing the politicians of Connecticut with those of Virginia. The latter, with Jefferson and Madison at their head, were notorious for their democratic tendencies; and even Thomas Moore, the poet, could not endure it, styling it "a Gallic garbage of philosophy;" yet in their own houses were they surrounded with slaves; and John Randolph, who began life by being a demagogue—a course that vanity generally takes as the speediest step to notoriety, since it dispenses with the necessity of having a previous character—John Randolph, I say, assured me that possession of slaves was necessary to the formation of a perfect gentleman, which he held himself to be, and in fact was, in most things, not only as respects the world at large, but also his own slaves, whom he treated not merely with the kindness of a gentleman, but, as the Irish would say, of a real gentleman. Owners of slaves, however, among themselves, are all for keeping down every kind of superiority; and from being rivals in their own states for the voice of the people, whom they court by dressing and looking like them as much as they can, they frequently acquired tastes and habits more suited to a tavern than a house of representatives. I speak of the major part—for there were still many Virginian planters in my time distinguished by their aristocratic air and manners; but generally speaking, one could almost at a glance discern, from his superior personal appearance, the federal member of the most democratic, from the democratic member of the most aristocratic state in the Union. The climate, and the non-existence of slavery, may account in part for this; but we may likewise trace the difference to a purer descent from English ancestry, unmixed and uncontaminated with French, German, Dutch, or any other foreign blood; and it is no doubt the good sense which the New Englander thus inherited that tempers and renders harmless a silly constitution, which given to any other people, would probably have long ago set them together by the ears.'

A note of much later date is here introduced. It is short, but every word pregnant with meaning:—

'Since my departure clamour and the excitement caused by war have at length triumphed over the good sense of Connecticut, and a majority has been found passionate enough to trample under foot the rude old democratic constitution of this state, which, however originally defective, had become polished and well adapted to their use. This was one of those changes that are sometimes easily accomplished even by a minority at first very insignificant, when the youth of a country are roused to join in the hunt with a few demagogues, or wild visionaries, who have purposes of their own to carry. In a healthy condition of things the young men are too much under the influence of their families to render it easy for the ambitious to lead them into their private schemes; it is only in an epoch of rage and excitement that the thing becomes practicable; and therefore it is that revolution and war are ardently desired by rash or designing men, who have little to lose, and every thing to gain, by desperate lotteries; the real majority, which is in fact at such times weak, being no longer listened to, must go to the wall, until their opponents become calm once more—stated with gain, or stilled by death.

'The measure, then, of changing the constitution has been carried into effect; and as no return to the former state of things is now to be looked for, we can only hope that the habits of the people of Connecticut—too strongly rooted to take injury from a bad constitution, made good afterwards by friction—will be equally unaffected by useless innovation; and that, like their English prototypes, they will laugh at the occasional attempts which are made by temporary majorities, to alter their habits or their morals by altering their laws.'

We have abstained from quoting the parts of these chapters that relate to the political negotiations in which Sir Augustus Foster was engaged during both his residences at Washington. His conduct in leaving America so soon as he did, in 1812, was blamed by many at the time, but he had the satisfaction to find, on reaching London, that it was entirely approved of by Lord Liverpool and the Prince Regent, whose reception of him at Carlton House he paints rather amusingly:—

'The King, on this occasion, received me in his dressing-gown, Lord Liverpool being in plain clothes

while I was in uniform, which His Majesty observed was not necessary, asking Lord Liverpool why he had not told me to come in plain dress. He then desired us to sit down, and began questioning me about the American government, saying, jokingly, that he had heard not only the Minister of War but the Minister for Foreign Affairs were become soldiers, and commanded corps; and when I told him it was very true, he laughed, and, turning round, exclaimed, "By G——, Liverpool, you should copy their example, and then, by G——, you know, you might execute your favourite plan of a march upon Paris." Liverpool said he had been a soldier, and so he was, with Lord Castlereagh, in the ranks of the London Volunteers, in the year 1805, when an invasion was expected, and all took up arms, to the amount, including army and navy, of 750,000 men. The King little expected at the time he held the above conversation with Lord Liverpool that, in the course of the very next year, the march on Paris would have become very feasible, and that within the two succeeding years the prediction of his celebrated speech, when he was Lord Hawkesbury, would twice be accomplished.'

Respecting the present difficulties of the boundary question, Sir Augustus has some very temperate reflections. He is of opinion that the first step ought to be for the British and American governments to buy up all the claims of individuals to property in the soil of the disputed territory;—which being done, he cannot suppose that a mixed commission, composed of men of high character and standing, could find much difficulty in agreeing on an amicable settlement. He does not, however, indulge in any very sanguine hope of this plan being adopted. The American government, he says, have already shown sufficient symptoms of the paralysis under which their better feelings are kept by the pressure of the democracy; and he adds that the successive governments on both sides of the water have also shown but too plainly, in regard to this as well as other matters, their resolution to 'shove off' serious responsibilities, and leave them for their successors. The peace of Versailles was allowed to pass—a still more favourable opportunity in 1814—and another, as was observed in our last Number, so lately as 1833. Our author concludes thus:—

'It is my earnest hope that the unreasonable pretensions of the State of Maine, joined to the rowing, bullying humour of its neighbours on the northern line of frontiers, may not lead to a fresh quarrel with us; but if it does do so, I am convinced such quarrel will have bad consequences for the whole Union, inasmuch as, by giving a temporary triumph to the noisy, turbulent portion of the people, it will at length fully expose the weakness of the central government, and rouse up the old English good sense of the eastern states to act for itself; when the Congress must either listen to its dictates, or its authority will fall to the ground altogether, and a new and more powerful republic be raised on its ruins, that all the remaining force of the United States would fail of being able to overawe, much less to subdue.'

We cannot conclude without once more hinting our hope that Sir Augustus Foster may give these notes to the public at large. The specimens now quoted will, we are persuaded, induce both friends and strangers, in England and in America, to unite in our wishes. They contain many striking illustrations of the inevitable tendency of radicalism in power to debase the morals as well as the manners of a nation—illustrations doubly valuable because they come from one who has evidently never allowed the coarse violences of the American democracy, and the selfish hypocrisy of those who direct its energies for their own interests, to interfere with his appreciation of the better classes, whom this democracy has systematically outraged, but who, we are disposed to believe, have been of late recovering some of their just and natural influence. Our extracts, however, have left untouched several of the subjects on which the Baronet appears to have bestowed especial thought and care—in particular the details of agricultural management in the different provinces, on which he descants with the zeal, and exhibits the practical knowledge, of a well-educated and widely travelled country gentleman.

SONNETS TO ——

I.

I NEVER asked for words of thine to prove Thy deep—thy fond devotion unto me;
(I long had marked it, and an answering love Slowly awakened in my heart to thee.)
My watchful eye could read it in thy glance,
That ever brightened up when I came near;
And if my hand met thine amid the dance,
The start—the flushing cheek—have told how dear
My presence was to thee: and still, though nought
Came from thy lips to warrant such belief,
Yet my quick ear, unknown to thee, hath caught
The secret sigh that gave thy heart relief.
And upon mine its stolen echoes fell—
Revealing the fond truth thy lips were slow to tell.

II.

At length it seemed as if a spell were broken,
And silence from thy lips unloosed her chain,
And words arose (such words as then were spoken
I ne'er had heard, I ne'er shall hear again!)
My bosom beat with uncontroll'd emotion,
Whilst thou, in whispers tremulous and low
As the soft wind that stirs the aspen bough,
Breathed forth the tale of long concealed devotion!
'Twas only, then, I knew the depth—the force—
Of that long love, which silence could not hide!—
Strong as the mountain torrent in its course,
And gentle as the flowers upon its side!
'Twas then, and only then that thou didst know
My heart was thine alone, with all it could bestow!

THE COLMANS.

Biography has a peculiar interest for all ranks. To be able to look into the private character of individuals who have been long conspicuous in public life, is in itself a speculation so amusing as to be one of the perpetual employments of society—an employment which, though it may degenerate into gossiping and scandal, yet, when rationally pursued, is as innocent as it is interesting. With what eagerness would we not peruse an exact and minute memoir of the private life of any of the great men of antiquity!—with what delight do we listen to the marking traits of character in the leaders of our own time! How many volumes have been published of the anecdotes, the sayings, and the habits of Napoleon! How gladly would we have heard a thousandfold more of the studies in which Chatham formed his oratory, or his still greater son his principles; of the secret progress of those powerful impulses, which, like the crystallisation that forms the diamond in the mine, were yet to flash such brilliancy in the glorious imagination of Burke; or the gradual growth of those profound faculties which made "Newton master of the mysteries of the planetary system, and in Bacon gave a new spirit to the science of his country and his age!"

The lives of the three Colmans are certainly not the lives of philosophers; but the advantage of biography is, that it turns every thing to knowledge. It is human nature exhibited to human nature; the mirror in which, though a thousand faces may be exhibited in succession, or even together, every man may see and study his own. These volumes are a compilation confessedly, and altogether too much so, to reflect any credit on their authorship; but they are perhaps only the more amusing. The Colmans filled a space in the public eye for a century; and the last of the race was the most public of them all.

The grandfather of the late George Colman was a man of some public distinction. Mr. Francis Colman, marrying the sister of Mrs. Pulteney, afterwards Countess of Bath, was naturally in the way of public life, and in 1721 he was appointed resident British Minister at Vienna. In the fragments of correspondence which this appointment produced between him and Pulteney, we are brought back amongst the names of the last century. Pulteney writes from Chevening, the seat of Earl Stanhope, inviting the new minister to visit him on his way to Dover, and bidding him bring with him Williams, (the noted Sir Charles Hanbury) further bidding him persuade John Gay to come on horseback to join the party. Sir Charles was eccentric from his cradle; and after acting a good deal, which established his character for flightiness, and writing a good deal, which he had better never have written, died lunatic in 1759. He had been British Minister at Berlin.

The name of John Gay is familiar to all who are acquainted with the authorship of the last century. He was born a courtier, and spent all his life hanging on the skirts of the Court, or dependent on great people. Thus he was successively secretary to the Duchess of Monmouth, and to the Earl of Clarendon in his German embassy. He repaid the attentions of his noble patrons by his wit; and, in return for protection, at least assisted them in their way to fame. But it would have been better for his happiness if he had lived in the attic, thanking nothing for his subsistence but his pen; and a more secure way to fame, if he had written nothing but Beggars' Operas. A letter from Gay, dated Bath, 1721, is a specimen of his light gossiping style:—

"I live almost altogether with Lord Burlington, and pass my time very agreeably. I left Chiswick about three weeks ago, and have been ever since at the Bath, for the cholical humour in my stomach that you have often heard me complain of. Here is very little company that I know. I expect a summons suddenly to go with Lord Burlington into Yorkshire. You must think that I cannot be now and then without some thoughts that give me uneasiness, who have not the least prospect of being ever independent. My friends do a great deal for me; but I think I could do more for them. Mr. Pulteney and Mrs. Pulteney had some thoughts of the Bath; but I fancy their journey is put off. I saw them at Chiswick just before I left it. You will, before my letter could reach you, have heard of poor Lord Warwick's death. It has given me many a melancholy reflection. I loved him, and cannot help feeling concern whenever I think of him. Dear Colman, be as cheerful as you can: never sink under disappointment. I give you the advice which I have always been obliged to follow, though I hope you will never have occasion to practise it."

Gay was unlucky, but as in the case of most unlucky men, he generally had reason to reproach himself. At least, in one instance he was the victim of his own imprudence. He was at one time in the possession of stock in the celebrated South Sea scheme, which he could have sold for twenty thousand pounds. Swift, who knew the world, advised him by all means at least to purchase an annuity with a part of it, as a security against chance; but Gay would detract nothing from his golden heap, and suddenly saw it vanish into air. A letter from Pulteney is equally characteristic of a higher man, and one better acquainted with the ways of men.—After giving some commissions to Colman, who was then at Florence, he says—

"Now I have given you this trouble, I must take a further liberty, and you must not be angry if I chide you a little for your extravagance. What makes you throw away your money in presents? I am much concerned for your expense on my account, and I blame you for it on every other body's. Believe me, Colman, there are few people worth valuing so much as to make one's self a farthing the poorer for them. For my part, I own that I am grown quite out of humour with the world; and the more I grow acquainted with it, the less I like it. There is such a thing as cunning, there is falsehood, and there are views of self-interest, that mix themselves in almost all the friendships that are contracted between man and man. Those make friendships hardly worth cultivating any where; I am sure nowhere worth being at any considerable charge to preserve them.

Memoirs of the Colman Family, including their Correspondence, etc. By R. B. Peake. 2 vols. London.

Do not mistake what I have said. I mean it not particularly to any one person, but in general."

We regret that these letters are not more numerous. They are the gems of the book. A letter from Lord Chesterfield says, in rather a singular style, speaking of a foreign nobleman who was then in London:—

"I have been to wait upon him, and to offer him what services I could do him here, which are none at all; since, as you very well know, it is impossible to break through the inhospitality of this country enough to make any foreigner pass his time tolerably here. He has been ill of a fever almost ever since his arrival in this country, and seems to have so indifferent an opinion, both of our climate and our politeness, that I believe he will not stay very long."

The inhospitality was probably an allusion to the formality of the court, whose German etiquette was new to the English in 1727, the date of the letter, and formed a heavy contrast with the animation of foreign life. The charge of want of either courtesy or liberality, was never applicable to the higher orders in this country. But he proceeds in a livelier and more characteristic strain:—

"I am very sorry you could imagine that an absence of seven years, or even twice that time, could remove you from the thoughts of one who always thought of your friendship and acquaintance with the utmost satisfaction; and must take this opportunity of desiring in reality, what I shall soon be obliged to desire in form, the honour and pleasure of your correspondence. I hope, too, that our long acquaintance will justify me in desiring that I may be on a more free footing than barely from his Majesty's Minister at Florence, to his Majesty's Minister at the Hague."

Chesterfield was a more remarkable man than our generation is inclined to believe. His "study" of manners has thrown a colour of frivolity over his fame; and the courtier or the dancing master intercepts the merit of a man who figured among the leading personages of a brilliant and vigorous time. Chesterfield succeeded in every task which he undertook. In his embassy to Holland, then the centre of European diplomacy, he was the leading diplomatist, and probably the most effective instrument of at once restraining the ambition of France, and securing the stability of the Hanoverian succession. In his viceroyalty of Ireland, he kept down the violence of the national parties, and was popular with all. His gayety there was in its natural element, his wit is still remembered; and he stands on record as the only viceroy who ever left behind him a permanent memorial of his manly and judicious interest in the gratification of the people. The inhabitants of the Irish metropolis owe to Chesterfield a noble park, as large as the three parks of London united, and one of the most beautiful and valuable contributions to the health and indulgence of a great city, as it was one of the earliest in Europe.

As diplomacy in the little Italian courts was generally a very sinecure affair, the English envoys soon fell into the national ways, and evidently thought that the opera was the grand work for which man, woman, and minister were made. The box at the opera was their cabinet; the settlement of theatrical melees their chief employment abroad; and the engagement of singers and dancers the chief subject of their correspondence at home. It is curious to observe the great Handel adopting this view of the Tuscan envoy's functions, and writing to Colman as his accredited plenipotentiary to the Signori and Donne of the land of song.

After stating some opera engagements—among which he required, that the female singer engaged should be equal to perform in men's characters as well as those of her own sex—the great composer proceeds in a strain which shows how little the opera generation have changed during the last hundred years:—

"I take the liberty of again saying to you, to say nothing whatever in your contracts of first parts, seconds, or thirds; for this is a source of annoyance to us in the choice of performance, and in other ways produces great inconvenience. We also hope to have, by your help, a man and woman for the approaching season; which begins with October of the present year, and ends with July 1731; and we wait with anxiety to hear news of them, that we may inform the court."

Colman performed his bidding with activity, and at last had the diplomatic triumph of inducing Signor Senesino to condescend to sing before the British court and nobility for one thousand four hundred guineas—a sum which, calculating at the present expense of living, would not be far short of three thousand now. Handel concludes with congratulations on this national service,—"It is to your generous assistance that the court and the nobility owe in part the satisfaction of having a company to their taste, so that nothing remains for me but the expression of my personal thanks," &c. But some real business was now about to be done, even in the land of the lazy. Florentine negotiation was put on the qui vive by the death of the Duke of Parma, the succession to whose pretty, but very little sovereignty, was given to Don Carlos. Pulteney again writes to Colman: his letter has the exact language of an angry politician of the 19th century,—"I must disguise my sentiments extremely, if I enter in the least into the consideration of public affairs, without abusing those fools—I mean our ministers—who have the conducting them. Do not be frightened at what I have said; for this comes to you by a very safe hand." (He then mentions a gentleman by whom he sends some pamphlets:) "He will give you a set of the Craftsman, which you must put, like the monks, into that part of your library which they call L'Inferno; and be sure, like them, to read those books more than any in the rest of the library. There are some other pamphlets, which, old as they are, will be new and entertaining to you." We have given this fragment, chiefly for the sake of the anecdote which accompanies it. It is an additional proof of the absurdity of duelling. In a pamphlet, called "Sedition and Defamation displayed," (which the biographer conceives to have been in this packet,) Pulteney had been attacked, and, supposing that the author was Lord Hervey, vice-chamberlain of the household, he had treated his lordship with the usual keenness of his pen, in "A proper Reply to a late scurrilous Libel, entitled Sedition and Defamation displayed." Lord

Hervey's retort was a challenge to fight with swords in the Green Park, in the same afternoon. The Green Park must have been then a somewhat less popular promenade than at present; or those two warriors must have made a formidable figure to the nursery-maids and children. After four or five passes, Pulteney gave his lordship two wounds, one in the arm and the other in the neck; they then rushed in upon each other, but were separated by their seconds. The wounds were fortunately slight; but the next thrust might have been murderous; and, after all, Lord Hervey was not the author, even if this kind of vengeance could be justice. The writer was Sir William Young, the secretary-at-war.

But the Florentine Minister himself was now to undergo the common lot. His health declined in 1732, and, after removing to Pisa for change of air, he died early in the next year.

His son George, father of the more celebrated wit and dramatist of our day, was born at Florence in 1732. On the death of the Minister, his boy was in some degree adopted by Pulteney, who sent him to Westminster school. There he was contemporary with Warren Hastings, Lloyd the poet, and Hinchliffe, Smith, and Vincent, who successively rose to be head-masters. Nicolls was the principal, and Vincent Bourne, the writer of the well-known Latin verses, was one of the ushers. Colman profited by this school. At the election in 1751, he was placed at the head of the list of Westminster scholars for Oxford. The nomination, however, did not take place, as Pulteney, now Earl of Bath, was of opinion that, by remaining a year longer, he would make a more distinguished figure. The Earl's extraordinary care of Colman, coupled with his equally extraordinary love for his purse, gave rise to the indecent rumour that he was the Earl's son. But a comparison of dates proves that this was out of the question, supposing the Earl to have been profligate enough for such an event. Mrs. Colman had been living in Italy five years before the birth of her son. On the other hand, Pulteney was a decorous man; and the attentions of his countess to the boy, even if the dates had not been sufficient, would have deservedly discountenanced the charge.

Colman, at last, was admitted into the society of Lincoln's Inn, where Lord Bath constantly urged him to diligence in his profession; but he foolishly chose to imagine himself born to another destiny. In 1754 he engaged with the well-known Bonnell Thornton in writing the periodical paper called the Connoisseur. To those who know the natural fate of periodical writers, such a commencement at such an age was decisive of neglect in his profession. Colman was thenceforth stamped an idler for life, and of all idlers the most incurable, a busy idler. Some years now passed, in which he occasionally went circuit, and wrote poems and parodies. He at last ventured on a farce, named Polly Honeycomb; finally, the Jealous Wife appeared in 1761, which brought the author great reputation, and, unluckily for himself, fixed him as a dramatist for life. The St. James's Chronicle was then established by Mr. Baldwin, a man of ability and character; aided by Thornton, Garrick, Colman, and Stevens; and by their connexions, activity, and wit, he soon brought the paper into celebrity. Colman contributed essays, entitled "The Genius." However, we may conceive that his natural volatility soon prevailed; for his essays went no farther than the fifteenth number. There were other evidences of the society in which he engaged, more discreditable. His son, the late George Colman, was an illegitimate child, born October 21st, 1762. July, 1763, Colman published another paper, "Terræ filius;" but this son seems soon to have speedily gone to his mother. About this period the Earl made a short continental tour, of which Miss Carter, the authoress, who accompanied the family, gives some light anecdotes.

"At Spa, the Prince Bishop of Augsburg kept a table, and invited all the company by turns. We have already been there three times. It is a very illustrious visit, and a very dull one. The dining with a sovereign prince is an affair of more honour than pleasure. One circumstance is very awkward to little folks, that the attendants are all men of quality; and we must all either choke with thirst, or employ a count or a baron to bring us a glass of water. An 'Excellence,' with an embroidered star comes to us from His Highness when dinner is on table, which is half an hour after twelve. There is a world of English arrived within the week; very few French, but German counts and barons innumerable."

She proceeds to tell us—"That the manners of the German princes are unaffected and agreeable; but their dress is so ridiculously stiff, that the first time I saw them altogether, they put me in mind of King Pharaoh's court in a puppet-show. The variety of dress in the company here, makes the first coup-d'œil on the walks of the Geronsterre very amusing; priests and hussars, beaux and hermits, nuns and fine ladies, stars and crosses, cowls and ribbons, all blended together in the most lively and picturesque manner imaginable. The streets are all day long crowded with people, without any bustle or noise; all the company is very peaceable and quiet, and there seem to be none of those fashionable pests of society, the bucks and 'choice spirits' among us; and I thought I felt a little foolish at hearing one of my foreign friends observe, most maliciously, that it would not be known that there were any of our country at Spa, if a footman did not now and then run through the streets screaming in English after a stray 'dog.'"

The volumes are agreeably diversified with letters from great people and from little ones. Some of them from Garrick, who, perhaps, was to be called both great and little. In 1673, the actor and his wife had set out for a tour of the Continent. We give a fragment of his letter to Colman from Paris. It is gayly clever, and cleverly gay:

"You cannot imagine, my dear Colman, what honours I have received from all kinds of people here. The nobles and the literati have made so much of me, that I am quite ashamed of opening my heart even to you. Marmontel has written to me the most flattering letter upon our supping together; I was in spirits, and so was 'the Clairon,' who supped with us at Mr. Neville's. She got up to set me a going, and spoke something in Racine's Athalie most charmingly; upon which I gave him the 'dagger scene' in Macbeth, the 'curse' in Lear, and the 'falling asleep' in Sir John Brute; the consequence of which is, that I am now stared at in the playhouse, and talked of by gentle and simple as the most wonderful wonder of wonders. The first person I find going to England, shall bring you Marmontel's letter. D'Alembert was one of the company, and sings my praises to all the authors of 'The Encyclopedia.'"

Garrick had left his brother George to take care of the theatre, as acting manager. George was a character. He was much attached to his celebrated brother, and perhaps a little in awe of him; for David could be imperious where the theatre was concerned. One part of George's occupation was curious enough—it was, to walk behind the scenes while his brother was playing; and, when any of the loungers there began to speak, to silence them by—"Hush, hush"—as David, while performing, was extremely nervous about noise of this order.

Some one happening to observe that George's salary was considerable, asked for what purpose it was given? Charles Bannister pleasantly replied—"It was Hush-money."

Nightly, on George's coming to the theatre, his first enquiry was—"Has David wanted me?" On his death, which happened soon after that of the great actor, the players said, "David wanted him."

Johnson was remarkable for speaking contemptuously of Garrick, as "little Davy," but for never suffering any one else to speak even carelessly of him. Sir Joshua Reynolds, timid as he was, ventured to write a little dialogue touching on this peculiarity. It stole into print under the auspices of his niece the Marchioness of Thomond, in 1816, when the Ursa Major was long gone where critics growl no more. The dialogue was supposed to be between Gibbon and the Doctor.

"Gibbon.—You must allow, Dr. Johnson, that Garrick was too much a slave to fame, or rather to the mean ambition of living with the great; and terribly afraid of making himself cheap, even with them, by which he debarred himself of much pleasant society. Employing so much attention, and so much management, upon such little things, implies, I think, a little mind. It was observed by his friend Colman, that he never went into company but with a plot how to get out of it; he was every minute called out, and went off or returned, as there was or was not a probability of his shining.

"Johnson.—Sir, in regard to his mean ambition, as you call it, of living with the great, what was the boast of Pope, and is every man's wish, can be no reproach to Garrick. He who says he despises it, knows he lies. That Garrick husbanded his fame, the fame which he had justly acquired, both at the theatre and at the table, is not denied; but where is the blame, either in the one or the other, of leaving as little as he could to chance? Sir, Garrick left nothing to chance."

A letter from Garrick describes his arrival at Naples, and a very animated and amusing letter it is:

December 16, 1763.

"We got to this place after a most disagreeable journey from Rome, for we were overtaken in the midst of the heavy rains here, and were well soaked with them all the way. At present the weather is inconceivably fine, and we are basking in a warm sun, with the Mediterranean at our feet, and Mount Vesuvius in our view. Though it is Christmas, we have green peas every day, and dine with our windows open. These are our pleasures in part. As for our distresses since we left Rome, which have been as ridiculous as unexpected, and are the common occurrences upon the road, I shall reserve them for our social hours at Hampton. We are all at this moment in the highest spirits, and I am much the better for my expedition.

"My Lady Oxford, who is settled here, and has the greatest interest with the first people, has been most uncommonly kind to us. I am to have the honour and satisfaction of seeing the King's Italian actors perform before him in the palace—a most extraordinary favour. They perform extempore, and the nobleman who stands in the place of the Lord Chamberlain has sent me word, that if I will write down any drama with the fable, and give the argument only of the scenes, they shall play it in twenty-four hours before me—the greatest compliment they can pay me. I shall work at it, to-morrow. I hear there is one great genius among the performers." He proceeds with that kind of excitement, which animates every one at the first sight of Italy.

"The situation and climate of this place are most extraordinary, and the people still more so. They are a new race of beings, and I have the highest entertainment in going amongst them, and observing their characters from the highest to the lowest. I was last night at their great theatre, San Carlo—a most magnificent one indeed. I was really astonished at first coming into it; it was quite full, and well lighted up, but it is too great, and the singers were scarcely heard. The famous Gabrielli pleased me much; she has a good person, is the best actress I ever saw on an opera stage, but she sings more to the ear than to the heart. I cannot quit you till I say something about Rome. I hardly slept the night before I arrived there, with the thoughts of seeing it. My heart beat high, my imagination expanded itself, and my eyes flashed again, as I drew near the Porte del Popolo; but the moment I entered it, I fell at once from my airy vision and Utopian ideas, into a very dirty, ill-looking place, as they call it, with three crooked streets in front, terminated, indeed, at this end with two tolerable churches. What a disappointment! My spirits sank, and it was with reluctance I was dragged, in the afternoon, to see the Pantheon; but, Heavens! what was my pleasure and surprise! I never felt so much in my life, as when I entered that glorious structure; I gasped, but could not speak for some minutes. It is so very noble, that it has not been in the power of modern foppery or Popery—for it is a church, you know—to extinguish its grandeur and elegance."

Gabrielli, who is mentioned with so much applause in this lively letter, was one of those wonders which Italy produces, from time to time, to astonish the musical world. She was the Catalini of the last century; her voice singularly powerful—yet, as Garrick observes, she sang more to the ear than to the heart. That extraordinary volubility and execution which turns the voice into a violin, was to be the work of a later day; but her execution was the astonishment of her contemporaries. Yet her talents made her insolent, and she constantly destroyed her popularity by her caprice. Of course she had high salaries, but she squandered them as fast as they came. One of her caprices was, always to have some lover in every city where she had an engagement, and unless this lover sat in the stage box, she would either refuse to sing altogether, or sang so languidly, as to exhibit her contempt for the audience. This custom, at last, became so well known, that when any particular display of her talents was required, as for the presence of a prince or a crowned head, the manager was compelled to engage the presence of the lover in the box, as much as that of the heroine on the stage. Her talents had made her a great favourite at Vienna, in those days the first stage of all the great Italian performers on crossing the mountains. But her insolence at last drove her from Vienna, and she made the triumphal tour of Europe, with the exception of England. She had conceived such an idea of our John Bullism, and of our little respect for the violences of a showy termagant, that she declared herself afraid to venture among us.

"For," said she, "were I to take it into my head not to sing, I am told that the people there would mob me, and perhaps break my bones. Now, I like to sleep in a sound skin, even if it were in a prison."

But though Garrick, like other travellers, is all enraptured with a few fine days in December, all is not sunshine, even in "Bella Italia" itself. A letter from Rome in the height of the summer, gives an account of the weather, than which, England, open as it is to all the clouds of the Atlantic, could have furnished nothing more disastrous.

"About three days ago, the Pope, his life-guards, and other attendants, made a grand procession to St. Peter's, but unfortunately on their return, such a storm of wind, rain, thunder and lightning arose, that it put the Pope's guards in a fright. They who were on horseback, rode away as fast as they could, and they who had no horses, ran for it as fast as their legs could carry them. The Pope had six horses to his carriage, the postilions cut the harness of the first four, and joined the rest of the party; leaving, like most undutiful children, their most holy father with no other attendants than the coachman, and two horses to draw the carriage, which was larger than our king's coach. A rider on horseback, who supported the fine golden cross before the Pope, endeavouring to make a precipitate retreat, was thrown down, horse and all, but recovered, with no damage but his fears, and the mortification of beholding some contusions on his cross. The Romans are much chagrined at the circumstance, and say that it affords matter of great satisfaction to the heretics."

Among these documents, is a characteristic letter from the celebrated Sterne—characteristic in every sense, of oddity, poverty, and easy impudence of borrowing from a man whom all his borrowers described as the most niggardly personage in the world. Sterne was then going on his "Sentimental journey," and this was his easy note:—

"Dear Garrick,

"Upon reviewing my finances this morning, with some unforeseen expenses, I find I should set out with £20 less than a prudent man ought. Will you lend me twenty pounds?

"Yours, L. Sterne."

Lord Bath continued his attentions to Colman, notwithstanding his truantry in abandoning the law—which the earl had expressly chosen for him—and adopting the stage, the very last pursuit which could have satisfied the great senator. Still he had continued his kindness to this precipitate relative, and his last instance of regard was to leave him an annuity, which, according to the newspapers, was nine hundred guineas a year; a sum, however, extremely inadequate to the expectations of Colman, who seems to have looked to the succession to his estate, the earl having lost his only son some time before, and being on bad terms with his brother, General Pulteney. It yet seems sufficiently natural, that if the heirship had ever been intended for him, his giddy change of profession, and his utter heedlessness of advice, might have altered the disposal of this great property. Pulteney died worth upwards of a million of money.

Lady Harvey, the widow of John Lord Harvey, thus speaks of Pulteney's decease:—

"I am really sorry for the death of poor Lord Bath, who, though of a great age, might have lived much longer. He had his understanding as much as ever, enjoying company, and partly contributing to its enjoyment. He threw away his life by a needless piece of complaisance, in drinking tea out of doors, after being heated by a great deal of company, and a good deal of mirth at dinner. His was not an age, nor is ours a climate, for those al frescos. It was thoughtless in those who proposed it, and weakly complaisant in him who complied with it. From various circumstances, I have seen him but seldom for many years past; but whenever we did meet he was always the same, and ever cheerful and good company. He was to me like a sum in a bank, of which, though I made but little immediate use, I could always be sure of having my draft answered."

In a subsequent letter, this shrewd and evidently rather sarcastic lady, thus finishes the sketch:—"Lord Bath's leaving me no little bauble, in token of remembrance, did not surprise, and consequently did not vex me. He was a most agreeable companion, and a very good humoured man; but I, who have known him above forty years, knew that he never thought of any one when he did not see them, nor ever cared a great deal for those he did see. He has left an immense fortune to a brother he never cared for, and always with reason despised, and a great deal to a man he once liked, but lately had great reason to think ill of, (perhaps Colman.) I am sorry he is dead; he was very agreeable and entertaining, and, whenever I was well enough to go down stairs and give him a good dinner, he was always ready to come and give me his good company in return. I was satisfied with that. One must take people as they are; perhaps hardly any are, in every respect, what they ought to be."

We have given those fragments relative to Pulteney, from the interest which belongs to one of the most celebrated senatorial names of England. He was confessedly the first speaker in a parliament which numbered Walpole, Windham, Bolingbroke, Harley, and a crowd of able men. His public career was in opposition; but his antagonist, Walpole, with all the power of office, always writhed at the bold and haughty scourge of the "great Commoner," a title afterwards given to Chatham.

Garrick's Italian trip may have amused him, but it seems to have done him but little good. He thus writes from Munich on his way home:—"I am most truly the Knight of the woeful countenance, and have lost legs, arms, belly, cheeks, &c. I have scarcely any thing left but bones, and a pair of dark, lack-lustre eyes, which have retired an inch or two more in their sockets, and wonderfully set off the parchment which covers the cheeks."

Every man who lives long must expect to be surrounded by deaths, but Garrick's best known contemporaries seem to have perished nearly all together. In this year, Hogarth died suddenly, after a cheerful supper at his house in Leicester Square. A man of singular talent: the first, and indeed the only example of a style combining the highest humour with the severest satire; at once sportive and grave, and playing with the lightest follies of fashion, while he was fathoming the depths of the human heart. Hogarth was next followed by his antagonist and libeller, Churchhill, a man of undoubted ability, but a ruffian; first disgracing his gown, then insulting society; a vigorous poet, though frequently lapsing into feebleness; and by nature a high spirited and generous being, though ultimately scandalised by habits which brought him to a premature grave.—The next who sank was Lloyd, an accomplished scholar, a considerable poet, and a man of keen and well furnished faculties. A course of giddiness and self-will had brought him to deserved beggary. For a while he lived on the public; when that resource failed, he lived on the bounty of his friends; at last he was thrown into the Fleet prison, where Churchhill (and it ought to be remembered to his honour) allowed him a guinea a week, and the expenses of a servant. When Churchhill's death was announced to him, he gave up all hope, took to his bed, and never left it again. Churchhill died in November, 1764; Lloyd in the December following.

Colman had now become a dramatist of name, and he combined with Garrick in producing a new comedy, perhaps his best—the "Clandestine Marriage." Its success, however, produced a species of quarrel between the authors, by dividing the fame. The quarrel was sharpened by the interference of "friends;" and all the merits being given to the great actor, and all the feebleness to the dramatist, there was the fairest probability that the quarrel would have become inveterate. But Garrick, with all his frivolity, was a man of sense, and the wound was healed. In later years, George Colman, (jun.,) thought it worth his while to enter in a long detail, claiming the authorship for his father. But the combatants and their seconds had been long swept out of the field; and no one took the trouble to renew the war. It is surely evidence enough that Garrick did not write the part of Lord Ogleby, the most original part in the play, to say, that Garrick positively refused to perform it. If it had been his own, this he certainly never would have done. But let us hear the facetious George himself. He gives a curious fragment:—

"In respect to the report of Garrick's having written the entire character of Lord Ogleby, my father once told me that it was not true; and that, as an instance to the contrary, he (my father) wrote the whole of Ogleby's first scene. He also informed me that one of Garrick's greatest merits in this work, and it is a very great one, was planning the incidents in the last act; the alarm of the families through the means of Mrs. Heidelberg and Miss Sterling; and bringing forward the various characters from their beds to produce an explanation and the catastrophe. I regret that, when my father imparted this, I did not make further enquiry; but I was then a 'moonish youth,' and troubled my head little or nothing about the matter. He always talked, however, of the play as a joint production." The Clandestine Marriage was professedly suggested by Hogarth's prints.

Theatrical propensities must be very powerful things; for, when once adopted, they seem never to be shaken off, except in prison or the grave. Colman, who apparently had lost one fortune by adopting the life of a dramatist, now lost another by adopting that of a manager. General Pulteney had offered him a seat in parliament, and to provide amply for him, "if he would quit his theatrical connexions of all kinds; he wholly disapproving of Colman's taking any part in the purchase of the patent of Covent Garden theatre." This was a singularly unlucky transaction; but it had only the fate that naturally follows the self-willed; for the General soon after died, and as there was no son in the family, Colman might, and would have inherited the whole; but he was now left but £400 a year by the will. The estates and ready money were distributed among remote branches of the family, the chief part going to the husband of the General's niece, Mr. Johnstone, who took the name of Pulteney. Some idea of the magnitude of the property may be formed from the single fact, that it comprehended the reversionary grant of all the ground in Arlington street, and all Piccadilly, from that street to Hyde Park Corner; in the whole forty acres, all built on, and at the expiration of the leases, calculated at £100,000 a year' But Colman was at last a manager.

How any man in possession of his senses will ever become the manager of a theatre, is one of those problems which we shall never attempt to solve. In nine instances out of ten, ending in the ruin of all the parties concerned, its whole course is generally one of quarrel. Colman's management commenced with an open battle, which proceeded to the length of four pamphlets, and a challenge from Harris.—Then came old Macklin, from Dublin, to embroil the fray. He had brought with him a farce, which failed instantly. A Chancery suit had by this time grown up, among the other thorns and thistles of the management. Macklin plunged into it with the spirit of one to whom litigation was his natural element, and actually himself answered all the bills in Chancery.

Actors are curious people. Smith, better known as "Gentleman Smith," from his subsequently performing such characters as Charles Surface, &c., made it an indispensable condition in his engagements that his face should "never be blackened," nor was he ever to be "lowered down a trap," as the first might disguise his beauty, and the next might endanger the elegance of his legs.

On the first night of Macklin's performance of Shylock, the crowd in the upper gallery pressing on, a man ran with such haste down the seats, that he fell over the edge, and coming on one of the chandeliers, carried it down with him, a circumstance which broke his fall, but destroyed the chandelier; the man was much hurt, but recovered at the hospital. In Rich's time, a similar accident happened, but the poor fellow had a broken limb, and recovered with difficulty. Rich, in compensation, gave him the freedom of the pit for life, adding, "provided he would never think of coming into it in that manner again." In 1773, Goldsmith's She Stoops to Conquer was produced. It had lain for some time at the theatre, and Colman had pronounced "that it could not possibly succeed." Such is the wisdom of the wise. It succeeded prodigiously. Johnson roared with laughter at its performance, and all England followed his example. The Doctor was sententious and oracular in his judgment—"Sir, there is no comedy for many years that has so exhilarated an audience—none that has so much answered the great end of comedy, that of making an audience merry!" During the performance, Goldsmith was wandering in the streets, to be out of the sound of the horrors of condemnation!

It is similarly told of Rossini, that, his Barber of Seville having failed, through an imperfect rehearsal, on the first night, he sat in his lodging on the second in terror. About the time of its conclusion, his terror was augmented by the noise of a crowd in the street. He threw himself under his bed. The chamber was soon full of people, and he was dragged out. They had come from the theatre to carry him before the audience, who would not separate until they gave their plaudits to the maestro. He was borne along in triumph to the stage, and overwhelmed with acclamation; he had made the finest modern opera in the world! Goldsmith's genius was unquestionable; but, unfortunately, his follies were equally so. After seeing fortune more than once within his reach, he was too indolent to seize it; he sank into vexation of heart; from vexation of heart into poverty; and from poverty into disease, and died at forty-five; but two years after having produced the most successful comedy of his time, and with a brilliant theatrical career before him.

The stage is not merely a strange place in itself, but it seems to communicate a portion of its eccentricity to all, however remotely connected with it. Old Macklin has been mentioned as clever, and yet he was as eccentric as any octogenarian could be.—He had a son not less eccentric than his father. This son Macklin intended for the law, but his propensity was for the theatre. To save him from the hazards of the profession, against which old experience had fully warned himself, Macklin obtained a cadetship for him in India, after having gone to considerable expense in giving him a good classical education, teaching him some of the Indian languages, and fixing him in the establishment at Woolwich, where he distinguished himself by mathematical knowledge. His eccentricity eventually destroyed his prospects. As an instance, he had a quarrel with an officer, which produced a challenge. When the parties came to the ground, Macklin appeared in a loose great coat, which covered him from head to heel, and which, as the matter proceeded, he threw off, and stood perfectly naked. Of course, he was remonstrated with for this extraordinary appearance, and his equally extraordinary answer was—"Sir, I will tell you my reason with great candour, in order that you may do the same if you like. Most of the wounds which prove mortal in India, arise from some part of the woollen or linen which a man generally carries about him, being forced in along with the ball. Now, to avoid this, I am determined to fight naked, and you may do the same." On this, the seconds, probably taking him for a madman, interfered, gave their opinions on the indecency of fighting naked, and carried both parties from the ground.

But performances of this order were not likely to be overlooked by the authorities, and Macklin was at length sent home. His father, however vexed at this termination of his prospects, attempted again to support him; but he was incorrigible. His irregularities produced disease, which finished in a lock-jaw, and he died.

Macklin's letters to this unfortunate man, contain some advice which it would be good for any one to observe. "There is no quality," says one of those letters, "which commands more respect than integrity, none more freedom and independence than economy. These are all that I have with industry to depend upon; and should you make them the rules of your conduct, you must be happy, as without them you never can. Let me repeat this doctrine to you, that he who depends upon continued industry and integrity, depends upon patrons of the most exalted kind. They more than supply the place of birth and ancestry, or even of royal patronage. They are the creatures of fortune and fame, the founders of families, and never can disappoint or desert you."

George Colman, junior, a much better known and much livelier man than his father, came early into society. The celebrated Johnson Club was then in full glow, and at his father's table he sat down with Burke, Garrick, Beauclerk, Reynolds, Foote, Gibbon, the Wartons, and several others of nearly equal distinction, with the Doctor crowning all. Colman says that this club was rated too high, or rather that society rated itself too low; for so pusillanimous in that day were educated persons in general, that they submitted to the domination of a self-chosen few, who in their turn had a despot over themselves; for while the club intimidated the town, Johnson awed the club. In one instance, when Sheridan was beginning to be a little known in the world, though before his first dramatic productions; he dined in company with Johnson and several of the club, when the doctor advanced one of his dogmas, tantamount to saying that black is white. Sheridan gave a plump negative to the doctor's affirmation, and argued against it manfully, with all the eagerness of youth. The party trembled for him, and, shrugging up their shoulders, seemed to say, "Poor young man, clever but ruined. He is rousing the lion, and it will soon be all over with him." The lion, however, was in one of his generous moods; though galled, he was not revengeful. He took his defeat, for defeated he was, in good part, and Sheridan escaped annihilation. "What times," says George, fairly enough, "when a young genius could be reputation-crushed—and that genius Sheridan—by entering into discussion with a literary dictator!" However, those things are pretty much at an end now. The Republic of Letters is on a republican footing, and the man who presumed to set himself up as a dictator, would be only laughed at. Johnson's powers would be acknowledged at all times, but his authority no longer. He would probably be paraded from dinner to dinner, for the amusement of his conversation, but society would revolt against his judgment. The whole spirit of society is changed. Conversation is no longer the sharp encounter of our wits, disputation is vulgar, and triumph is offensive. Whatever were the merits of Johnson, his manners would now be intolerable, his humour would not atone for his rudeness; he would be left to a circle of sycophants, and rapidly sink into a mere subject of the Boswells and the booksellers.

In Colman's management, he proposed bringing forward the "Beggar's Opera." On this the magistrates wrote him a letter, requesting him not to perform it, "as, in their opinion, it most undoubtedly increased the number of thieves." Colman replied, that he must consult his brother managers before withdrawing it: "but for his part, he could not help differing in opinion with the magistrates; thinking that the theatre was one of the very few houses in the neighbourhood that did not contribute to increase the number of thieves." The point of this retort was not qualified to increase his popularity with the Bow-Street magistrates.

Colman, after seven years of management, sold his share in Covent Garden theatre, and retired for a while to Bath.

The Bath theatre, in the last century, appears to have been prolific in powerful actors. While Garrick's sun was verging to its decline, Mossop came before the public with extraordinary promise. He had been educated at the Irish University, and intended for the church; but Garrick was his tempter. He had seen this memorable actor on the Irish stage, and thenceforth determined to be an actor or nothing. A succession of the chief performers of the London stage going over to Ireland, confirmed his taste for that hazardous profession; and at length, in spite of all remonstrance, he commenced player. His first appearance was in Zanga. His talents in that part surprised every one, and he was eminent at once; but, with striking abilities, he had the great drawback of an irritable temper. He quarrelled with mankind, beginning with the manager. He soon after left Ireland, and made his first step on the London boards in Richard the Third, and again succeeded in a remarkable degree. His style of acting seems to have strongly resembled that of Kean in our day, singularly vivid, subtle, and forcible; but with the defects of abruptness of delivery, and irregularity of performance. He had another great imperfection—that of believing that his talents were as unlimited as his ambition. He grasped at all the leading characters without discrimination, and, of course, played many of them without effect. His consciousness of occasional failure, only induced him to grasp at more, and with less power. At length, quitting Drury-Lane in high displeasure, he returned to Ireland. There was but another step to ruin, and he took it without delay. Inflamed with the mania of management, he declared, "that there should be but one theatre in Ireland, and that he would be at the head of it."

A declaration of this kind was a declaration of war with the theatrical world—a very dangerous world to war with; and Mossop found himself wrapped in universal hostility. He began his career with flying colours; distained to listen to the offer of a salary of £1000 a year to remain with Barry and Woodward; and rushed headlong into ruin. He struggled long; but after seven years of hopeless toil he became bankrupt, abandoned Ireland, and returned to England, once more on his own hands. But he now came a broken man in mind and body. He still retained his haughtiness. On being urged to apply to Garrick for an engagement, he replied, "that Garrick knew very well that he was in London." But Garrick saw no reason why the manager should stoop first; and Mossop was left uncalled for. He was now painfully taught the evil of a harsh temper. An application was made to the manager of Covent-Garden for an engagement; but Mrs. Barry was the chief actress there, and she positively refused to play on the same boards with Mossop—"she and her husband had been too unceasingly tormented by him in his rival theatre in Ireland, to render any association possible. This condition of things could not last long; his health sank rapidly; he roved about, with a drooping countenance and a worn-out frame, answering every enquiry for his health, by saying, "that he was better;" and every enquiry into the state of his finances, by saying, "that he wanted nothing." If his life had been prolonged, he would probably have lived a lunatic; but he was suddenly found dead in his bed, with only fourpence in his possession!

Events like those are so frequent in the history of the stage, that they have lost the power of astonishing any one; yet their warning against the indulgence of an arrogant temper, and a harsh tongue, is of importance to all. Here we have the instance of a man of great talents dying a beggar in the most popular and perhaps the most lucrative of all pursuits; for certainty there are few others, in which an individual beginning without a shilling spent on his education, or his entrance into a profession; or a shilling of capital; on the strength of talents alone may rise into immediate opulence. Mossop's ability had placed him, by a single effort, in the foremost rank of the stage; and yet, at the end of a few years, this man of genius is found a dying pauper, with all his worldly possession not amounting to the purchase of a day's meal.

Some pleasantries of the elder Colman, and the well-known James Boswell, enliven the narrative. At the literary Club, Colman happened to say that Johnson, on his return from the Hebrides, was willing to believe in the "second sight," Boswell said, "He is willing to believe! I do believe"—adding, with that ludicrous humility which was so characteristic of the man—"the evidence is enough for me, though not for his great mind; what will not fill a quart bottle will fill a pint bottle." Then keenly, we have no doubt contemptuously, Colman advised him "to cork it up," an advice which Boswell was one of the last men in the world to take.

Wilkes, in his mayoralty, affected to join the citizen with the patrician, and the mansion-house witnessed some peculiarly showy entertainments. Boswell, at one of those, seeing Colman looking for his place at the table, made room for him, and said, "See what it is to have a Scotsman for your friend at Wilke's table." A foreign waiter happening to pass by soon after, Boswell asked him something in German. "Ah!" said Colman, "I thought I was at the Mansion-house; but this is more like St. James's, for there are nothing but Germans and Scots."

The gay letter from Garrick passes his criticism on the men and things of the hour; he writes from Bath:

"I despair of seeing you here, so that I must be at the parade with the folks here, whose conversation lies as heavy on my mind, as the hot rolls and devilments at breakfast do upon my stomach. I have seen the great Henderson, who has something, and is nothing. He might be made to figure among the puppets of these times. His Don John is a comic Cato, and his Hamlet a mixture of tragedy, comedy, pastoral, farce, and nonsense. However, though my wife is outrageous, I am in the secret, and see sparks of fire which may be blown into a flame, to warm even a London audience at Christmas. He is a dramatic phenomenon, and his friends, especially Cumberland, have ruined him. He has a manner of paving, when he would be emphatical, that is ridiculous, and must be changed, or he would not be suffered at the Bedford Coffee-house."

In 1775, the curious incident occurred, of a Lord Chief Justice laying down the law of hissing in theatres. Five individuals had been convicted of a determination to hiss down old Macklin, and ultimately drive him from the stage. The law proceedings had gone on for two years, and at length the defendants were brought up to receive judgment. Lord Mansfield was the judge; he recommended an arbitration, to prevent further expenses; and finally M cklin proposed that the defendants should pay his costs, and take £300 worth of tickets for various benefits. Lord Mansfield applauded his generosity, and told him that, acknowledging his abilities as an actor, he had never acted better in his life than on that day. He also further observed, "that the right of hissing and applauding in a theatre was an unalterable right; but that there was a wide distinction between expressing the natural sensations of the mind as they arose from what was seen and heard, and executing a preconcerted design, not only to hiss an actor when he was playing a part, but to drive him from the theatre and produce his utter ruin."

Even in the life of wits, heartless as they are presumed to be, there are sometimes touches of feeling. Foote, of all men the most caustic, furnishes an anecdote illustrative of his having been not wholly the compound of cayenne and vitriol for which the world gave him credit. He had regards probably but for few; but among those few was Weston the actor, a man of considerable ability in his profession. Foote had his portrait painted, and on leaving town for his journey to Dover in search of health—a journey which was his last—he went into the room where the picture hung, made a full stop before it, firmly fixed his eyes on the countenance until the tears started into them, and then turning away, exclaimed, "Poor Weston!" Then, as if in reproach of his own seeming security, after a moment's meditation he uttered,—"Poor Weston!—it will be soon 'Poor Foote!' or the intelligence of my spirits deceives me." It did not deceive him.

There is a striking recollection of Johnson and Gibbon in the memoir of the younger Colman, written with more than his usual study, and not unlike a reflection of the style of both. He observes, that "Gibbon was a curious contrast to the Doctor. On the day when he first met them at table, which was at his father's house, Johnson was in his suit of rusty brown, an old yellow wig, and black worsted stockings; while Gibbon, who sat opposite to him, was in a suit of flowered velvet, with a bag and sword." Each had his measured phraseology: but Johnson's was grand, Gibbon's elegant—the stateliness of the former, however, being sometimes pedantic, and the polish of the latter occasionally finical:—"Johnson marched to kettledrums and trumpets, Gibbon moved to flutes and hautboys:—Johnson hewed passages through the Alps, Gibbon levelled walks through parks and gardens." This is rather pompous for George Colman, but he evidently leans to the courtly urbanity of the historian:—"Mauled as I had been by Johnson," (who before dinner had treated him as a troublesome child,) "Gibbon poured balm upon my bruises, by condescending, once or twice in the course of the evening, to talk to me. The great historian was light and playful, suiting his manner to the capacity of the boy; but still his mannerism prevailed—still he tapped his snuff box—still he smirked and smiled, and rounded his periods with the same air of good breeding as if he were conversing with men." Then comes a characteristic touch of George's own pencil:—"His mouth, mellifluous as Plato's, was a round hole in the centre of his visage!"

Bensley the actor, a popular favourite, was a rare instance of the change of personal character. In early life he had led so dashing a career, that Garrick named him "Roaring Bob of the Garden." He married by accident, and from that period his temperament seems to have taken a wiser turn. The accident was:—his post-chaise having come into collision with a lady on horseback, the lady was thrown; and Bensley, on getting out to offer his assistance, was so much struck with her beauty, that he fell in love, and made his proposal. Her fortune was but £1500; but, by frugality and his talents, he lived in comfort until he left the stage in 1796. His friend, the celebrated Wyndham, who was secretary at war, then gave him a barrack-mastership. But his good fortune was not yet at an end. A relative, Sir William Bensley, an East India Director, dying, left him a large property. Bensley enjoyed it for a while with the spirit of a gentleman; but, having no children, said, "that he had not wanted it, and that it came too late."

There is an acknowledged frenzy in the universal passion for theatrical management; and Colman, who had escaped so long, and after such vexatious experience, now returned to the turmoil of a theatre of his own. Foote, previously to leaving London for Calais, had thus written to Garrick:—"There is more of prudence than of pleasure in my trip to the continent. To tell you the truth, I am tired with racking my brain, toiling like a horse, and crossing seas and mountains in the most dreary seasons, merely to pay servants' wages and tradesmen's bills. I have therefore directed my friend Jewell to discharge the lazy vermin of my hall, and to let my hall too, if he can meet with a proper tenant. Help me to one, if you can." Colman heard of this intention, and he finally took the Haymarket Theatre, on the terms of paying Foote an annuity of £1600, and £500 for the copyright of his unpublished plays. "The paradoxical celebrity," says George Colman, "which Foote maintained on his stage, was very singular; his satirical sketches were scarcely dramas, and he could not be called a good legitimate performer. Yet there is no Shakspeare or Roscius on record, who, like Foote, supported a theatre for a series of years by his own acting, in his own writings, and for ten years of the time on a wooden leg." This prop to his person I once saw, standing by his bedside, ready dressed in a handsome silk stocking, with a polished shoe and gold buckle, awaiting the owner's getting up. It had a kind of tragi-comical appearance; and I leave to inveterate punsters the ingenuity of punning upon a Foote in bed and a leg out of it."

This is followed by a capital story. The elder Colman, in proposing for the purchase of the theatre, had kept himself wholly out of sight, and employed a matter-of-fact man of business to carry on the negotiation; Foote having no knowledge of the real party until the business was concluded. He, however, often met Colman at Dinner, and the subject being public, became a topic of common conversation. On one of those occasions, Foote turned to Colman and said:—"Now, here is Mr. Colman, an experienced manager, he will tell you that nobody can conduct so peculiar a theatrical concern as mine but myself. But there is a fat-headed fellow of an agent, who has been boring me every morning at breakfast, with terms from some blockhead who knows nothing about the stage, but whose money burns in his pocket:"—"Playhouse mad, I presume," said my father. "Right," said Foote, "and, if bleeding will bring him to his senses, he will find me a capital doctor."

The scene, when the parties at last met to sign and seal, must have been amusing; it would probably have furnished Foote with another farce, but all his pleasantries were now near an end. He died at Dover, October 21st, in the same year, having received but the first half year's payments. His illness had been long, but the immediate cause of his death was apoplexy.

The Haymarket proved, on the whole, a tolerable speculation. Colman's knowledge of the stage kept it alive; and, as he had got rid of the weight of the purchase-money, made a respectable income. But his time, too, was coming fast. In 1789, he was struck with paralysis; the disease attacked his brain, and he was reduced to the most melancholy of all conditions—that of a bewildered mind. Some lines in one of Churchill's poems, feelingly allude to the especial liability of active intellects to this misfortune:

> "With curious art the brain too finely wrought,
> Preys on itself, and is destroyed by thought;
> Constant attention wears the active mind,
> Blots out her powers, and leaves a blank behind."

We must now hasten to the close. George Colman, taking the management of the theatre on his father's retirement, conducted it for a succession of years with remarkable animation, but with fluctuating success. At length difficulties gathered round him, which compelled him to resign the theatre into other hands. His social qualities, however, had so far rendered him pleasing to George IV., that he appointed him "Examiner of Plays," an office worth about £400 a year. In his latter years he became liable to some organic infirmities, of which he died, October 17th 1836, with the reputation of one of the wittiest men, the most amusing companion, and perhaps the best comic writer since the days of Sheridan. It has not been our purpose to review these volumes, in the usual sense of the word. They have the fault of being too much of a compilation, and making too large a use of authorities already known. But it is only justice to say, that they contain a great deal of very curious matter—many recollections of the Colmans that have hitherto escaped the public—and that they are written in a spirited and intelligent style.

THE NEWLY DEAD.

Give her again to Earth!
There's safety there! She shall no more repine.
The fruit hath fall'n from life's o'erloaded vine.
Where shall they find her now, the weary train
Of earth-emotions, racking heart and brain
At each new sorrow's birth!

Gone to the shadows—gone!
Oh! better thus! Who such a rest would break?
Who from the sleep of the grave's pillow wake
The weary-hearted? Beautifully lies
On that dead cheek the reflex of the skies
Whither the soul hath flown!

Her childhood lives again!—
Son, look upon thy mother—and rejoice,
Even while the gushing sob shall choke thy voice!
Look on her!—from the cold world's dungeon freed,
No more beneath oppression's lash to bleed—
The ransomed slave of Pain!

GENIUS.

Whence and what art thou?—whither dost thou tend?—
Electric Power! from what extremest bourne,
What fixed sun descend'st thou, as in scorn
To gleam on sullen waters, or to blend
One with the whirlwind, or thy way to wend
With Life's wild river, bearing roots uptorn
And withered hopes from youth's green bosom shorn,
On to the black gulf of its soundless end?
Why art thou here? Earth hath for thee no place—
No altar for thy quick ethereal flame!
But hath its fitful fire—its lightning race,
No God-appointed goal—no mystic aim
Through night to flash, that it at morn may burn
In loftiest heavens, and from a tempered urn!

From the Edinburgh Review.

The Opinions of Lord Holland, as Recorded in the Journals of the House of Lords, from 1797 to 1841. Collected and Edited by D. C. Moylan, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. 8vo. London: 1841.

Many reasons make it impossible for us to lay before our readers, at the present moment, a complete view of the character and public career of the late Lord Holland. But we feel that we have already deferred too long the duty of paying some tribute to his memory. We feel that it is more becoming to bring, without further delay, an offering, though intrinsically of little value, than to leave his tomb longer without some token of our reverence and love.

We shall say very little of the book which lies on our table. And yet it is a book which, even if it had been the work of a less distinguished man, or had appeared under circumstances less interesting, would have well repaid an attentive perusal. It is valuable, both as a record of principles and as a model of composition. We find in it all the great maxims which, during more than forty years, guided Lord Holland's public conduct, and the chief reasons on which those maxims rest; condensed into the smallest possible space, and set forth with admirable perspicuity, dignity, and precision. To his opinions on Foreign Policy, we for the most part cordially assent; but, now and then, we are inclined to think them imprudently generous. We could not have signed the Protest against the detention of Napoleon. The Protest respecting the course which England pursued at the Congress of Verona, though it contains much that is excellent, contains also positions which, we are inclined to think, Lord Holland would, at a later period, have admitted to be unsound. But to all his doctrines on Constitutional Questions, we give our hearty approbation; and we firmly believe that no British Government has ever deviated from that line of internal policy which he has traced, without detriment to the public.

We will give as a specimen of this little volume, a single passage, in which a chief article of the political creed of the Whigs is stated and explained, with singular clearness, force, and brevity. Our readers will remember that, in 1825, the Catholic Association agitated for emancipation with most formidable effect. The Tories acted after their kind. Instead of removing the grievance they tried to put down the agitation; and brought in a law, apparently sharp and stringent, but, in truth, utterly impotent, for restraining the right of petition. Lord Holland's Protest on that occasion is excellent.

'We are,' says he, 'well aware that the privileges of the people, the rights of free discussion, and the spirit and letter of our popular institutions, must render—and they are intended to render—the continuance of an extensive grievance, and of the dissatisfaction consequent thereupon, dangerous to the tranquillity of the country, and ultimately subversive of the authority of the state. Experience and theory alike forbid us to deny that effect of a free constitution; a sense of justice and a love of liberty equally deter us from lamenting it. But we have always been taught to look for the remedy of such disorders in the redress of the grievances which justify them, and in the removal of the dissatisfaction from which they flow—not in restraints on ancient privileges, not in inroads on the right of public discussion, nor in violations of the principles of a free government. If, therefore, the legal method of seeking redress, which has been resorted to by persons labouring under grievous disabilities, be fraught with immediate or remote danger to the state, we draw from that circumstance a conclusion long since foretold by great authority—namely, that the British constitution, and large exclusions, cannot subsist together; that the constitution must destroy them, or they will destroy the constitution.'

It was not, however, of this little book, valuable and interesting as it is, but of the author, that we meant to speak; and we will try to do so with calmness and impartiality.

In order fully to appreciate the character of Lord Holland, it is necessary to go far back into the history of his family; for he had inherited something more than a coronet and an estate. To the House of which he was the head belongs one distinction, which we believe to be without a parallel in our annals. During more than a century, there has never been a time at which a Fox has not stood in a prominent station amongst public men. Scarcely had the chequered career of the first Lord Holland closed, when his son, Charles, rose to the head of the Opposition, and to the first rank among English debaters. And before Charles was borne to Westminster Abbey, a third Fox had already become one of the most conspicuous politicians in the kingdom.

It is impossible not to be struck by the strong family likeness which, in spite of diversities arising from education and position, appears in these three distinguished persons. In their faces and figures there was a resemblance, such as is common enough in novels, where one picture is good for ten generations, but such as in real life is seldom found. The ample person, the massy and thoughtful forehead, the large eyebrows, the full cheek and lip; the expression, so singularly compounded of sense, humour, courage, openness, a strong will and a sweet temper, were common to all. But the features of the founder of the House, as the pencil of Reynolds and the chisel of Nollekens have handed them down to us, were disagreeably harsh and exaggerated. In his descendants, the aspect was preserved; but it was softened, till it became, in the late lord, the most gracious and interesting countenance that was ever lighted up by the mingled lustre of intelligence and benevolence.

As it was with the faces of the men of this noble family, so was it also with their minds. Nature had done much for them all. She had moulded them all of that clay of which she is most sparing. To all she had given strong reason and sharp wit; a quick relish for every physical and intellectual enjoyment; constitutional intrepidity, and that frankness by which constitutional intrepidity is generally accompanied; spirits which nothing could depress; tempers easy, generous, and placable; and that genial courtesy which has its seat in the heart, and of which artificial politeness is only a faint and cold imitation. Such a disposition is the richest inheritance that ever was entailed on any family.

But training and situation greatly modified the fine qualities which nature lavished with such profusion on three generations of the house of Fox. The first Lord Holland was a needy political adventurer. He entered public life at a time when the standard of integrity among statesmen was low. He started as the adherent of a minister who had indeed many titles to respect; who possessed eminent talents both for administration and for debate; who understood the public interest well, and who meant fairly by the country; but who had seen so much perfidy and meanness, that he had become sceptical as to the existence of probity. Weary of the cant of patriotism, Walpole had learned to talk a cant of a different kind. Disgusted by that sort of hypocrisy which is at least a homage to virtue, he was too much in the habit of practising the less respectable hypocrisy which ostentatiously displays, and sometimes even simulates vice. To Walpole, Fox attached himself politically and personally, with the ardour which belonged to his temperament. And it is not to be denied, that in the school of Walpole he contracted faults which destroyed the value of his many great endowments. He raised himself, indeed, to the first consideration in the House of Commons; he became a consummate master of the art of debate; he attained honours and immense wealth—but the public esteem and confidence were withheld from him. His private friends, indeed, justly extolled his generosity and good-nature. They maintained, that in those parts of his conduct which they could least defend, there was nothing sordid; and that, if he was misled, he was misled by amiable feelings—by a desire to serve his friends, and by anxious tenderness for his children. But by the nation he was regarded as a man of insatiable rapacity and desperate ambition; as a man ready to adopt, without scruple, the most immoral and the most unconstitutional measures; as a man perfectly fitted, by all his opinions and feelings, for the work of managing the Parliament by means of secret service-money, and of keeping down the people with the bayonet. Many of his contemporaries had a morality quite as lax as his; but very few among them had his talents, and none had his hardihood and energy. He could not, like Sandys and Doddington, find safety in contempt. He therefore became an object of such general aversion as no statesman since the fall of Strafford has incurred—of such general aversion as was probably never in any country incurred by a man of so kind and cordial a disposition. A weak mind would have sunk under such a load of unpopularity. But that resolute spirit seemed to derive new firmness from the public hatred. The only effect which reproaches appeared to produce on him, was to sour, in some degree, his naturally sweet temper. The last steps of his public life were marked, not only by that audacity which he had derived from nature—not only by that immorality which he had learned in the school of Walpole—but by a harshness which almost amounted to cruelty, and which had never been supposed to belong to his character. His severity increased the unpopularity from which it had sprung. The well-known lampoon of Gray may serve as a specimen of the feeling of the country. All the images are taken from shipwrecks, quicksands, and cormorants. Lord Holland is represented as complaining, that the cowardice of his accomplices had prevented him from putting down the free spirit of the city of London by sword and fire, and as pining for the time when birds of prey should make their nests in Westminster Abbey, and unclean beasts burrow in St. Paul's.

Within a few months after the death of this remarkable man, his second son Charles appeared at the head of the party opposed to the American war. Charles had inherited the bodily and mental constitution of his father, and had been much—far too much—under his father's influence. It was indeed impossible that a son of so affectionate and noble a spirit should not have been warmly attached to a parent who possessed many fine qualities, and who carried his indulgence and his liberality towards his children even to a culpable extent. The young man saw that the person to whom he was bound by the strongest ties, was, in the highest degree, odious to the nation; and the effect was what might have been expected from his strong passions and constitutional boldness. He cast in his lot with his father, and took, while still a boy, a deep part in the most unjustifiable and unpopular measures that had been adopted since the reign of James the Second. In the debates on the Middlesex Election, he distinguished himself, not only by his precocious powers of eloquence, but by the vehement and scornful manner in which he bade defiance to public opinion. He was at that time regarded as a man likely to be the most formidable champion of arbitrary government that had appeared since the Revolution—to be a Bute with far greater powers—a Mansfield with far greater courage. Happily his father's death liberated him early from the pernicious influence by which he had been misled. His mind expanded.—His range of observation became wider. His genius broke through early prejudices. His natural benevolence and magnanimity had fair play. In a very short time he appeared in a situation worthy of his understanding and of his heart. From a family whose name was associated in the public mind with tyranny and corruption—from a party of which the theory and the practice were equally servile—from the midst of the Luttrells, the Dysons, the Barringtons—came forth the greatest parliamentary defender of civil and religious liberty.

The late Lord Holland succeeded to the talents and to the fine dispositions of his house. But his situation was very different from that of the two eminent men of whom we have spoken. In some important respects it was better; in some it was worse than theirs. He had one great advantage over them. He received a good political education. The first lord was educated by Sir Robert Walpole. Mr. Fox was educated by his father. The late Lord was educated by Mr. Fox. The pernicious maxims early imbibed by the first Lord Holland, made his great talents useless, and worse than useless, to the state. The pernicious maxims early imbibed by Mr. Fox, led him, at the commencement of his public life, into great faults, which, though afterwards nobly expiated, were never forgotten. To the very end of his career, small men, when they had nothing else to say in defence of their own tyranny, bigotry, and imbecility, could always raise a cheer by some paltry taunt about the election of Colonel Luttrell, the imprisonment of the lord mayor, and other measures in which the great whig leader had borne a part at the age of one or two-and-twenty. On Lord Holland no such slur could be thrown. Those who most dissent from his opinions must acknowledge, that a public life, more consistent, is not to be found in our annals. Every part of it is in perfect harmony with every other; and the whole is in perfect harmony with the great principles of toleration and civil freedom. This rare felicity is in a great measure to be attributed to the influence of Mr. Fox. Lord Holland, as was natural in a person of his talents and expectations, began at a very early age to take the keenest interest in politics; and Mr. Fox found the greatest pleasure in forming the mind of so hopeful a pupil. They corresponded largely on political subjects when the young lord was only sixteen; and their friendship and mutual confidence continued to the day of that mournful separation at Chiswick.—Under such training, such a man as Lord Holland was in no danger of falling into those faults which threw a dark shade over the whole career of his grandfather, and from which the youth of his uncle was not wholly free.

On the other hand, the late Lord Holland, as compared with his grandfather and his uncle, laboured under one great disadvantage. They were members of the House of Commons. He became a Peer while still an infant. When he entered public life, the House of Lords was a very small and very decorous assembly. The minority to which he belonged was scarcely able to muster five or six votes on the most important nights, when eighty or ninety lords were present. Debate had accordingly become a mere form, as it was in the Irish House of Peers before the Union. This was a great misfortune to a man like Lord Holland. It was not by occasionally addressing fifteen or twenty solemn and unfriendly auditors, that his grandfather and his uncle attained their unrivalled parliamentary skill. The former had learned his art in "the great Walpolean battles," on nights when Onslow was in the chair seventeen hours without intermission; when the thick ranks on both sides kept unbroken order till long after the winter sun had risen upon them; when the blind were led out by the hand into the lobby; and the paralytic laid down in their bed clothes on the benches. The powers of Charles Fox were, from the first, exercised in conflicts not less exciting. The great talents of the late Lord Holland had no such advantage. This was the more unfortunate, because the peculiar species of eloquence which belonged to him, in common with his family, required much practice to develope it. With strong sense, and the greatest readiness of wit, a certain tendency to hesitation was hereditary in the line of Fox. This hesitation arose, not from the poverty but from the wealth of their vocabulary. They paused, not from the difficulty of finding one expression, but from the difficulty of choosing between several. It was only by slow degrees, and constant exercise, that the first Lord Holland and his son overcame the defect. Indeed, neither of them overcame it completely.

In statement, the late Lord Holland was not successful; his chief excellence lay in reply. He had the quick eye of his house for the unsound parts of an argument, and a great felicity in exposing them. He was decidedly more distinguished in debate than any Peer of his times who had not sat in the House of Commons. Nay, to find his equal among persons similarly situated, we must go back eighty years—to Earl Granville. For Mansfield, Thurlow, Loughborough, Grey, Grenville, Brougham, Plunkett, and other eminent men, living and dead, whom we will not stop to enumerate, carried to the upper house an eloquence formed and matured in the lower. The opinion of the most discerning judges was, that Lord Holland's oratorical performances, though sometimes most successful, afforded no fair measure of his oratorical powers; and that, in an assembly of which the debates were frequent and animated, he would have attained a very high order of excellence. It was, indeed, impossible to converse with him without seeing that he was born a debater. To him, as to his uncle, the exercise of the mind in discussion was a positive pleasure. With the greatest good nature and good breeding, he was the very opposite to an assenter. The word "disputatious" is generally used as a word of reproach; but we can express our meaning only by saying that Lord Holland was most courteously and pleasantly disputatious. In truth, his quickness in discovering and apprehending distinctions and analogies was such as a veteran judge might envy. The lawyers of the Duchy of Lancaster were astonished to find in an unprofessional man so strong a relish for the esoteric parts of their science; and complained that as soon as they had split a hair, Lord Holland proceeded to split the filaments into filaments still finer. In a mind less happily constituted, there might have been a risk that this turn for subtilty would have produced serious evil. But in the heart and understanding of Lord Holland there was ample security against all such danger. He was not a man to be the dupe of his own ingenuity. He put his logic to its proper use; and in him the dialectician was always subordinate to the statesman.

His political life is written in the chronicles of his country. Perhaps, as we have already intimated, his opinions on two or three great questions of foreign policy were open to just objection. Yet even his errors, if he erred, were amiable and respectable. We are not sure that we do not love and admire him the more because he was now and then seduced from what we regard as a wise policy, by sympathy with the oppressed; by generosity towards the fallen; by a philanthropy, so enlarged, that it took in all nations; by love of peace, which in him was second only to the love of freedom; by the magnanimous credulity of a mind which was as incapable of suspecting as of devising mischief.

To his views on questions of domestic policy, the voice of his countrymen does ample justice. They revere the memory of the man who was, during forty years, the constant protector of all oppressed races, of all persecuted sects—of the man, whom neither the prejudices nor the interests belonging to his station could seduce from the path of right—of the noble, who in every great crisis cast in his lot with the commons—of the planter, who made manly war on the slave trade—of the landowner, whose whole heart was in the struggle against the corn laws.

We have hitherto touched almost exclusively on those parts of Lord Holland's character which were open to the observation of millions. How shall we express the feelings with which his memory is cherished by those who were honoured with his friendship? Or in what language shall we speak of that house once celebrated for its rare attractions to the furthest ends of the civilised world, and now silent and desolate as the grave? That house was, a hundred and twenty years ago, apostrophised by a poet in tender and graceful lines, which have now acquired a new meaning not less sad than that which they originally bore:—

"Thou hill, whose brow the antique structures grace,
Rear'd by bold chiefs of Warwick's noble race,
Why, once so loved, whene'er thy bower appears,
O'er my dim eyeballs glance the sudden tears?
How sweet were once thy prospects fresh and fair,
Thy sloping walks and unpolluted air!
How sweet the glooms beneath thine aged trees,
Thy noon-tide shadow, and thine evening breeze!
His image thy forsaken bowers restore;
Thy walks and airy prospects charm no more;
No more the summer in thy glooms allay'd,
Thine evening breezes, and thy noon-day shade."

Yet a few years, and the shades and structures may follow their illustrious masters. The wonderful city which, ancient and gigantic as it is, still continues to grow as fast as a young town of logwood by a water privilege in Michigan, may soon displace those turrets and gardens which are associated with so much that is interesting and noble—with the courtly magnificence of Rich—with the loves of Ormond—with the counsels of Cromwell—with the death of Addison. The time is coming when, perhaps, a few old men, the last survivors of our generation, will in vain seek, amidst new streets and squares, and railway stations, for the site of that dwelling which was in their youth the favourite resort of wits and beauties—of painters and poets—of scholars, philosophers, and statesmen. They will then remember, with strange tenderness, many objects once familiar to them—the avenue and the terrace, the busts and the paintings; the carving, the grotesque gilding, and the enigmatical mottoes.—With peculiar fondness, they will recall that venerable chamber, in which all the antique gravity of a college library was so singularly blended with all that female grace and wit could devise to embellish a drawing room. They will recollect, not unmoved, those shelves loaded with the varied learning of many lands and many ages; those portraits in which were preserved the features of the best and wisest Englishmen of two generations. They will recollect how many men who have guided the politics of Europe—who have moved great assemblies by reason and eloquence—who have put life into bronze and canvass, or who have left to posterity things so written as it shall not willingly let them die—were there mixed with all that was loveliest and gayest in the society of the most splendid of capitals. They will remember the singular character which belonged to that circle, in which every talent and accomplishment, every art and science, had its place. They will remember how the last debate was discussed in one corner, and the last comedy of Scribe in another; while Wilkie gazed with modest admiration on Reynolds's Baretti; while Mackintosh turned over Thomas Aquinas to verify a quotation; while Talleyrand related his conversations with Barras at the Luxemburg, or his ride with Lannes over the field of Austerlitz. They will remember, above all, the grace—and the kindness, far more admirable than grace—with which the princely hospitality of that ancient mansion was dispensed. They will remember the venerable and benignant countenance, and the cordial voice of him who bade them welcome. They will remember that temper which years of pain, of sickness, of lameness, of confinement, seemed only to make sweeter and sweeter; and that frank politeness, which at once relieved all the embarrassment of the youngest and most timid writer or artist, who found himself for the first time among Ambassadors and Earls. They will remember that constant flow of conversation, so natural, so animated, so various, so rich with observation and anecdote; that wit which never gave a wound; that exquisite mimicry which ennobled, instead of degrading; that goodness of heart which appeared in every look and accent, and gave additional value to every talent and acquirement. They will remember, too, that he whose name they hold in reverence was not less distinguished by the inflexible uprightness of his political conduct, than by his loving disposition and his winning manners. They will remember that, in the last lines which he traced, he expressed his joy that he had done nothing unworthy the friend of Fox and Grey; and they will have reason to feel similar joy, if, in looking back on my troubled years, they cannot accuse themselves of having done any thing unworthy of men who were distinguished by the friendship of Lord Holland.

ON THE APPROACH OF SPRING.

GREAT Father, when thy Spring time on the earth
Thou sendest in glory, once again renewing
The promised token in the violet's birth,
Sweetness and beauty all thy pathways strewing,
Grant us to walk rejoicing as of old
With hopeful, onward glance, nor of the past
Take note, save only as a fold—
A loosen'd coil from our worse nature cast:
Even as the lowly earthworm casts away
The coil of that poor form he wore so late,
Ere in his chamber of transformed decay
He verges towards his blest and winged-state!
Let not the too full Summer these our hearts
Ravish from Thee, nor Autumn's fruited ground
Make recreant, by the blessings it imparts,
Till we forget the lands which more abound!—
Nor, when in Winter's clasp each ice-bound stream
Lies locked, in that long season's night forbid
Thy melting radiance on our souls to beam,
Lest all our love 'neath the world's frost be hid:
That love which thus to springs through winter led Should rise to Thee, by such sweet fountains fed!

MISS SEDGWICK'S LETTERS FROM ABROAD TO KINDRED AT HOME.

Miss Sedgwick occupies a high position in the American mind as a novelist and moralist; combining the character of Miss Austin or the author of Marriage with that of a secular Hannah More, and varying her labours from the regular three-volume fiction to the child's story or the tale for an annual. Judging from her best productions, she seems to belong to the stock of New England gentry; some of whom say they are more English than John Bull, and reminded an experienced and somewhat critical traveller of the staid and respectable gentry of the old school at home. In one of the best of Miss Sedgwick's novels, The Linwoods, she had admirably described two classes of this race. The one, Mr. Linwood, represented the old Tory proprietor of large means and aristocratical bearings; specimens of which class were not rare, we believe, at New York in the earlier part of the century, though probably well nigh extinct now. The family of the Lees embodied the humbler race of "gentlemen farmers," whose fortunes were less and whose opinions were democratical, but who possessed, equally with the other, that true ease and refinement of manners which result from simplicity and good sense, coupled with a knowledge of one's own position and a tolerance towards that of others. This regard to one's own rights or status, and respect to those which other people claimed, was not of American growth, but derived its origin from the strongly-marked system of English classes, with their respective rights, legal or moral. The system of manners we speak of seems still to be preserved in the English parts of America; but the conjoint spirit of independence and tolerance appears to have been shaken by the overwhelming influence of the majority. Miss Sedgwick has no doubt the simplicity of manners which marks the gentlewoman, and her amiable feelings induce her to find excuses for European differences in religion and so forth; but in some sense her mind is Yankee or colonial. She makes her home notions too much of a standard: she has little of that tolerant philosophy that characterised Washington, who, when a great clamour was raised about the forms of courts, remarked, that if those forms were investigated, they would mostly be found to have originated in convenience.

The impressions of such a person with regard to England and Europe were perhaps not absolutely wanted, but being here they are welcome. They are interesting in themselves; and though not going over any new ground, and dealing only with the superficies of things, (for Miss Sedgwick was as hasty a "go-ahead" kind of traveller as any of her countrymen,) they serve to complete our portrait as others see us. Mr. Cooper is too critical a mind to go deeply into externals, and a person of too large experience in the habits of many peoples to have had the freshness of first impressions. Mr. Willis was a trading literateur, writing for effect, and "calculating" on his description of a hotel to go towards payment of his bill; so that, now we know him better, we know not how much is believable. Mr. Dewey was a traveller of a higher stamp; but he wanted the feminine character of Miss Sedgwick, her poetical mind, and perhaps her professional habit of looking at things to describe them with broad and general truth.

It is the personal circumstances of the Letters from Abroad to Kindred at Home which give them value or interest; for the ground travelled over by the writer has been so beaten, that to English readers, at all events, it can have no novelty. From Portsmouth to London; from London to Antwerp, Brussels, and Waterloo; a short stay at one or two spas; a flying turn through Switzerland and Italy, with a brief residence at Milan, Rome, Naples, Florence, and Venice,—these journeyings and sojournings want attraction here, even had the traveller better opportunities than Miss Sedgwick, and a more practical mind. In one sense, too, the Letters are incomplete, though properly so—many of the sights and curiosities in well-known places being only touched upon. Some of the book, therefore, approaches the tedium of the twice-told tale: we only care for impressions when we take some interest in the original.

The party with which Miss Sedgwick travelled landed at Portsmouth: and her first impression was the sober hue of the old brick edifices, apparently contrasting with the staring garishness of the wooden painted houses in the new country. The cleanliness and care both in person and dress, even when the dress was rags, was also an early object of surprise, and continued to the last: we should imagine the Americans are like navigators or blacksmiths, covered with industrial marks, and too busy to get rid of them daily. The perfect cultivation of England, the beauty of the winding lanes and hedgerows, and the antique and solemn appearance of the old churches, struck her with pleasure; but she seems to have been above all attracted by the neatness with which the poorest cottage and cottage-garden were kept, and the beauty of the flowers. Her exclamations are frequent as to the grace and effect that might be given to the gardens of the rich in America even by a little care bestowed upon their native flowers, many of which she saw blooming here. The sight of a cathedral, especially the first cathedral, was an excitement, not only for itself but for its bodily chronicle of the past. Here she is at

WINCHESTER CATHEDRAL.

What think you of our New World eyes seeing the sarcophagi containing the bones of the old Saxon Kings—the Ethelreds and Ethelwolfs, and of Canute the Dane; the tombs of William Rufus, and of William Wickham; the chair in which Bloody Mary sat at her nuptial ceremony; besides unnumbered monuments and chapels built by Kings and Bishops; to say nothing of some of the best art of our own time, sculpture by Flaxman and Chantrey! Their details were lost upon us in the effect of the great whole; the long-drawn aisles, the windows with their exquisite colouring, the lofty vault, the carved stones, the pillars and arches—those beautiful Gothic arches. We had some compensation for the unconsciousness of a lifetime, of the power of architecture, in our overwhelming emotions. They cannot be repeated. We cannot see a cathedral twice for the first time—that is very clear.

I was not prepared for the sensations to be excited by visiting these old places of the Old World. There is nothing in our land to aid the imperfect lights of history. Here it seems suddenly verified. Its long-buried dead, or rather its dim spectres, appear with all the freshness of actual life. A miracle is wrought on poetry and painting. While they represented what we had never seen, they were but shadows to us—a kind of magic mirrors, showing false images: now they seem a divine form for the perpetual preservation of the beautiful creations of nature and art.

The completeness of nearly every thing in England, especially of the houses and concomitants of the wealthy, also struck the strangers mightily.

AN ENGLISH "LODGE."

I cannot follow the rule I would fain have adopted, and compare what I see here to what is familiar to you at home. There is, for instance, in this place of Mrs. ——, a neatness, completeness, and perfection, of which we have but the beginning and faint shadowing. Our grounds are like our society, where you meet every degree of civilisation. Here, every tree, shrub, and little flower is in its right place; and nothing present that should not be here. On one side of the house the garden is laid out in the fantastical French style, in the form of hearts and whimsical figures, but elsewhere it is completely English, with noble trees that grow as Nature bids them; hot-houses, with grapes and pines; and a lawn that for hundreds of years, probably, has had its grass cropped every week through the growing-months.

The house is, I fancy, rather a favourable specimen of the residences of the English gentry—spacious, and arranged with comfort and elegance; but not surpassing, in these respects, the first class of gentlemen's country-houses in America. But there are luxuries here that we have not, and shall not have for many a day. The walls are painted by the master of the house with views on the Rhine, from sketches of his own; and very beautiful they are. This is, to be sure, very attainable to us, for a taste and a certain facility in painting is common enough among us; but when shall we see on our walls an unquestionable Titian, or a Carlo Dolce? or when, in a gentleman's country-house, an apartment filled with casts from the best antiques? Certainly not till our people cease to demand drapery for the chanting-cherubs and such like innocents. * * *

After lunch, Miss —— took us in her carriage, stowing the girls in the rumble, through Lord Ashdown's and Mr. Fleming's parks. We drove a mile through the latter, with thick borderings and plantations of shrubbery on each side of us, so matted and with such a profusion of rhododendron as to remind me of passages in the wilds of Western Virginia. This, you know, is a plant not native to this country, but brought with much pains and expense from ours. We have not English wealth to lavish on parks and gardens, but with taste and industry we might bring to our homes, and gratefully cherish, the beautiful plants that God has sown at broadcast in our forests. I declare to you, when I remember how seldom I have seen our azaleas, kalmias, &c. in cultivated grounds, while I meet them here in such abundance, it seems like finding a neglected child housed and gently entertained by strangers.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS OF LONDON.

Would you know what struck me as we drove from the depot of the Western Railroad to our lodgings? The familiar names of the streets, the neutral tint of the houses, the great superiority of the pavements to ours, and, having last seen New York, the superior cleanliness of the streets. I have all my life heard London spoken of as dismal and dark. It may be so in winter; it is not now. The smoke-colour of the houses is soft and healthy to the eye; so unlike our flame-coloured cities, that seem surely to typify their destiny, which is, you know, to be burned up sooner or later—sooner, in most cases. And having had nothing to do to-day but gaze from our windows, what think you has struck us as quite different from a relative position in our own city?—The groups of ballad-singers, consisting usually of a man and a woman and one or two children. I have seen such in New York half-a-dozen times in my life, and they are always people from the Continent of Europe. Here, not half an hour passes without a procession of these licensed musical, and to us novices, irresistible beggars. Then there are the hawkers of flowers as irresistible, lovely bouquets of moss-rosebuds, geraniums, heliotropes, and what not. As we are in the neighbourhoods of Piccadilly and the Parks, our street is quite a thoroughfare, and we are every moment exclaiming at the superb equipages that pass our window. Nothing, I presume, of the kind in the world exceeds the luxury of an English carriage with all its appointments; and yet, shall I confess to you, that after my admiration of their superb horses was somewhat abated, I have felt, in looking at them, much as I have at seeing a poor little child made a fool of by the useless and glittering trappings of his hobby-horse. What would our labouring men, who work up the time and strength God gives them into independence, domestic happiness, and political existence — what would they, what should they say, at seeing three—four servants—strong, tall, well-made young men, (for such are selected,) attached to a coach, one coachman and three footmen, two of course perfect supernumeraries? We "moralise the spectacle," too: observe the vacant countenance and flippant air of these men, chained to the circle of half-a-dozen ideas, and end with a laugh at their fantastical liveries, some in white turned with red, and some in red turned with white. Fancy a man driving with a militia general's hat, feathers and all, with three footmen, one seated beside him and two behind, all with white coats, scarlet plush breeches, white silk stockings, rosettes on their shoes, and gold-headed batons in their white-gloved hands. There must be something "rotten in the state," when God's creatures, "possible angels," as our friend Doctor T. calls all human kind, look up to a station behind a lord's coach as a privileged place. "Possible angels" they may be; but, alas, their path is hedged about with huge improbabilities!

Coming to the cities of the Old World, as we do, with our national vanities thick upon us, with our scale of measurement graduated by Broadway, the City Hall, the Battery, and the Boston Common, we are confounded by the extent of London, by its magnificent parks, its immense structures, by its docks and warehouses, and by all its details of convenience and comfort, and its aggregate of incalculable wealth. We begin with comforting ourselves with the thought, "Why, these people have been at it these two thousand years, and Heaven knows how much longer." By degrees envy melts into self-complacency, and we say, "they are our relations;" "our fathers had a hand in it;" we are of the same race, "as our new-planned cities and unfinished towers" shall hereafter prove. Mr. Webster said to me after we had both been two or three weeks here, "What is your impression now of London? my feeling is yet amazement."

There are yet ties to be broken before America and Great Britain can become national, or, as it used to be said with regard to France, "natural enemies."

Miss Sedgwick's remarks on the Continent have less of attraction, from their furnishing fewer points of comparison between ourselves and the Americans; but there are many passages of considerable interest in various ways. Partly as an American, partly perhaps from her own genial manners and mind, Miss Sedgwick was able to gain the confidence of foreigners more readily than the reserved and somewhat supercilious English. From this it would appear that there is an under-current of dissatisfaction abroad, ready to break out on the first opportunity, and realize Canning's prophetic warning to the Continental despots, that the next European war will be a war of principles. Here is an example in the stronghold of paternal despotism—

"There is a captain in the Austrian army at Kronthal for his health, a man about fifty, with a most melancholy expression of countenance. Ever since he knew we were Americans, he has manifested an interest in us. He has asked many questions about the country, and let fall on various occasions, in an under tone, his respect for our free institutions. His extreme despondency affected me, and I took an opportunity to endeavour to inspire him with hope in the efficacy of the waters. I repeated to him every instance I had heard of benefit in cases similar to his. At each he shook his head mournfully, and then explained why the 'amen stuck in the throat.' 'It is not my disease,' he said, 'that may be cured, but it is my incurable position. What am I but a mere tool in the hands of the men of power employed to watch every generous movement, and support the wrong against the right?'"

ITALIAN FEELING TOWARDS THE AUSTRIANS.

The Emperor pays a large sum annually to support the opera at La Scala, considering it an efficient instrument for tranquillizing the political pulse of Italy. No wonder that syrens must be employed to sing lullabies to those who have a master's cannon pointed at their homes. Among other proofs which the Emperor has that the love of freedom, that divine and inextinguishable essence, is at work in the hearts of the Milanese, is the fact that no Italian lady receives an Austrian officer in her box with impunity. It matters not what rank he holds, if she receives him she is put into Coventry by her countrymen. Is there not hope of a people who, while their chains are clanking, dare thus openly to disdain their masters?

Some remarks have been made upon the private disclosures which Miss Sedgwick has been guilty of. In the first volume we see nothing very censurable in this respect, except some remarks upon an ill-bred or rather awkward host, when she got herself into a dilemma by mistaking the time; and this is only censurable (for names are suppressed) as it conveys a public notice of a gaucherie which no one would have remarked upon privately to the party concerned. Miss Mitford, Joanna Baillie, and Rogers, are the only persons whose domesticity is at all touched upon; and perhaps Miss Mitford, though all is compliment, may be a shade too close, but not much closer than she herself has gone in Our Village. All the rest is nought—people who throw open their rooms to reporters, to have an account of their parties paraded to the world, are not so thin-skinned. In the second volume, which was not printed last week, there is an indiscretion, however, which should have been avoided, for it may lead to serious consequences. Some Italian exiles have found refuge in America, and been hospitably entertained by the friends of Miss Sedgwick: her party was naturally furnished with letters to their connexions in Italy; and probably the attentions they procured them, and the remarks made by the outpourings of feeling, are repeated too fully and thoughtlessly. It is true, initials only are given, but there is quite enough to identify the parties to the Austrians: it is also true that WE see nothing in all that is said, but the Austrian authorities may think differently, especially as one of the persons appears to fill some office. All this has, no doubt, been done by Miss Sedgwick without consideration; but people should be considerate where the welfare of others is concerned.

From the Examiner.

We have much respect for the talents of Miss Sedgwick. She is said to be at present the most popular native writer in America, and she deserves to be so. She deserves it, because she is not content with mere imitation. What she writes has upon it the stamp of the soil. She has exhibited a proper contempt for the old, wearisome, imported worship; and done her best to build up a little temple of her own.

Were it much smaller and humbler than it is, we should speak of it with unfeigned respect. It is a type of that earnestness of intention, which contains in itself the germ of many great things. We are glad to find too, by its growing popularity with Americans, that they are themselves awakening to a sense of its importance. It is time they should.—Franklin satisfied their literary pretensions for the first half century of their national existence, and well and wisely enough; but his homely sense and philosophic vigour should have led the way to something better than the imitative graces of Washington Irving, or the feeble prettiness of the followers of Mrs. Hemans. Now, at all events, there is a move in the right direction, and in the increasing reputation of Miss Sedgwick we discern one of its healthiest signs. It was, we believe, a remark of Miss Martineau's in connection with this subject, that in such books as Hope Leslie, The Rich poor man and Poor rich man, and Home, there was not simply the promise, but the absolute vigorous beginning, of a national literature; the first distinct utterance of a fresh national mind, telling, not what it ought to see in obedience to old methods of looking, but what it does see of actual life on its own soil.

We have here only the first volume of the first work she has published in England, descriptive of the impression produced upon her by a visit to Europe in the latter half of the year 1839. It will be proper to abstain from critical remark, while the entire book is not before us, though we avail ourselves of the opportunity this volume affords, of describing the purpose of the writer, and illustrating, by a few quotations, her manner and style.

A very pleasant and characteristic heartiness seems to us to distinguish both purpose and manner. As you read the book, you find that you are at all events in communication with a very sincere person. Her mistakes are of that order. And we think it a great charm that she is thoroughly republican and New-World-ish in her way of looking at the Old World. She sticks to the stripes and the stars. Where she subjects her own countrymen to disadvantageous comparisons, it is in matters wherein, by the measure of just and uncompromising views, they fall short of their own institutions. She gives no quarter to the aristocratic spirit, and desires to be, though she is not quite, as intolerant of the spirit of money. Even her American forms of speech she is proud of exhibiting, and "realises" at a prodigious rate. Nor is she an exception to the American love of leaving open after her the doors of private houses into which she may have entered.

Her errors of judgment seem to be such as a clever critic out of a provincial place would most easily tumble into in this great metropolis of ours. She is very sensitive about particular people, and likes to talk of personal civilities, and, when she has seen very little, is apt to think that she has seen every thing. And truly England covers so small a space of ground in comparison with her own Favoured Land, as she fondly and agreeably calls it, that it is a natural mistake to suppose it explorable in a month or two, manners and all. She forgets what a great many centuries have passed over it, and what a great many secrets worth knowing they have left, in successive strata, hidden beneath the surface of the soil. It takes a little more labour, a little more time, to get thoroughly at them.

One of Miss Sedgwick's first remarks will show that she should have been better prepared for this:

"Every thing looks novel and foreign to us: the quaint forms of the old, red-coloured houses; the arched, antique gateways; the royal busts niched in an old wall; the very dark colouring of the foliage, and the mossy stems of the trees. We seem to have passed from the fresh, bright youth to the old age of the world. The form and colouring of the people are different from ours. They are stouter, more erect, and more sanguine."

This was at Portsmouth, in the neighbourhood of which, and under the competent guidance of Capt. Basil Hall, Miss Sedgwick's English experience drew breath. She lost no time in observing what she could, and it is here recorded with the fresh and lively colouring of a first impression.

In this remark, we have the outline of a curious and characteristic contrast, which might have been worth the filling up a little more completely:

"I stopped at a little cottage this morning, half smothered with roses, geraniums, &c., and, on the pretext of looking at a baby, made good my entrance. The little bit of an apartment, not more than six feet by ten, was as neat as possible. Not an article of its scanty furniture looked as if it had been bought by this generation; every thing appeared cared for, and well preserved; so unlike corresponding dwellings with us. The woman had nine children: six at home, and all tidily dressed. I have not seen in England a slovenly-looking person. Even the three or four beggars who stealthily asked charity of us at Portsmouth were neatly dressed.

"I greeted, en passant, a woman sitting at her cottage window. She told me she paid for half of a little tenement and a bit of a garden ten pounds (fifty dollars) rent. And when I congratulated her on a pleasant country, 'Ah,' she said, 'we can't live on a pleasant country!' I have not addressed one of these people who has not complained of poverty, said something of the difficulty of getting work, of the struggling for bread, which is the condition of existence among the lower classes here. Strange sounds to our ears!"

The side-speaking at America is generally in the best spirit. Visiting an English country house, she adds:

"A taste and a certain facility in painting, is common enough among us, but when shall we see on our walls an unquestionable Titian, or a Carlo Dolce, or when, in a gentleman's country house, an apartment filled with casts from the best antiques! Certainly not till our people cease to demand drapery for the chanting cherubs, and such like innocents!"

And yet is there not the least possible infusion of that same strait-laced feeling, in the indignant protest against the indecency of poor Taglioni!

Speaking of Captain Hall's kindness, and contrasting it with his old offences against America, Miss Sedgwick good-humouredly adds:

"We might indeed, had we been wise, have found many of his criticisms just and salutary, and thanked him for them, and have delighted in his frankness, his sagacity, and his vein of very pleasant humour; but, alas! our Saxon blood is always uppermost, and we go on cherishing our infallibility, and, like a snappish cook, had much rather spoil our own pie than have a foreign finger in it. It is an old trick of the English bull-dog to bark at his neighbour's door; but let him do so, if he will caress you at his own."

She admired the Tower and Westminster Abbey, and, we grieve to see, could find nothing to admire in the greatest triumph of modern architecture, St. Paul's. She went to Hampton and Richmond, and thus hastily records a piece of experience on her journey home:

"We sent away our carriage, and came home in a steamer, which was crowded when we got on board. At first we looked around in the most self-complacent manner, expecting, with our American notions, that seats would be offered on every side, as they would assuredly have been to all us womankind in one of our own steamers. Not a foot stirred. Some of us were positively unable to stand, and for those Mr. P. made an appeal to some men, who refused without hesitation, appearing to think our expectations were impertinent. We were too far gone to be fastidious, so we adopted the backwoods expedient, and squatted upon what unoccupied territory we could find. If such personal selfishness and discourtesy is the result of a high civilisation, I am glad we have not yet attained it."

Now surely Miss Sedgwick's good sense should have warned her against this Trollope quicksand. Imagine the manners of a country judged, and the results of high civilisation tested, by the contents of a Richmond steamer!

We must add that a very little trouble of enquiry would have spared such blunders as the following:

"When the queen is at Windsor she walks every Sunday on this terrace, where she is liable to be jostled by the meanest of her subjects; and as the railway passes within a mile and a half of Windsor, she must often endure there collisions to which English blood has such repugnance."

Nor is Miss Mitford the least relation to the Duke of Bedford; nor did voices ever cry out in the Opera house Where is Lady Flora; nor was Sydney Smith infallible when he said that ten thousand of each number of Nicholas Nickleby were sold, seeing that the sale of each number was something more than forty thousand. And, in the name of Dilworth and Doctor Johnson, what is the meaning of Miss Sedgwick's remark when she is describing Vandyke's portrait of Charles at Hampton!

"It is such a portrait as Shakspeare would have painted of Charles had he been an outside-painter."

And, oh happy Miss Sedgwick, in what utopian part of London was it that that simple remark on English conversation had its origin: "there is no such 'horreur' as a bore; no such bore as a proser." And oh, most unthinking and tittle tattling Miss Sedgwick, how can you talk as you do of the parlours, and pantries, and dinner-tables of your entertainers!

The impression of our cathedral services is well and earnestly described:

"This was the third time we had been present, since we came to England, at worship in the temples into which art has breathed its soul. First in Winchester Cathedral, then at Westminster Abbey, and now at this old royal chapel. The daily service appointed by the church was performing with the careless and heartless air of prescription. The clergyman and clerk hurried sing-songing through the form of prayers, that, perfect as they are, will only rise on the soul's wings. I felt the Puritan struggling at my heart, and could have broken out with old Mause's fervour, if not her eloquence. I thought of our summer Sunday service in dear J.'s 'long parlour.' Not a vacant place there. The door open into the garden, the children strewed round the door-step, their young faces touched with an expression of devotion and love—such as glows in the faces of the cherubs of the old pictures; and for vaulted roof, columns, and storied glass, we had the blue sky, the everlasting hills, and lights and shadows playing over them, all suggestive of devotion, and in harmony with the pure and simple doctrine our friend Dr. Follen taught us. To me, there was more true worship in those all-embracing words, 'Our Father!' as he uttered them, than in all the task-prayers I have heard in these mighty cathedrals. Here it is the temple that is greatest. Your mind is pre-occupied, filled with the outward world. The monuments of past ages and the memorials of individual greatness are before you. Your existence is amplified; your sympathies are carried far back; the 'inexorable past' does give up its dead. Whenever your eye falls you see the work of a power new to you—the creative power of art. You see forms of beauty which never entered into your 'forge of thought.' You are filled with new and delightful emotions; but they spring from new impressions of the genius of man, of his destiny and history. No; these cathedrals are not like the arches of our forests, the temples for inevitable worship; but they are the fitting place for the apotheosis of genius."

There is some valuable truth, and something of hasty conclusion, in what follows:

"As you descend in the scale to those who can have only reference to the necessities of life in their dress, the English are far superior to us. Here come in their ideas of neatness, comfort, and durability. The labouring classes are much more suitably dressed than ours. They may have less finery for holidays, and their servants may not be so smartly dressed in the evening as are our domestics, but they are never shabby or uncleanly. Their clothes are of stouter stuffs, their shoes stronger, and their dress better preserved. We have not, you know, been into the manufacturing districts, nor into the dark lanes and holes of London, where poverty hides itself; but I do not remember, in five weeks in England, with my eyes pretty wide open, ever to have seen a ragged or dirty dress. Dirt and rags are the only things that come under a rigid sumptuary law in England.

"Order is England's, as it is Heaven's, first law. Coming from our head-over heels land, it is striking and beautiful to see the precise order that prevails here. In the public institutions, in private houses, in the streets and thoroughfares, you enjoy the security and comfort of this Heaven-born principle. It raises your ideas of the capacities of human nature to see such masses of beings as there are in London kept, without any violation of their liberty, within the bounds of order. I am told the police system of London has nearly attained perfection. I should think so from the results. It is said that women may go into the street at any hour of the night without fear or danger."

Utopian again!

The manners of the American tradesmen are usefully contrasted with that of the trader here, and much sensible reflection on matters of that kind closes with this significant remark:

"If I have felt painfully that the men and women of what is called 'good society' in America are greatly inferior in high cultivation, in the art of conversation, and in accomplishments, to a corresponding class here, I have felt quite assured that the 'million' with us occupy a level they can never reach in England, do what they will with Penny Magazines and diffusive publications, while each class has its stall into which it is driven by the tyranny of an artificially-constructed society."

We can find room for only one illustrative anecdote

"A certain great tailor was here yesterday morning to take R.'s. directions. His bad grammar, his obsequiousness, and his more than once favouring us with the information that he had an appointment with the Duke of ——, brought forcibly to my mind the person who holds the corresponding position in S ——. I thought of his frank and self-respecting manner, his well-informed mind, his good influence, and the probable destiny of his children."

Here is Miss Sedgwick's opinion on another point, to which it may scarcely be objected that she is an interested witness:

"Our girl, with her delicate features and nymph-like figure, is far more lovely in her first freshness than the English; but the Englishwoman, in her ripeness and full development, far surpasses ours. She is superb from twenty to forty-five."

Our closing extracts, for the present, shall be from the latter portion of the volume, descriptive of travels through Germany and Switzerland. And first, a kind and grateful word on LEAVING ENGLAND.

"It seems like leaving home a second time. If any thing could make us forget that we are travellers, it would be such unstinted kindness as we have received here. You cannot see the English in their homes without reverencing and loving them; nor, I think, can an Anglo-American come to this, his ancestral home, without a pride in his relationship to it, and an extended sense of the obligations imposed by his derivation from the English stock. A war between the two countries, in the present state of their relations and intercourse, would be fratricidal, and this sentiment I have heard expressed on all sides."

GERMAN MANNERS.

"The English race, root and branch, are, what with their natural shyness, their conventional reserves, and their radical uncourteousness, cold and repelling. The politeness of the French is conventional. It seems in part the result of their sense of personal grace, and in part of a selfish calculation of making the most of what costs nothing; and partly, no doubt, it is the spontaneous effect of a vivacious nature. There is a deep-seated humanity in the courtesy of the Germans. They always seem to be feeling a gentle pressure from the cord that interlaces them with their species. They do not wait, as Schiller says, till you 'freely invite' to 'friendly stretch you a hand,' but the hand is instinctively stretched out and the kind deed ready to follow it. This suavity is not limited to any rank or condition. It extends all the way down from the prince to the poorest peasant. Some of our party driving out in a hackney-coach yesterday, met some German ladies in a coach with four horses, postillions, footmen in livery, and other marks of rank and wealth. What would Americans have done in a similar position? Probably looked away and seemed unconscious. And English ladies would have done the same, or, as I have seen them in Hyde Park, have leaned back in their carriages, and stared with an air of mingled indifference and insolence through their eye-glasses, as if their inferiors in condition could bear to be stared at. The German ladies bowed most courteously to the humble strangers in the hackney-coach."

THE SUBORDINATE CLASSES IN GERMANY.

"The landlord often sits at the table with his guests, and, with his own country people, converses on terms of apparent equality. The same self-respect blends with the civility of the shop-keeper. He is very happy to serve and suit you, but, if he cannot, he is ready to direct you elsewhere. Shop-men have repeatedly, unasked, sent a person to guide us through the intricate Continental streets to another shop. The domestics are prompt, faithful, and cheerful in their services. There is freedom, but no presumption in their manners, and nothing of that unhappy uncertainty as to their exact position, so uncomfortable in our people. In all these subordinate classes you see nothing of the cringing servility that marks them in England, and to which they are exposed by their direct dependence on their employers."

AN ENGLISH TRAVELLER.

"You may know him by the quantity and variety of his luggage, by every ingenious contrivance for comfort (alas! comfort implies fixture,) impregnable English trunks, travelling-bags, dressing-cases, cased provisions for all the possible wants that civilisation generates, and all in travelling armour. There is no flexibility about an Englishman, no adaptation to circumstances and exigencies. He must stand forth, wherever he goes, the impersonation of his island-home. I said his luggage betrayed him; I am sure his face and demeanour do. His muscles are in a state of tension, his nerves seem to be on the outside of his coat, his eye-brows are in motion; he looks, as my friend says she felt when she first came to such a place as this, 'as if all the people about her were rats;' his voice is quick and harsh, and his words none of the sweetest, so that you do not wonder the Continental people have fastened on him the descriptive sobriquet of 'Monsieur God-d—n.'"

GERMAN ACTORS.

"We were fortunate in seeing one of the great dramatic performers of Germany, Emile Devrient. The play was one of the Princess Amelia's; a tale of domestic sorrow, as I ascertained by my interpreters. There was no scenic effect, no dramatic contrivance to aid it. The scene was not once shifted during the play. Devrient seemed to me, as far as I could judge merely from his action, expression, and voice, to deserve the applauses showered on him. The playing was all natural, and the voices of the women marvellously sweet. Have I never yet remarked to you the sweet, low tone of the German woman's voice? From the cultivated actress to your chambermaid, it is a musical pleasure to hear them speak. Is it an atmospheric effect, or the breath of a placid temper? The latter, I thought, when, a moment since, my inkstand was overset, and the girl summoned to repair the mischief held up her hands, smiled, and uttered, in a lute-like tone, a prolonged g—u—t! (good!)"

GERMAN CONTENTEDNESS.

"I leave this country with an interest, respect, and attachment that I did not expect to feel for any country after leaving England. I rather think that the heart grows by travelling! I feel richer for the delightful recollections I carry with me of the urbanity of the Germans. Never can I forget the 'Guten Tag,' 'Guten Abend,' and 'Gute Nacht,' ('good-day,' 'good-evening,' and 'good-night,') murmured by the soft voices of the peasants from under their drooping loads as we passed them in our walks. Addison says that the general salutations of his type of all benignity, Sir Roger de Coverly, came from the 'overflowings of humanity,'—so surely did these. On the whole, the Germans seem to me the most rational people I have seen. We never 'are,' but always 'to be blessed.' They enjoy the present, and, with the truest economy of human life, make the most of the materials of contentment that God has given them. Is not this better than vague, illimitable desires, and ever-changing pursuits?"

THE HISTORIAN, SISMONDI.

"It was delightful to see the pleased interest with which Sismondi listened to his wife's eulogium of his countrywomen. He drew his chair nearer and nearer, and when she ended he put his arm around her, and said with that simplicity which in him is such a grace, 'Je te remercie, mon cœur.'

"Sismondi said the chief glory of Geneva resulted from its having been the asylum of the oppressed from all parts of Europe. 'I can never think without emotion,' he continued, 'of the band of French Protestants who came here for refuge.' His voice was choked; after a moment he added, 'When they reached the summit of the Jura and saw the lake and city before them, they all, with one accord, fell on their knees and sang a psalm!' His tears again interrupted him, and he apologised for them, saying, 'Ce sont les choses qui me meuvent le plus; je ne peux jamais en parler.'* You have an infallible test of the heart when you know what does most move it. In this uncontrollable emotion Sismondi betrayed the unbounded love of freedom and the deep love of his fellow-creatures that breathe in all his works."

* "'These are the sort of things that most move me; I cannot speak of them.' Though Sismondi speaks English perfectly well, French is his language, and, when off his guard, he falls into it."

THE THREE HOMES.

BY MRS. CHARLES TINSLEY.

Childhood hath its one happy home,
Round which all bright glad feelings throng;
To them whose footsteps onward roam,
Another doth belong,
As ready to receive and save,—
Earth's best and latest home—the grave.

The best?—ay, still to us the best;
There doubt, and fear, and anguish end,
And to its long forbidden rest,
The tired heart may unbend;
Feeling that earthly ill no more,
May darkly canker at its core!

The household hearth,—the household tomb,—
Where lies the difference 'twixt these two?
O'er either broods the haunted gloom
In which the past withdrew;
And sadly link'd with both are they,
The cherish'd of our early day.

The bowers wherein our childhood stray'd,
Ere life upturn'd one sunless clod,
The hearth whereat, meet shrine, we pray'd,
With heart and voice to God,—
Are broken, chang'd,—and where they stood,
Is strangeness,—worse than solitude!

And even so our hopes and joys
Leave not a trace of that they knew;—
Endurance hides what grief destroys,
And woe for that which grew,
A pale, lone flower of human love,
Where Fate's cold shadow lower'd above!

We linger on, and wherefore?—all
We lov'd, or sought, or priz'd, are fled:
Why doth not now the stark stem fall,
When its best leaves are shed?
Why tarry for another sun,
Heeding what spoil the past hath won?

Even so it is, and must be:—here,
Upspringing flowers around us lie;
And, spite of all we've felt and fear,
We pluck them till we die;
Craving some blossoms for the tomb,
Some light to concentrate its gloom.

Doth thine heart faint?—ay, look around,
Pale shadowy things life's idols are!
Somewhat whereon to lean is found,
Is trusted,—all too far!
'Tis gone! what words may call it back,
What eye may follow on its track?

Yet, Christian, all undaunted, keep Thy onward course amid the spoil;
Yield not thy faith to earthly sleep,
Thy love to earthly soil;
But where a worthier promise lies,
There press thou, even to the skies!

Ay, down thy path, thus dust bestrew'd,
Go, bravely, surely, trusting on!
And, Phœnix-like, with life renew'd,
Heed not the ashes gone:—
Not all unreck'd of dost thou roam,
God is thy sire, and Heaven thy home!

From the Spectator

COMBE'S NOTES ON THE UNITED STATES.

This is one of the most impartial and judicious works illustrative of the character and condition of the United States, and at the same time the most unpretending, that has been published. It contains statistical information as valuable as that collected by Mr. Stuart; disquisitions on the phenomena of society and the individual mind as free from commonplace as those of Miss Martineau, less coloured by sentiment, and uttered without the note of preparation blown by that lady before her dicta like a herald's trumpet; and many acute, quiet remarks upon incidents and peculiarities, fit to be classed with those of Hall, Trollope, or Marryat. We allude to the authors named, not for the purpose of undervaluing their respective merits, or of saying that in the peculiar walk of each the merits of Mr. Combe approach to his or her's in degree, but for the purpose of indicating the various qualities combined in his view of America.

Mr. Combe's book is a true book; it has in every page internal evidence that the account Mr. Combe gives of its origin is literally correct. "From my first arrival I kept a note-book, into which I entered from day to day such observations as were suggested by the objects and circumstances around me. At first the novelty of aspect under which even commonplace objects occasionally presented themselves, imparted to many of them an interest which they did not intrinsically possess. But as at that time my journal was written solely for private use, I felt no scruple in entering in its pages many observations and impressions which would never have found a place in it had it been composed originally with a view to publication. In proportion, however, as the country and its affairs opened up to me in more familiar intercourse, higher objects excited attention; and many passing events, institutions, and social arrangements, suggested reflections, which, judging from my own experience, seemed calculated to interest the British public. It was only at a late period that the idea of publishing my observations presented itself, and that the considerations to be afterwards mentioned gradually led to its being realised."

Two circumstances have exercised a beneficial influence on the work,—first, the circumstance alluded to by Mr. Combe, that he did not visit America with a predetermination to publish an account of it; secondly, that the peculiar bent of his enquiries leads him at all times to scrutinise narrowly the thoughts, feelings, and actions of those by whom he is surrounded. His observations on the United States are a portion of those experiences which it has become almost his profession to accumulate, with a view to enable him to fathom the mystery of human life. He did not sally forth, note-book in hand, to collect materials for a work; but when he found that the materials collected for his own use possessed value and interest in themselves, he made up his mind to publish them. Besides that earnestness in the pursuit of truth to which we adverted in reviewing Mr. Combe's Moral Philosophy, and his practice in mental analysis, he had other qualifications for the task. His professional avocations as a solicitor in Edinburgh had made him familiar with the rise, progress, and consequences of the speculative rage which shook Scotland in 1825. There is something in the tastes and habits of Scotchmen—a lingering remnant of the sluttish well-being remarked about the domicile of Dandie Dinmont—less likely to be repelled by the want of elegant finish which characterises the substantial wealth of the United States, than the more fastidious feelings of Englishmen. Mr. Combe was qualified to judge of the economical relations of the United States, and to detect the real value of their unpolished treasures. In addition to this, the puritanical views which gained the ascendency in Scotland during our civil broils, laid the foundations of the social institutions of America. The moral and intellectual struggle which marks the progress of society in Scotland and America is the same—a struggle between the sceptical tendencies of science and a popular faith which had at an earlier period been burnt into the national mind by persecution; not, as in England, a struggle between the same scientific spirit and the temporal influence of an accomplished and sometimes rather lax, aristocratical hierarchy. The controversies between a voluntary and a compulsory state church—between Calvinism and the compromise between Deistical logic and Christian tradition called Unitarianism—are real questions with Yankees and Scotchmen, but which few Englishmen understand and fewer care about. Lastly, Mr. Combe's pursuits, making him a zealous advocate of education and amelioration of the penal law, were a masonic password to the confidence and co-operation of the leading spirits of the Union; and while directly giving and receiving information on those subjects, he was of necessity indirectly instructed regarding the peculiar position and views of his associates. With such opportunities and such preparation, an energetic mind like Mr. Combe's, in which an earnestness of purpose assuming almost the character of religious faith and a true Scotch caution are blended in nearly equal proportions, could not fail to make observations worthy of being preserved.

Mr. Combe arrived in America about the end of September 1838, and left in the beginning of June, 1840. His most prolonged visits were to New York, Washington, Philadelphia, Boston, and the vicinity of Portland in Maine. He visited Canada, but did not penetrate into the southern and western states of the Union. His personal observation is confined to the well-peopled part of the Union—to the great centres of its commercial and manufacturing industry—to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and the seat of the Central Government. His remarks apply to that portion of the Union, which, except in its closer propinquity and the equality of political privilege, stands to the southern and western states nearly in the same relation that Great Britain does to its Tropical and Australasian Colonies—to that part of the nation in which the centralisation of trading activity and accumulated capital has placed the preponderance of power. The armies of the Union (should it need or think it needs them) must be in a great measure recruited from the hardy pioneers of the west, and officered by the reckless chivalry of the south; but the larger share of political influence must remain with the capitalists of the north-east. The almost nomade independence of the inhabitants of the western territory, and the voice which they have in the Legislature and appointment of the Executive, will always oblige an American Government to regard their views and wishes respectfully; but the nucleus of the American state, the seat of its vitality, is in the districts visited by Mr. Combe. It is this portion of the nation, therefore, which is mainly interesting to foreigners; especially to us, seeing that the centre of American action is situated in close proximity to the remote frontiers of our possessions.

Mr. Combe visited the United States at a period particularly favourable to the observation of the peculiar forms and workings of their civil and social institutions. The nakedness of the machinery of government in that democracy renders its routine workings at all times visible; but Mr. Combe had the good fortune to see that machinery tried by a period of national excitement. During his stay, the Union underwent a commercial panic and a fit of warlike mania. He found the country in a state of high prosperity, and remained long enough to witness the alarm and stagnation occasioned by the suspension of the Western banks, at the time when the contest for ascendency between the bank and the President had converted the government party into a minority of the people, (as has since been shown,) and driven Mr. Biddle to resign. He was present while the spirit of enmity towards England, excited by the disputes on the Canadian frontier and about the Maine boundary, raged most fiercely. Moments of high excitement like these throw nations as well as men off their guard; and Mr. Combe has profited by them. He has placed many of the workings of the economical system of the United States in a new light. He has recorded many facts bearing upon the question of the permanency of the Union. These are topics that might lead us into too wide a field of discussion: we select in preference, Mr. Combe's remarks upon the national character of the Americans.

He thus judiciously treats the frequent charge against Americans of too exclusive a direction to the pursuit of wealth; and shows how even excessive application to such a pursuit does not necessarily imply sordid motives—

"The Americans are taunted by the British for their exclusive devotion to the pursuit of wealth; but in this respect, as well as in many others, they are the genuine heirs of English dispositions, with a better apology for their conduct. One of the earliest injunctions of the Creator to man was, 'to multiply and replenish the earth.' The Americans have a fertile country of vast extent placed before them, inviting them to fulfil this commandment; and it would argue mental lethargy or imbecility were they to disobey the call. But how can a wilderness be peopled and replenished without the creation of wealth? Houses must be built and furnished, clothes and implements of husbandry must be manufactured, animals must be reared; yet these are the constituent elements of wealth. The fertile soil of the West, therefore, invites the active and enterprising spirits of each generation to advance and take possession of it. Within two years after it is cleared, it places in the hands of the occupier a surplus produce after supplying his own wants. He sends this surplus to the Eastern cities to be sold, and receives in exchange the various manufactured articles which constitute the conveniences and ornaments of civilised life. The demand of the West on the capital and industry of the East is incessant and increasing. The rich lands of the west, aided by the rapid increase of population, present investments which can scarcely fail, after a few years, to yield an immense profit to the adventurer; and this legitimate drain for capital affects profits and interest and the value of property all over the Union. There are revulsions, no doubt, but the wave never recedes so far as it had advanced; and those who fail are generally men who have engaged in enterprises far beyond the measure of their capital and legitimate credit. Were the people of the East, therefore, to despise riches, and to become merely the cultivators of literature, philosophy, the fine arts, and all the social graces, they would be fit subjects for their own lunatic asylums. The physique must precede the morale in the order of nature. We must be well lodged, clothed, nourished, and altogether physically comfortable, before we can bend our minds successfully to refinement, philosophy, and the investigations of abstract science. The people of the United States, therefore, are only fulfilling a law of nature. They are peopling and replenishing the desert, and devoting themselves to this duty with a degree of energy, assiduity, and success, that is truly astonishing. It is in vain to blame their institutions or their manners for these results. They owe their origin to nature.

"But while I thus hold the Americans as not meriting disapprobation for pursuing wealth as their national vocation, I regard the impulse which prompts them to do so, as one which needs to be watched, and within certain limits to be resisted, lest it should swallow up all other virtues. Their real prosperity depends on the co-ordinate activity of their acquisitive with their moral and intellectual faculties. If their external circumstances stimulate acquisitiveness with a power equal to 10, they should put on a power of moral, religious, and intellectual cultivation equal to 15, to guide and restrain it. They are endeavouring to do so by their public schools; and if they succeed, they will in due season become a magnificently great nation—great equally in the possession of physical and moral civilisation.

"The Americans, although highly acquisitive, are not sordid as a nation. They expend their wealth freely; and where the object meets with their approbation, they are even munificent in their donations. The sums contributed by them to religious and benevolent societies, to the building of churches and colleges, and to the support of hospitals and similar institutions, are very large."

Still more important is our author's exposition of the warlike tendency of the American public, and its causes:

"The opinion is generally entertained in Britain, that the Americans are so intensely devoted to gain and so averse to taxation, that they are not a warlike nation: but my conviction is different. The history of their country, which, in one form or another, constitutes the staple of their instruction at school, records heart-stirring adventures of their ancestors in their contests with the Indians; and afterwards many successful battles in the cause of freedom when they fought for their own independence. Next comes the war with Britain in 1813, in which the existing generation boasts of many victories. All these achievements are described in the most fervid language; and every battle in which the Americans were victorious is illustrated by engravings or cuts, and celebrated in songs. In the hotels, and in innumerable private houses, pictures representing their triumphs by sea and land adorn the walls; the panels of some of their stage-coaches are ornamented with representations of their frigates capturing their British antagonists; in short, in the United States, the mind of each generation is rendered familiar with tales of war, and excited by their stirring influence from the first dawn of reason till manhood.

"Nor are these seeds sown on a barren soil. The Americans inherit the cerebral organisation of the three British nations; in whom the organs of combativeness, destructiveness, self-esteem, and firmness, the elements of pugnacity and warlike adventure, are largely developed. In them this endowment is accompanied by a restless activity of mind, which finds natural and agreeable vent in war, and by a degree of intelligence which renders them capable equally of individual enterprise and of combination in action. Add to all these the influence of extreme youth, and the belligerent spirit of this people is easily accounted for. In mentioning their extreme youth, I do not refer to their short national existence of only sixty-three years since the 4th of July, 1776, but to the extraordinary proportion of young persons in their population. It is well known that the population of the United States doubles every twenty-five years by natural increase alone, and every twenty-three years when assisted by immigration; but I have not observed that any just appreciation has been made by travellers of the influence of this fact on the character of the people. Nearly three generations are on the field at the same time; and as nearly every male on arriving at twenty-one years of age has a vote, the preponderating influence of the young men on the national resolves is very striking. From attending their public political meetings, my conviction is that the majority of their voters are under thirty-five or thirty-six years of age. Here, then, we have a people of naturally pugnacious dispositions, reared in the admiration of warlike deeds, imperfectly instructed in the principles on which the real greatness of nations is founded, possessed of much mental activity, impelled by all the fervour of youth, and unrestrained by experience. It would be matter of surprise if they were not predisposed to rush into a contest, especially with Britain, whom they still regard as their hereditary foe.

"Fortunately, however, for the people, and for the interests of civilisation throughout the world, there are numerous and strong impediments to the gratification of their warlike propensities. Their actual pursuits are all pacific; they live in plenty, and suffer no grievances except those which flow from their own errors, and which they have the power to remove; they have no warlike neighbours to threaten their frontiers; and the constitutions of the General Government and of the several States leave the executive power so feeble that it can only add to its own embarrassments by engaging in hostilities. The American standing army consists of only 12,539 men of all arms and all ranks, while its corps of militia are altogether unadapted to aggressive warfare. The nation, therefore, has no force, except seven line-of-battle ships, twelve frigates, and twenty sloops of war, (exclusive of those on the stocks,) with which to maintain a war of aggression. So thoroughly inefficient was the militia found to be in the last war, except as a defensive force, that the General Government resorted to the expedient of engaging volunteers; and on the present occasion Congress has authorised the raising of 50,000 men on the same terms. Fifty thousand volunteers may not appear to be a very formidable host to those who do not know the American people; but it would probably be found to consist of tough materials. A proclamation for the enlistment of such a force would call forth that number of young, ardent, enthusiastic men, with heads full of fancies about glory, and temperaments burning for the gratifications arising from enterprise and danger. A few months would suffice to confer on them the advantages of discipline; and they would then closely resemble the hosts of excited Frenchmen whom Napoleon led to the easy conquest of Italy and Germany. It is a blessing to the civilised world that so many impediments exist to this class of men attaining the ascendancy in the national councils."

These remarks have a necessary and important bearing upon the opinions expressed by Mr. Combe regarding the most prominent defect in American institutions:

"One defect in the American institutions and social training, at present, appears to me to be, that they do not sufficiently cultivate habits of deference, prudence, and self-restraint. They powerfully call forth all the faculties that subserve the interests and ambition of the individual, but they leave the higher social qualities imperfectly exercised and ill-directed. There is no training of veneration, except in religious tuition, which is too often confined to vague moral instruction and to the points of faith regarded as essential to salvation. Making allowance for individual exceptions, it may be stated, that an American young man, in emerging from school, has scarcely formed a conception that he is subject to any natural laws, which he must obey in every step of his progress in life, or suffer. He has not been taught the laws of health, the laws by which the production and distribution of wealth are regulated, or the laws which determine the progress of society; nor is he trained to subject his own inclinations and will to those or any similar laws as indispensable to his well being and success. On the contrary, he comes forth a free-born, self-willed, sanguine, confident citizen, of what he considers to be the greatest, the best, and the wisest nation on earth; and he commences his career in life guided chiefly by the inspirations of his own good pleasure. He votes and acts on the destinies of his country in the same condition of mind. In Britain, we cannot boast of much superiority in practical education, but our young men are not ushered into life so early; they are trained by the institutions and circumstances by which they are surrounded to a greater exercise of prudence and self-restraint; and few of them wield political power.

"It was my endeavour to explain to the Americans the importance of the new philosophy to a people in their present condition. Phrenology brings home to every mind capable of ordinary reflection, that all our functions and faculties, bodily and mental, are regulated by the Creator according to fixed laws; that within certain limits they produce enjoyment, and beyond these misery. By teaching children this view of their own constitution, and also rendering them familiar with the physical, organic, and moral laws instituted by the Creator, and by training them to obey them, that reckless self-confident spirit, which now animates many of them in the United States, would be supplanted by a disciplined understanding and regulated affections. Their institutions render them indisposed to reverence man, or human wisdom; but still they may venerate God, and practically fulfil his laws. Indeed, this species of moral and intellectual discipline appears to me to be indispensable to the permanence and success of a democracy. If the Americans do not adopt it, and rely on it as their sheet-anchor, no other means which ordinary sagacity can discover will lead them safely through the perils that will rise thicker and thicker in their path in proportion as their population becomes more dense."

Mr. Combe had occasion, like all other English visiters of America, to be struck with the servile deference paid to what is assumed to be popular opinion: less one-sided than his predecessors, however, he points out the prevalence of the same weakness at home:

"British authors have in general erroneously estimated the comparative influence of public opinion in their own country and in the United States. It appears to me to be pretty nearly as active and influential in Britain as it is in America, certain differences in its modes of operation being taken into consideration. In Britain (see p. 100) society is divided into a number of distinct classes, each of which has standards of opinion of its own. There is a public opinion peculiar to each class; and that opinion has acquired definite forms by the influence of ancient institutions. The opinions and modes of feeling of the individuals in each class grow with their growth and strengthen with their strength; and in the maturity of life these conventional impressions appear to be absolutely natural. The differences between the grades of society produce corresponding differences in opinion and modes of action; and when an observer surveys individuals of each class acting according to their own perceptions of propriety, he may imagine that, because they differ, each is manifesting a fine moral independence, in following the dictates of his own judgment. But this is an error: in America all men are regarded as equal; there is no distinct separation into classes with a set of established opinions and feelings peculiar to each. As society is young and the institutions are recent, there are no great influences in operation to mould opinion into definite forms, even within this one circle, which nominally includes all American citizens. The proper contrast, therefore, is between the power of public opinion in an English grade and in the American single circle; and if so viewed, the difference will not be found to be so greatly against the Americans as is generally supposed.

"The English candidates for public offices do not bow to popular opinions, because the people have no offices to bestow; but if we select the fashionable circle in London, and consider how many of the individuals who move in it could be induced by the dictates of reason, or even by motives of moral or religious duty, to brave its opinions and to pursue a line of conduct, however virtuous, that was stigmatised by the whole circle as vulgar or unfashionable, we should find the number very small. The same lack of moral courage, which is considered so peculiar to the Americans, would be found almost universally prevalent in it. If we proceed to another grade, the same fear of incurring disapprobation will be found to pervade its members; and so down to the lowest where public opinion ceases to act. In regard to private conduct the same result presents itself. In Edinburgh, a certain style of entertainment is in use in a certain rank; and although many condemn the pomp, circumstance, and heavy vanity of the style, not one individual out of fifty will venture to depart from the established usage. In Scotland, instead of the tyranny of the majority, we live under 'the fear of the folk;' and the most inattentive observer must have remarked that it is a most potential fear: it sends thousands to church who privately confess that they derive little edification from the exercises; it withholds thousands from countenancing their inferiors in society lest they should be regarded as ungenteel; and it impels countless multitudes to give an ostensible adherence to opinions and observances of which they in their consciences disapprove."

Amusingly illustrative of American deference for the people are some remarks headed

HOW TO MANAGE THE PEOPLE.

The American people may be held by promptness, good nature, and tact, but they will not be driven. In 1812, previously to the declaration of war against England, the mob of Philadelphia seized the rudder of a British brig lying at the wharf, to prevent her from sailing, there being at that time no legal authority for detaining her. Mr. —— a highly respectable and well-known citizen, met them dragging the rudder through the streets in triumph; he joined them, and hauled the rope and cheered with the rest. They proposed to go and break the windows of the British Consul. He went with them; and when they came opposite to the house, he addressed them, as if he had never heard of the proposal to break the windows, and said, "Now, my brave lads, let us give him three cheers, to show that we are not afraid of the British, and be off." He cheered instantly, and they all joined. At the close of the last cheer, he gave the word, "Off to the State-house!" and suited the action to the word so rapidly that nobody had time to suggest or do any thing else. Arrived at the State-house, he said, "Let us give three cheers for America, and lock up the helm in the State-house." "America for ever! Hurrah! hurrah!" The key of the cellar was obtained, and the helm locked up. Three cheers were given "for ourselves." "Dismiss!" was then uttered, and acted on by his walking away; and all followed his example. As the whole proceeding had been illegal, Mr. —— went quietly to the ship, and desired the captain to send up to the State-house for his helm in the night. He did so; put it on; and when the sun rose, he was down the Delaware on his voyage to England.

Another anecdote of the same gentleman is equally characteristic of the "way to manage the people." Between Walnut and Spruce Streets lay a piece of ground named the Potter's Field, or burial-place for strangers. Interments in it had long been prohibited; but it contained some graves and monuments enclosed by railings. There was a strong desire in the minds of many enlightened citizens to clear these away and to turn the ground into an ornamental square, as it now lay in the heart of the city; but every proposal to obliterate them was resisted by the public sentiment, although no living person could be found who was interested in any of them. Mr. —— suggested to a marble-cutter to carry off the monuments quietly and by slow degrees, at dead of night. In the course of two years, they all disappeared mysteriously, nobody knew how. The rails followed. Nobody interfered; nobody noticed the change until it was complete. He employed men quietly at night to level the surface over the graves. Thus was completed, in less than three years, without any authority whatever, a change which the enlightened residents had in vain solicited permission to accomplish. The ground being reduced to a waste, the civic corporation, without any hesitation, voted money to enclose it with a handsome rail, to plant it, and to furnish it with gravel-walks. It is now Washington Square; one of the greatest ornaments, and a great benefit to the city.

We had marked many passages for extract, but find we have already indulged too much. The effect of the work is to inspire faith in the permanence and beneficial tendency of the democratic institutions of the Union; a faith which seems to have grown up insensibly in the author's mind, dissipating the nightmare apprehensions inspired by the close book-closet atmosphere of Edinburgh. And, not to pause on small blemishes, we repeat that Mr. Combe's Notes will he found beyond all question the best general work that has yet been published on the United States.

THE EARLY BLUE-BIRD.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

Blue-bird, on yon leafless tree,
Dost thou carol thus to me,
"Spring is coming! spring is here!"
Say'st thou so, my birdling dear?
What is that in misty shroud
Stealing from the darken'd cloud?
Lo! the snow-flakes' gathering mound
Settles o'er the whiten'd ground,
Yet thou singest blithe and clear,
"Spring is coming! spring is here!"

Strik'st thou not too bold a strain?
Winds are piping o'er the plain,
Clouds are sweeping o'er the sky,
With a black and threat'ning eye;
Urchins, by the frozen rill,
Wrap their mantles closer still;
Yon poor man, with doublet old,
Doth he shiver at the cold?
Hath he not a nose of blue?
Tell me, birdling—tell me true.

Spring's a maid of mirth and glee,
Rosy wreaths and revelry:
Hast thou woo'd some winged love
To a nest in verdant grove?
Sung to her of greenwood bower,
Sunny skies that never lower—
Lured her with thy promise fair
Of a lot that knows no care?
Prythee, bird, in coat of blue,
Though a lover—tell her true.

Ask her if, when storms are long,
She can sing a cheerful song—
When the rude winds rock the tree,
If she'll closer cling to thee?
Then the blasts that sweep the sky,
Unappalled shall pass thee by,
Though thy curtain'd chamber show
Siftings of untimely snow,
Warm and glad thy heart shall be,
Love shall make it spring for thee.

SONNET.

SUGGESTED BY THE DEATH OF GENERAL HARRISON.

Thy foes, O Liberty! are hale and strong;
And, exultingly, their forts and fanes,
Wherein to shelter their great idol, Wrong,
Who looks through loop-holes and religious panes
Upon a prostrate world. Alas! thy friends
Have often failed to read thy truths aright;
And grieved thee by mistaking means for ends,
Till tyranny has pointed to thy light
And said: "'tis but a vapour that ascends,
Out of the swamps of life, to mock its night."
I hoped that one had risen up, of late,
To teach the monarch and the mitred slave
How pure a thing it is they fear and hate:
But he who promised this reposes in the grave.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER.

Commodore Sir Charles Napier has achieved a rapid and universal notoriety; first, by his brilliant conduct in Syria; secondly, by his self-laudatory progresses through particular districts of this country, and his squabble with Sir Robert Stopford, as to their respective shares in the glory of routing the Egyptians; and lastly, and more immediately, by his having been enabled to procure his return for the metropolitan borough of Marylebone, on the retirement of the late member, Lord Teignmouth. As his name is just now in every body's mouth, and as the readers of the Britannia are not likely to have been included in any of the many mobs or multitudes whom the gallant Narcissus has been of late addressing, it may be well to anticipate a very probable curiosity, by taking measure of his intellectual and physical proportions, and showing what manner of man he is.

But it may be said that it is unfair, or, to say the least, unwise, to criticise a man as a member of Parliament, before he has even entered the walls of the House of Commons; and one or the other it does in truth at first sight seem to be. Not so, however, in the case of Sir Charles Napier. He is one of those men about whose calibre of intellect and judgment it is almost impossible to make a mistake. Nor are we likely to err as to the course which such a man would be apt to take—at all events, as to that which would be wisest for him. Every one has heard of the facetious advice written by the Eton scholar under the word "Resurgam" on the tombstone of his master:—

> "Lie still, if you're wise;
> You'll be —— if you rise!"

The same advice might, with propriety, be given to the new M. P. for Marylebone. His cup of glory is full. If, in the intoxication of his joy, he attempts any Bacchanalian impossibilities, it will assuredly overflow. Out of doors, Sir Charles is a very great man, but the atmosphere of the House of Commons is not for such as he. He is an Un-common, and as surely as he rises in that House he will as rapidly be brought to his level. What the Egyptian cannon-balls could not effect, the derisive cheers, or the intentional Babel, of a crowded House on a great debate-night, will assuredly bring to pass. Presently I will endeavour to show why.

Not for an instant would I presume to doubt the naval and military reputation of this gallant officer. He is, perhaps, unrivalled in that kind of bull-dog courage and insensibility or indifference to danger, which, in the intense ardour of animal impulse, flings itself into the arms of Fate, and knows at the moment no other object but indiscriminate destruction. Such a man is a kind of human percussion-shell. Nothing can hope to stand against him, and Fortune, who always cherishes those that flout her, shields him from bullets and cannon-balls. Half-a-dozen Sir Charles Napiers, at the head of such fine fighting material as our soldiers and sailors, would pacificate the world, for no men would oppose them. Stone walls would crumble at their approach—at least, so says Sir Charles Napier—and treaties of peace would be concluded so soon as it was known how many of these men each country contained. The honour, however, of first inventing these moral peace-makers belongs not to either Sir Charles or to Captain Warner, but to our good King Harry the Eighth, who caused the gates of some French fortress to open at the mere sight of an enormous wooden cannon, which the simple garrison thought to be real; thus giving the first great historical instance of a people succumbing to a "demonstration."

But while fully prepared to accord to Sir Charles Napier almost all, if not all, the extravagant honour which has been heaped upon him by his Palmerstonian supporters, and which, having been heaped on him, he seems too polite or too self-appreciating to fling off again, I must be allowed to doubt whether the quality of physical bravery in the field be exactly the best passport into the House of Commons, particularly when its owner represents a metropolitan constituency. If it be said that it is right that the foreign successes of the Whigs should be represented in the House of Commons, and that no man would be so likely in his own person perpetually to remind the House of them as Sir Charles Napier, then at least it will be admitted that it would have been much better that he had started for some naval borough, than for a place like Marylebone, with whose sober, quiet, shop-keeping inhabitants, such a slashing, roaring, hot-headed sailor as Sir Charles can have nothing whatever in common. If he were wise, he would take his seat quietly, and hold his tongue for the remainder of his days; or until Lord Palmerston required to shoot him off from Downing-street to shatter the empire of Russia, or the kingdom of France, into unimaginable Homœopathic particles. Yet, if he were to take the advice of his well-wishers and do this, surely the electors of Marylebone would not be satisfied. A metropolitan member a dumb parrot! A Hawes or a Wakley without the talking instinct! Forbid it Reform! Forbid it the Genius that waiteleth over multitudes, and revels in the music of their roar! But Sir Charles Napier, judging from his past exhibitions, is not very likely to play the dumb-dog—he seems, the rather, inclined, on every possible occasion, to exercise his vocal organs for the benefit of his fellow-creatures. On one theme he is always magnanimously eloquent, and that is precisely the theme which the House of Commons never tolerates, except in the case of some particular pets. Whether it be from envy, or from practical habits, the House will never listen patiently to any man who talks about himself. They always require a quid pro quo—some beneficial suggestion, or some new idea—as a compensation for the tedium of listening. Now, deprived of the opportunity of talking of himself and his own exploits, what on earth will Sir Charles Napier find to talk about? Of general politics, trade, finance, law, railroads, what knows he? He will be too honest to be put upon election committees, too untractable to submit to the "thimble-rig" mystifications of his party. What then will he do? First, he will disappoint the Marylebone people; and then the Whigs—if they should be in office—will get him a ship and put him out of the way as soon as possible. His return has served a party purpose, and that purpose answered, they will consign him to the dangerous honour of dashing his head against the bulwarks of some other Acre, or perhaps send him on a glorious mission to China, to pull the nose of his Celestial Majesty and cut off his pigtail.

The simple truth is, that Sir Charles Napier is exactly one of those men who are the least fitted for the atmosphere of the House of Commons. In his own sphere he is undoubtedly of high value, as shewing that that bold and dauntless bravery is not passed away from among us, which contributed so much to the gaining of those great victories that have made the naval history of this country the most brilliant in the world. But put such a man as that in a conspicuous position in an assembly where tact, coolness, and judgment are the qualities most certain to ensure success, and you run the risk of forcing him to become worse than a nonentity, you place him where he has irresistible temptations to make himself ridiculous. This is bad enough for the individual, but for the country it is worse, because, at a time when comparatively so few are distinguished, especial care should be taken to have no unnecessary drawbacks on their fame. Soult, as a minister, has frittered away much of his deserved reputation as a soldier, and so, in a greater proportion, because of his being relatively of less importance, will Sir Charles Napier, unless he has the sense to be silent, gradually weary that good feeling which at present is felt for him by persons in all ranks and parties. His first sally may perhaps be listened to with curiosity, but even the savage gets tired of the eternal beating of a drum. His very sincerity and simplicity of mind will tell against him.

His appearance and manner, too, will not help him in making his way in the House, although they are strikingly characteristic, as is the case with all men of marked peculiarities. He is not above the middle size, and there is nothing commanding in his appearance, while his style of speaking exhibits a vivacity bordering on extravagance—something approaching to that which the vulgar are apt to designate as "mad-headed." His countenance is very intelligent, but it is rather of that sort which consists in mobility of feature and perpetual change of expression, than an intelligence evincing the existence of the higher qualities of the mind. His eye, however, struck me as most remarkable, being particularly large and full. The only similitude I can think of for it is, that of the eye of a bull when excited. I defy any man to look steadfastly at it without some undefined feeling of fear; nor without a consciousness that its possessor was a man of extraordinary determination.

The leading events in Commodore Napier's career are well known. His service in our navy in the last American war, his brilliant achievements in Portugal, his previous unsuccessful attempts to enter parliament, his rapid victory in Syria, and lastly, his contest and return for Marylebone, are in every one's mouth, and may be read for a few pence in every print-shop. I only hope that Marylebone will not be his Moscow.—Britannia.

BROUGHAM COME BACK.

"Oh for him back again!
I wish I had him back again:
I would gie a' Knockhaspie's land
For Highland Harry back again."

The horrible flatness of the Parliamentary debates during the present session has more than once set us to humming this old Scotch song. Our prayer has been heard. The truant has watched his moment: the first white specks on the crests of the popular wave, giving indication of a rising breeze, have lured the strong-pinioned sea-bird back to dally with the storm.

There has been a growing interest attaching to the debates in the House of Lords for a week or two back. The Corn-law question has forced itself in among them, and sorely ruffled the equanimity of some of their lordships. The pertinacity of Earls Fitzwilliam and Radnor has transformed the dignified and somewhat supercilious assembly into a rather vivacious ecole d'enseignement mutuel. Protesting against the discussion of subordinate parts of the great question, the Peers have shown themselves as unable to resist the temptation to argument, as the wandering scholars challenged by Gil Blas and his school-fellows. They have discussed with great neatness the controversies about the relations between prices and wages, the justice of subjecting the necessaries of life to taxation, &c. &c. Under the guidance of Lord Fitzwilliam, a promising scholar of the upper form, they have been training themselves for a more comprehensive discussion—storing up facts and arguments, strengthening their minds, and rendering them more adroit by exercise. Intelligent bystanders have experienced a benevolent pleasure in seeing so many ingenious minds so usefully employed.

The sudden mingling of the clear emphatic voice of Brougham with these gentle disputations produced a startling effect. It was the apparition of a practiced debater, aiming his blow at the vital part, and striking home at once, and without effort. Lord Brougham stripped the subject of the adventitous accessories with which it has been encumbered. He placed it on the unassailable basis of justice and expediency. He reminded his hearers, how the question had been urged upon them in a period of comparative calm; and how it was the necessary consequence of their refusing to entertain it then, that it was now forcing itself upon their notice in the clamour of agitation, at a moment when the financial and economical condition of the country rendered immediate action unavoidable.

Lord Brougham has taken possession of the question of the day in the House of Lords. Never the indiscriminate eulogists, we have sometimes been the sharp censors of Lord Brougham; but truth and justice compel praise from lips unused to flatter.—Brougham is the only man of his own high class of intellect now in public life. He has in his time done service to the cause of rational government which no one but himself could have done, as he has at times perilled a high reputation with a wantonness in which no less robust a genius could have indulged without utter and irrecoverable destruction. He stands now in the maturity of his powers—ripened, mellowed by experience and time, with all his energies unimpaired. He stands forth emancipated from party trammels. By reliance on his own genius and persevering industry, he has taught an assembly which cannot be expected to sympathise with him, to listen with deference and fear. He is regarded with a kindly feeling even by the most excited portion of the democracy. He can plead the great cause which is now depending, with more knowledge, greater variety of argument and illustration, and more impressive power than any other living orator: he can plead it more acceptably to the House of Lords than any other man: he can count upon a more willing attention from the Chartists than will be given to any other. By becoming the exponent of principles, heedless as to whether men applaud and follow him or not, he can make himself the champion of the rights of industry, the central point in which discordant wills may meet in harmony. He can do for Free Trade all and more than he formerly did against the Orders in Council; thereby rendering a service to his country as much transcending his former services as the matured power of Lord Brougham exceed the wayward energies of young Henry Brougham. At times "spots have come over his mortal star;" but an opportunity is now afforded him to efface their recollection for ever, and to cast a light on what may be the closing scene of his life, stronger and steadier than has shone on any portion of his previous career.

GERMANY.

The King of Prussia has no easy task before him. No sooner did he seize the despotic reins of his father's government than he relaxed them, spoke of giving his coursers full swing, and never doubted of his ability to manage them even at that pace. They have accordingly set out very rapidly, and his Majesty is alarmed. He half promised his people a half constitution; they have instantly set up a cry for a whole one. He promised that every act of his government should be laid before the provincial assemblies, and these have not tarried to discuss them. He promised publicity for the minutes of their proceedings. Not content with this, the states have published the very speeches of the members. The Augsburg Gazette for the last week has had several columns devoted to the speeches of the Rhenish deputies on the burning affair of the Archbishop of Cologne. This has evidently given birth to two opinions or two parties in the Prussian cabinet—one for repression, one for persevering in patience and semi-liberalism. Thus several of the Liberal prints of Germany were proscribed in Prussia a week or two ago; whilst the latest accounts tell us that the prohibition was a mistake, and that it had been taken off. This is a critical moment, for it is evident that the King of Prussia must either go on or fall back. All the states have petitioned for the reality of a constitution; the present commencement of one will certainly not suffice. His Majesty has reprimanded the Silesians for their hardihood in asking for the fulfilment of the promises of the old King, but the several states of the Prussian monarchy seemed determined on pressing for their rights. The King, therefore, must go on or recoil; if he recoils, he may resume his despotic powers of government without exciting any immediate trouble, but then he loses that progressive influence and authority over the whole German mind which Prussia was fast gaining. Prussia is now the commercial sovereign of Germany, and the intellectual head, moreover, of its several countries To add the political sceptre to its other ones is the great object; to be the Great Fredéric of peace is the aim of the present sovereign.—This cannot be done by turning suddenly, like the King of Bavaria, from extreme liberalism as Prince to a capricious tyrant as King. The Monarch of Prussia has a great and a difficult character to support; he has not yet failed in it, and cool patience seems one of his qualities;—his long and painful negotiation with Rome shows this. But the next two years will form a critical epoch in Prussian and German history; and for our part, we watch their progress with interest and anxiety.

Another difficulty with the King of Prussia, in addition to the necessity of his attaining the political sceptre of Germany, is to retain the intellectual one. Were Prussia to set free the press and each professor's tongue, this were soon done; but to half check both, to secure the quiescence of these, yet obviate the danger of excess, is the difficult point. The political press of Prussia is completely gagged; but the license of liberalism breaks out in literary papers, in religious, critical, philosophical discussion. Just as in France under the Restoration, when the censorship stopped political discussion, people began to discuss spiritualism and materialism, and these became the symbols of the political parties.—Hence the dislike of the Prussian government to Hegel and his philosophical heirs, deeming his transcendentation hostile to monarchic and religious principle. It has to fight ultra-Catholicism on one hand, and the school which analyses religion into a mere caput mortuum on the other. This intellectual combat is too subtle, too profound, for a government to carry on. 'Twere better to give more liberty on substantial points, for when people have political, municipal, and personal rights and interests to discuss, it soon neglects metaphysical ones. When Napoleon extinguished the French press, those who were most annoyed were the metaphysicians, or, as he called them, the ideologues. So is it with the King of Prussia. He keeps down newspaper writers, and he has to combat the more formidable band of wild priests and mad philosophers; and he has, moreover, to keep up the character of the kingdom for intellectual supremacy over the rest of Germany. There is no exaggeration, therefore, in calling his task difficult.

Neither should we forget that Prussia has undertaken to manage the commercial interests of Germany, make treaties for it, protect its manufactures, and find markets for its produce. With this view Prussia has concluded a reciprocity treaty with England, allowing British vessels, under certain duties and restrictions, to supply the German Union with colonial articles. This has created considerable ferment, and angered not merely the German beet-root growers, but set all the theorists in arms. German patriots demand nothing less than a German navy; and, as they have no colonies, they assert that Brazil is the best connexion, the mother of its prince being a German, its sugar being the cheapest, and Brazil allowing trade on the most advantageous terms. There is a Jew of the name of Lizt, or Moser, who has learned, from a residence in the United States, a hatred of England, and a smattering of political economy. He is a writer as indefatigable as Cobbett, and he daily pours forth diatribes against England, which are not without influence upon his half-informed readers.

ALGIERS.

The French expedition, which was to have crushed the Moors and finished the conquest of Africa, is beginning to show its fruits. General Bugeaud went express from Paris to mend the mishaps of his predecessors. The General was so confident of settling the affair to his own satisfaction, that he took two of the King's sons along with him, and even put them in command—a matter which in France is always regarded as the sign of a holyday campaign. For no French King or Prince for the last two centuries has ever joined the army, except when that army was expected to walk over the course. Henry the IV. was the last fighting King of France, until Napoleon finished the race of the Royal non-combatants, and heard the whistling of bullets in person.

So began the triumphal march of the new General. All was as much en regle as a ballet at the Opera. The staff were in their full dress coats, the bulletin writers were all at their posts, and the Royal duke was superb in gold embroidery and blood-royal heroism. All was as showy as a review on the Boulevard of Paris. But all was not quite so safe in the end. It is true, that the General marched over leagues of unresisting sand, that he stormed several ruined villages, captured some sick and wounded of the natives, and erected the French banner on the brow of a range of hills unnamed in the French maps. But when we look for the true facts of victory—the submission of the native chiefs, the capture of native squadrons, or the allegiance of native provinces—we look in vain. At length, however, the truth comes in a more tangible shape. We find that the General-in-Chief has returned to Algiers, apparently with enough on his hands in the simple task of defending it; next, that he complains of having been disappointed of "complete victory" by the too great enthusiasm, the too ardent daring, the too precipitate heroism of some of his especial champions!—for, be it known to mankind, that whenever a Frenchman is outwitted, it is always in consequence of an excess of talent, as, whenever he is beaten, the affair is always the result of his superabundant valour. But still more palpable evidences of ill-luck now begin to transpire. The French journal, the Commerce, tells us, that no less than three Generals are returning to France, disgusted with the state of things in Africa. One of them retires in irritation at the Governor-General's having named him as the cause of a false movement, which that Governor-General says prevented his surrounding the Arab army. The officer thus charged, however, recriminates by saying that the Arabs were so far from being surrounded, that they were actually on the point of surrounding the French, having already outflanked them, and that his movement was actually essential to rescuing the army. "Who shall decide when heroes disagree?" But nothing can be clearer than that quarrels at head-quarters are no proofs of triumphs in the field; that courts-martial are rather dubious evidences of unanimity; and that the retreat of a French force before an attacking Arab one is not highly predictive of the conquest of Africa.

The French feeling on the subject of these perilous and profitless expeditions is not yet turned into the channel of common sense. Every French tinker or cobbler no sooner reads the word glory at the head of a bulletin, than he imagines himself a hero, and burns for the conquest of the globe. A nest of wasps probably imagines it a lost day when it has not plundered a neighbouring hive, or fixed its stings in a neighbouring herd. The French are always restless until they are soundly beaten, and even then they submit only until they are in a condition to be restless and beaten again. This process has taken place regularly every half century since the days of the Capets, with occasional interludes of havoc, which have only been foretastes of still heavier retribution.

The French populace will still imagine that the shadow of glory is an equivalent for its substance, and that every Frenchman is several inches taller on the day of a declaration of hostilities. To this mistaken theory we must attribute the sort of distempered excitement with which the very mention of abandoning the horrible warfare in Africa is received in France. We see the French legislature start from their seats at the very idea that Louis Philippe had ever harboured the thought of extinguishing this flame, which is already wasting away the wealth, the blood, and even the military character of France. The Minister is forced to explain, qualify, and promise, and protest, in the name of national glory, against giving up a war which produces nothing but lists of killed and wounded. Louis Philippe is a rational man, and we have no doubt that he would rejoice to see the last French soldier taking his leave of Algiers; but what can he do with thirty millions of fanatics, who overlook the horrors that must be waded through in the most trivial war? The Minister defends the King from the charge of treachery. We are satisfied that the present King has not broken any promise. But it is not with Louis Philippe that the expedition originated. What answer can the Minister of Charles the Tenth give? That Minister, with all his Cabinet, have undergone a long penalty for their administration. It is of them that the question of pledges should be asked, or France should be taught the necessity of being guided by the same laws which regulate the intercourses of honest men, whether in the humblest condition in life, or on the throne. Britannia.

FRANCE AND THE LEVANT.

France and England have been mutually waging for the last year a financial war, one effect of which has been to increase tenfold the difficulties of government in both countries. Some of its effects in England are too clearly and too recently before the public to need recapitulation. In France the Finance Minister has quite as hard a task. Notwithstanding the enormous increase of expenditure, there is no new tax that he durst invent. For even his straining of the old, so as to wring the last penny legally from the tax payer, is raising a storm in the provinces, far louder than the mock-storms of war, which the press alone excited through the country. M. Humann keeps his loan suspended over the market, both he and the capitalists, who are to engage in it, waiting for the solution of the Eastern question and the re-entrance of France into the Concert European. Were this to be further obstructed, and Eastern and European affairs became again embarrassed, France would inevitably experience a financial crisis, deeply wounding to her credit and prosperity. Hence there prevails a considerable anxiety, and a sincere wish, that Mehemet may at once accept the new offers made to him. M. Guizot sincerely wishes it, and the instructions sent to Count Rohan Chabot, the French Consul at Alexandria, are as imperative and pressing as can be. Austria too, and Prince Metternich, who are both of them as timid and Gallican in 1841, as they were valiant and Gallophage in 1840, has used her utmost influence in Constantinople to render favourable the new condition to be offered to Mehemet. These conditions are indeed as favourable as he could require, except, perhaps, as far as regards the amount of tribute. And Austria has obtained, that the sum demanded shall not be peremptory, but that the Turkish Envoy shall have power to make a compromise, and accept considerably less than the £400,000 annual tribute formally demanded.

All this would be a very satisfactory prognostic of peace, did repose reign all round the Mediterranean. But it is to be feared that the French want to settle the Alexandria question, merely in order to awaken another, in which the four powers are not allied, and in which France may recover the influence and eclat which she imagines herself to have lost lately. The question they would, if not excite, at least take advantage of, is the old one of Greek against Turk, Christian against Mahommedan.—French agents declare that the Christians are rising, or about to rise, every where against the Porte, in Syria, in Mesopotamia, Asia-Minor, on the Danube, and in the islands. And the French hope to exploiter the movement. The case of Candia is the most flagrant, where the Greeks have risen and held the mountains against the Turks. The French press, the same organ which represented M. Thiers's ideas, call on the French government to interfere for the Greeks. This could only be done by an expedition. And as the French say their statesmen have avowed designs on Candia, such an expedition would be tantamount to conquest. Other powers would not suffer it, and war might be the consequence. There is danger, therefore, in the Candiate struggle continuing. The English authorities have interfered to bring about an accommodation, by which the Greeks would be ensured their privileges and a certain degree of freedom. We are yet to learn the result.

Turkey resembles a sick individual, around whose bed all the powers of Europe have collected or sent their state physicians. France, after the first look, has declared it a hopeless case, gives over the patient, declares aid or medicine quite idle, and instead of joining a consultation to save the sick, merely meditates the best way of appropriating or partitioning his spoil. Lord Palmerston and Lord Ponsonby, on the contrary, stand up for the vitality of Turkey, deny its disease to be fatal or mortal, and insist that care and restoratives will bring back the patient to the energy of health and manhood. It is highly probable that the doctors on both sides are mistaken, and that Turkey is neither on the point of death, as the French wish and imagine, nor yet possessed of stamina sufficient to give hopes of a perfect recovery. Turkey may still live on many years of epileptic life, with that power of resistance which an originally robust body offers to decay. Russia, perhaps, takes this view of the subject, for her policy applies merely temporary remedies to Turkey's ills. Russia does not recommend reform, or any of those alteratives proposed in order to restore the patient to health. Let things be, is Russia's plan. No one shall rob my dying friend of his property, because I am the presumptive heir. But as to making him young again, as English empirics attempt, why they may try, but Russia will look on and laugh at them. Thus, we believe, lies Turkey, with a pessimist doctor on one side, an optimist doctor on the other, whilst a third interested party stands with a drawn sword merely to watch that no alteration be made in the will. If the two quarrelling doctors had common sense, they would consult together on their own interests, as well as on that of their patient, and leave off squabbling for theories.—Examiner.

SINGULAR PRISONERS.

James Swan, an American merchant, was committed to the prison of St. Pélagie [in Paris], on the 28th of July, 1808, for a sum of 625,640 francs (upwards of £25,000,) and re-passed the gates, for the first time, on their opening to the Revolution, on the 28th of July, 1830, twenty-two years afterwards, to a day. This man, possessed of a fortune amounting to nearly four millions of francs, denied the justness of the claim beyond the sum of six or seven thousand francs, and determined to pass his life in prison, rather than obey a judicial sentence which he considered unjust. Having, first, caused it to be intimated to his wife and children that he would disinherit them to the last farthing of his property if they paid the debt, he furnished his prison apartment in a style of princely magnificence, and hired, in the Rue de la Célé, opposite the gates of St. Pélagie, a spacious dwelling, with coach-house and stables, for his friends, cooks, &c. For the former class, he kept two carriages; and they were commissioned to appear for him, and spend his money, in the Bois-de-Boulogne, public streets and promenades, balls and theatres. "A curious original was James Swan. He strutted and attitudinised in his prison, like Chodrue-Duclos in his rags: it was his method of flinging a defiance in the face of society. Consistent in his determination, he was preparing to return to his prison, after the events of the 'three days,' when, on the 31st of July, he was seized with apoplexy at his temporary lodging," and consigned to the closer and longer imprisonment of the grave. The motives of the well-known M. Ouvrard are less honourable, though the consequences to himself were less severe. Not disputing the debt for which he was detained, he yet refused to pay it, and determined, like Mr. Swan, to undergo his imprisonment, which, as a Frenchman, could not, in his case, exceed five years. He, too, led a life of princely expenditure in his prison; and, amongst other instances of his extravagance, it is told of him that, for the purpose of adding a neighbouring room to his establishment, he paid the debt of the prisoner who occupied it. "One day, when M. de Villèle, the Finance Minister, was dining with him, the latter urged him to settle matters with Séguin, representing the scandal which his conduct reflected on the government, which had so long retained him as contractor-general. 'Parbleu, Monseigneur!' replied Ouvrard; 'you speak very much at your ease. I am here for five years, for five millions of money: I gain, therefore, by my imprisonment, one million a year; and if you know of any speculation at once more lucrative and sure, I am not obstinately wedded to this, observe! In that case, I will pay to-morrow.'" For the sake of its honourable contrast, we may add to these the case of Dante, the Conde de Foscolo, patriarch of Jerusalem, who was incarcerated for 100,000 francs, at the suit of a curé of Paris, and liberated by an accidental omission in the deposit of the aliment money required by law on the part of the detaining creditor, after an imprisonment of upwards of six years. "But the patriarch was an honest man. When he had recovered his liberty, and was under no further compulsion to do so, he paid every farthing of his original debt; and the curé eventually lost nothing but those costs which a more evangelical spirit would have prevented his incurring."—Athenæum.

CHOICE OF PAPERS FOR ROOMS.

Many elegant patterns are displayed on coloured grounds: the effect may please in one room, which in another will be displeasing; yet the cause will be inexplicable: light, more or less, will account for the difference. Coloured grounds, however pale, will always be too gloomy in rooms which have not much light. In London, this is an essential matter of consideration; even in the country, the aspect and number of windows will produce a surprising difference in the general effect. Nor ought any erroneous idea to be entertained, that a paper with much white in it will quickly soil, and therefore must be more extravagant; for if white soils, colours fade. A room, then, scantily supplied with windows, ought never to be papered with a coloured ground; for the same reason, the doors and other wood-work should invariably be white. Apartments well supplied with light may r joice in a less confined range of colours. Another failure in effect—little suspected in the choice of colours, even where light can be commanded to an unlimited extent—is the want of consideration of the hue that will best "light up." Exquisite as is pale blue in itself, it is heavy in a mass; and even where sparingly introduced, ay, even in small portions, among gilding and pure white (as in large concert rooms,) it dulls the whole. A blue dress by candle-light is unsatisfactory; and a room with blue grounded paper and blue paint to correspond, will never light well at night; an apartment similarly decorated with buff or "flesh" colour would require but six wax candles to produce a cheerful and sufficient illumination, if blue would swallow up the light of eighteen candles, and then not produce an agreeable impression. Pale flesh, or pink and buff, are very charming hues, but are ill for the complexion; few persons look in health with much of these colours around them; and blue is trying; white, with a hint of blush, or that of stone, is good. The most perfect—or rather the nearest approach to perfection—is a paper with a pure white ground, and running pattern of shaded slates, and white paint, "picked in" with pale slate to correspond. Rooms hung with or painted scarlet are rich, but very dismal, and invariably look less than if adorned with a light tint. They require also to be illuminated more, and much earlier in an evening, than those with pale colours. Towards dusk, scarlet appears black: let any person doubting this try the fact, by wearing a scarlet cloak or shawl, and look at it as the shades of twilight advance. Yellow, and buff, and pink, can be scarcely better discriminated by candle-light than can blue and green.

ON DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

As a fond mother o'er her children bends
  In melting love, and clasps one to her breast,—
One at her feet, one on her knee she tends,
  Whilst to another's brow her lips are press'd;
And 'mid their sports and murmurs still attends
  To every varied fanciful request,— Whispers to one—to one a glance she sends,
  And smiles or chides, in all her love confess'd:
So watches over us the sovereign power
  Of Providence; this comforts, that supplies,
Hears all, and doth on all His mercy shower.
  And if some grace or favour He denies,
'Tis but to teach the soul her prayers to pour,
  Or by denial graciously replies.

ON THE LOSS OF SIGHT.

Already, ere my sun of life descend,
  The shades of night are closing o'er these eyes,
  Lessening the worth of those frail things we prize,
Which to the world their vain adornments lend.
My failing sight these shadowy forms offend,
  Eternal objects (I dared once despise, Forget or lightly think of) now arise,
And round me still in magnitude extend.
Thus, as in feeble light the diamond's ray
  Gleams out, and brighter doth itself reveal
Than when exposed to the broad glare of day;
  So doth my feeble sight teach me to feel
Supernal things, and the dark shade display
  The brighter glories of the empyreal!

CHAPTER XCI.—A Rencontre.

"Lieutenant O'Malley, 14th Light Dragoons, is appointed an extra aide-de-camp to Major-General Crawford, until the pleasure of his royal highness the prince regent is known." Such was the first paragraph of a general order, dated Fuentes D'Onoro, the day after the battle, which met me as I awoke from a sound and heavy slumber, the result of thirteen hours on horseback.

A staff appointment was not exactly what I coveted at the moment; but I knew that with Crawford my duties were more likely to be at the pickets and advanced posts of the army, than in the mere details of note-writing or despatch-bearing; beside that, I felt whenever any thing of importance was to be done, I should always obtain his permission to do duty with my regiment.

Taking a hurried breakfast, therefore, I mounted my horse, and cantered over to Villa Formosa, where the general's quarters were, to return my thanks for the promotion, and take the necessary steps for assuming my new functions.

Although the sun had risen about two hours, the fatigue of the previous day had impressed itself upon all around. The cavalry, men and horses, were still stretched upon the sward, sunk in sleep; the videttes, weary and tired, seemed anxiously watching for the relief, and the disordered and confused appearance of every thing bespoke that discipline had relaxed its stern features, in compassion for the bold exertions of the preceding day. The only contrast to this general air of exhaustion and weariness on every side, was a corps of sappers, who were busily employed upon the high-grounds above the village. Early as it was, they seemed to have been at work some hours—at least so their labours bespoke; for already a rampart of considerable extent had been thrown up, stockades implanted, and a breastwork was in a state of active preparation. The officer of the party, wrapped up in a loose cloak, and mounted upon a sharp-looking hackney, rode hither and thither, as the occasion warranted, and seemed, as well as from the distance I could guess, something of a tartar. At least I could not help remarking how, at his approach, the several inferior officers seemed suddenly so much more on the alert, and the men worked with an additional vigour and activity. I stopped for some minutes to watch him, and seeing an engineer captain of my acquaintance among the party, couldn't resist calling out—

"I say, Hachard, your friend on the chestnut mare must have had an easier day, yesterday, than some of us, or I'll be hanged if he'd be so active this morning." Hachard hung his head in some confusion, and did not reply; and, on my looking round, whom should I see before me but the identical individual whom I had so coolly been criticising, and who, to my utter horror and dismay, was no other than Lord Wellington himself. I did not wait for a second peep: helter-skelter, through water, thickets, and brambles, away I went, clattering down the causeway like a madman. If a French squadron had been behind me, I'd have had a stouter heart, although I did not fear pursuit. I felt his eye was upon me—his sharp and piercing glance, that shot like an arrow into me; and his firm look stared at me in every object about me.

Onward I pressed, feeling in the very recklessness of my course some relief to my sense of shame, and ardently hoping that some accident—some smashed arm or broken collar-bone—might befal me, and rescue me from any notice my conduct might otherwise call for. I never drew rein till I reached the Villa Formosa, and pulled up short at a small cottage, where a double sentry apprised me of the general's quarters. As I came up, the low lattice sprang quickly open, and a figure, half dressed, and more than half asleep, protruded his head:

"Well! what has happened? Any thing wrong?" said he, whom I now recognised to be General Crawford.

"No; nothing wrong, sir," stammered I with evident confusion: "I merely came to thank you for your kindness in my behalf."

"You seemed in a devil of a hurry to do it, if I'm to judge by the pace you came at. Come in and take your breakfast with us; I shall be dressed presently, and you will meet some of your brother aides-de-camp."

Having given my horse to an orderly, I walked into a little room whose humble accommodations and unpretending appearance seemed in perfect keeping with the simple and unostentatious character of the general. The preparations for a good and substantial breakfast were before me; and an English newspaper of a late date spread its most ample pages to welcome me. I had not been long absorbed in my reading when the door opened, and the general, whose toilet was not yet completed, made his appearance.

"Egad, O'Malley, you startled me this morning: I thought we were in for it again."

I took this as the most seasonable opportunity to recount my mishap of the morning, and accordingly, without more ado, detailed the unlucky meeting with the commander-in-chief. When I came to the end, Crawford threw himself into a chair and laughed till the very tears coursed down his bronzed features.

"You don't say so, boy? You don't really tell me you said that? By Jove, I had rather have faced a platoon of musketry than have stood in your shoes! You did not wait for a reply, I think?"

"No faith, sir, that I did not!"

"Do you suspect he knows you?"

"I trust not, sir, the whole thing passed so rapidly."

"Well, it's most unlucky in more ways than one!" He paused for a few moments as he said this, and then added, "Have you seen the general order?" pushing towards me a written paper as he spoke. It ran thus:

"G. O. Adjutant-General's Office, Villa Formosa, 6th May, 1811.

"Memorandum.—Commanding officers are requested to send into the military secretary, as soon as possible, the names of officers they may wish to have promoted in succession to those who have fallen in action."

"Now look at this list. The honourable Harvey Howard, Grenadier Guards, to be first lieutenant vice———. No, not that: Henry Beauchamp—George Villiers. Ay, here it is! Captain Lyttleton, 14th Light Dragoons, to be major in the 3d dragoon guards, vice Godwin killed in action; Lieutenant O'Malley to be captain, vice Lyttleton promoted. You see, boy, I did not forget you: you were to have the vacant troop in your own regiment. Now! I almost doubt the prudence of bringing your name under Lord Wellington's notice! He may have recognised you; and, if he did so—why, I rather think—that is, I suspect—I mean the quieter you keep the better."

While I poured forth my gratitude as warmly as I was able for the general's great kindness to me, I expressed my perfect concurrence in his views.

"Believe me, sir," said I, "I should rather wait any number of years for my promotion, than incur the risk of a reprimand; the more so as it is not the first time I have blundered with his lordship," I here narrated my former meeting with Sir Arthur, at which Crawford's mirth again burst forth, and he paced the room, holding his sides in an ecstacy of merriment.

"Come, come, lad, we'll hope for the best; we'll give you the chance that he has not seen your face, and send the list forward as it is: but here come our fellows."

As he spoke the door opened and three of his staff entered, to whom, being severally introduced, we chatted away about the news of the morning until breakfast.

"I have frequently heard of you from my friend Hammersley," said Captain Fitzroy, addressing me; "you were intimately acquainted, I believe?"

"Oh yes! Pray where is he now? We have not met for a long time."

"Poor Fred's invalided; that sabre cut upon his head has turned out a sad affair, and he's gone back to England on a sick leave. Old Dashwood took him back with him as a private secretary or something of that sort."

"Ah!" said another, "Dashwood has daughters, hasn't he? No bad notion of his, for Hammersley will be a baronet one of these days, with a rent roll of some eight or nine thousand per annum."

"Sir George Dashwood," said I, "has but one daughter, and I am quite sure that in his kindness to Hammersley, no intentions of the kind you mention were mixed up."

"Well, I don't know," said the third, a pale sickly youth, with handsome but delicate features. "I was on Dashwood's staff until a few weeks ago, and certainly I thought there was something going on between Fred and Miss Lucy, who, be it spoken, is a devilish fine girl, though rather disposed to give herself airs."

I felt my cheeks and my temples boiling like a furnace; and my hand trembled as I lifted my coffee to my lips; and I would have given my expected promotion twice over to have had any reasonable ground of quarrel with the speaker.

"Egad, lads," said Crawford, "that's the very best thing I know about a command. As a bishop is always sure to portion off his daughters with deaneries and rectories, so your knowing old general always marries his among his staff."

This sally was met with the ready laughter of the subordinates, with which, however little disposed, I was obliged to join.

"You are quite right, sir," rejoined the pale youth; "and Sir George has no fortune to give his daughter."

"How came it, Horace, that you escaped?" said Fitzroy, with a certain air of affected seriousness in his voice and manner; "I wonder they let such a prize escape them."

"Well, it was not exactly their fault, I do confess. Old Dashwood did the civil toward me; and la belle Lucie herself was condescending enough to be less cruel than to the rest of the staff. Her father threw us a good deal together; and, in fact, I believe—I fear—that is—that I didn't behave quite well."

"You may rest perfectly assured of it, sir," said I; "whatever your previous conduct may have been, you have completely relieved your mind on this occasion, and behaved most ill."

Had a shell fallen in the midst of us, the faces around me could not have been more horror-struck, than when, in a cool, determined tone, I spoke these few words. Fitzroy pushed his chair slightly back from the table, and fixed his eyes full upon me: Crawford grew dark purple over his whole face and forehead, and looked from one to the other of us, without speaking; while the Honourable Horace Delawar, the individual addressed, never changed a muscle of his wan and sickly features, but lifting his eyes slowly from his muffin, lisped softly out—

"You think so? How very good!"

"General Crawford," said I, the moment I could collect myself sufficiently to speak. "I am deeply grieved that I should have so far forgotten myself as to disturb the harmony of your table; but when I tell you that Sir George Dashwood is one of my warmest friends on earth; that from my intimate knowledge of him, I am certain that gentleman's statements are either the mere outpourings of folly or worse——"

"By Jove, O'Malley, you have a very singular mode of explaining away the matter. Delawar, sit down again. Gentlemen, I have only one word to say about this transaction; I'll have no squabbles nor broils here; from this room to the guard-house is a five minutes' walk: promise me, upon your honours, this altercation ends here, or as sure as my name's Crawford, you shall be placed under arrest, and the man who refuses to obey me shall be sent back to England."

Before I well knew in what way to proceed, Mr. Delawar rose, and bowed formally to the general, while I, imitating his example silently, we resumed our places; and, after a pause of a few moments, the current of conversation was resumed, and other topics discussed, but with such awkwardness and constraint, that all parties felt relieved when the general rose from the table.

"I say, O'Malley, have you forwarded the returns to the anjutant-general's office?"

"Yes, sir; I despatched them this morning before leaving my quarters.

"I'm glad of it; the irregularities on this score have called forth a heavy reprimand at head quarters."

I was also glad of it, and it chanced that by mere accident I remembered to charge Mike with the papers, which, had they not been lying unsealed upon the table before me, would, in all likelihood, have escaped my attention. The post started to Lisbon that same morning, to take advantage of which I had sat up writing for half the night. Little was I aware at the moment what a mass of trouble and annoyance was in store for me from the circumstance.

CHAPTER XCII.—Almeida.

On the morning of the 7th, we perceived, from a movement in the French camp, that the wounded were being sent to the rear, and shortly afterward the main body of their army commenced its retreat. They moved off with slow, and, as it were, reluctant steps; and Bassieres, who commanded the Imperial Guards, turned his eyes more than once to that position which all the bravery of his troops was unavailing to capture. Although our cavalry lay in force to the front of our line, no attempt was made to molest the retreating French; and Massena, having retired beyond the Aguada, left a strong force to watch the ford, while the remainder of the army fell back upon Ciudad Rodrigo.

During this time we had succeeded in fortifying our position at Fuentes D'Onoro so strongly as to resist any new attack, and Lord Wellington now turned his whole attention to the blockade of Almeida, which, by Massena's retreat, was abandoned to its fate.

On the morning of the 10th, I accompanied General Crawford in a reconnoissance of the fortress, which, from the intelligence we had lately received, could not much longer hold out against our blockade. The fire from the enemy's artillery was, however, hotly maintained; and, as night fell, some squadrons of the fourteenth, who were picketed near, were unable to light their watch fires, being within reach of their shot. As the darkness increased, so did the cannonade, and the bright flashes from the walls, and the deep booming of the artillery became incessant.

A hundred conjectures were afloat to account for the circumstance; some asserting that what we heard were mere signals to Massena's army; and others, that Brennier was destroying and mutilating the fortress before he evacuated it to the allies.

It was a little past midnight when, tired from the fatigues of the day, I had fallen asleep beneath a tree, an explosion louder than any which preceded it burst suddenly forth, and, as I awoke and looked about me, I perceived the whole heavens illuminated by one bright glare, while the crashing noises of falling stones and crumbling masonry, told me that a mine had been sprung: the moment after all was calm, and still, and motionless; a thick black smoke, increasing the sombre darkness of the night, shut out every star from view, and some drops of heavy rain began to fall.

The silence, ten times more appalling than the din which had preceded it, weighed heavily upon my senses, and a dread of some unknown danger crept over me: the exhaustion, however, was greater than my fear, and again I sank into slumber.

Scarcely had I been half an hour asleep when the blast of a trumpet again woke me, and I found amid the confusion and excitement about, that something of importance had occurred. Questions were eagerly asked on all sides, but no one could explain what had happened. Toward the town all was still as death, but a dropping irregular fire of musketry issued from the valley beside the Aguada. "What can this mean? what can it be?" we asked of each other. "A sortie from the garrison," said one; "a night attack by Massena's troops," cried another; and, while thus we disputed and argued, a horseman was heard coming along the road at the top of his speed.

"Where are the cavalry?" cried a voice I recognised as one of my brother aides-de-camp. "Where are the fourteenth?"

A cheer from our party answered his question, and the next moment, breathless and agitated, he rode in among us.

"What is it? are we attacked?"

"Would to heaven that were all. But come along, lads, follow me."

"What can it be then?" said I again, while my anxiety knew no bounds.

"Brennier has escaped; burst his way through Pack's division; and has already reached Valde Mula."

"The French have escaped," was repeated from mouth to mouth, while pressing spurs to our horses we broke into a gallop, and dashed forward in the direction of the musketry. We soon came up with the thirty-sixth infantry, who, having thrown away their knapsacks, were rapidly pressing the pursuit. The maledictions which burst from every side, proving how severely the misfortune was felt by all, while the eager advance of the men bespoke how ardently they longed to repair the mishap.

Dark as was the night, we passed them in a gallop, when suddenly the officer who commanded the leading squadron called out to halt.

"Take care there, lads," cried he, "I hear the infantry before us; we shall be down upon our own people."

The words were hardly spoken when a bright flash blazed out before us, and a smashing volley was poured into the squadron.

"The French! the French, by Jove!" said Hampden. "Forward, boys, charge them!"

Breaking into open order, to avoid our wounded comrades, several of whom had fallen by the fire, we rode down among them. In a moment their order was broken, their ranks pierced, and fresh squadrons coming up at the instant, they were sabred to a man.

After this the French pursued their march in silence, and, even when assembling in force, we rode down upon their squares, they never halted nor fired a shot. At Barba del Puerco, the ground being unfit for cavalry, the thirty-sixth took our place, and pressed them hotly home. Several of the French were killed, and above three hundred taken prisoners, but our fellows following up the pursuit too rashly, came upon an advanced body of Massena's force, drawn up to await and cover Brennier's retreat; the result was, the loss of above thirty men in killed or wounded.

Thus were the great efforts of the three preceding days rendered fruitless and nugatory. To maintain this blockade, Lord Wellington, with an inferior force and a position by no means strong, had ventured to give the enemy battle, and now, by the unskilfulness of some and the negligence of others, were all his combinations thwarted, and the French general enabled to march his force through the midst of the blockading columns almost unmolested and uninjured.

Lord Wellington's indignation was great, as well it might be; the prize for which he had contested was torn from his grasp at the very moment he had won it, and although the gallantry of the troops in the pursuit might, under other circumstances, have elicited eulogium, his only observation on the matter was a half sarcastic allusion to the inconclusive effects of undisciplined bravery. "Notwithstanding," says the general order of the day, "what has been printed in gazettes and newspapers, we have never seen small bodies unsupported successfully opposed to large, nor has the experience of any officer realised the stories which all have read, of whole armies being driven by a handfull of light infantry and dragoons."

CHAPTER XCIII.—A Night in the Azara.

Massena was now recalled, and Marmont having assumed the command of the French army, retired towards Salamanca, while our troops went into cantonments upon the Aguada. A period of inaction succeeded to our previous life of bustle and excitement, and the whole interest of the campaign was now centred in Beresford's army exposed to Soult in Estremadura.

On the 15th Lord Wellington set out for that province, having already directed a strong force to march upon Badajos.

"Well, O'Malley," said Crawford, as he returned from bidding Lord Wellington "good-bye;" "your business is all right, the commander-in-chief has signed my recommendation, and you will get your troop."

While I continued to express my grateful acknowledgments for his kindness, the general, apparently inattentive to all I was saying, paced the room with hurried steps, stopping every now and then to glance at a large map of Spain which covered one wall of the apartment, while he muttered to himself some broken and disjointed sentences.

"Eight leagues——too weak in cavalry——with the left upon Fuenta Grenaldo——a strong position——. O'Malley, you'll take a troop of dragoons and patrole the country towards Castro; you'll reconnoitre the position the sixth corps occupies, but avoid any collision with the enemy's pickets, keeping the Azara between you and them. Take rations for three days."

"When shall I set out, sir?"

"Now!" was the reply.

Knowing with what pleasure the hardy veteran recognised any thing like alacrity and dispatch, I resolved to gratify him, and, before half an hour had elapsed, was ready with my troop to receive his final orders.

"Well done, boy!" said he, as he came to the door of the hut, "you've lost no time. I don't believe I have any further instructions to give you; to ascertain as far as possible the probable movement of the enemy is my object, that's all." As he spoke this, he waved his hand, and wishing me "good-bye," walked leisurely back into the house. I saw that his mind was occupied by other thoughts, and, although I desired to obtain some more accurate information for my guidance, knowing his dislike to questions, I merely returned his salute, and set forth upon my journey.

The morning was beautiful; the sun had risen about an hour, and the earth, refreshed by the heavy dew of the night, was breathing forth all its luxuriant fragrance. The river, which flowed beside us, was clear as crystal, showing beneath its eddying current the shining pebbly bed, while, upon the surface the water-lilies floated, or sank, as the motion of the stream inclined. The tall cork trees spread their shadows about us, and the richly plumed birds hopped from branch to branch awaking the echoes with their notes.

It is but seldom that the heart of man is thoroughly attuned to the circumstances of the scenery around him. How often do we need a struggle with ourselves to enjoy the rich and beautiful landscape which lies smiling in its freshness before us! How frequently do the blue sky and the calm air look down upon the heart darkened and shadowed with affliction! and how often have we felt the discrepancy between the lowering look of winter and the glad sunshine of our ownhearts! The harmony of the world without, with our thoughts within, is one of the purest, as it is one of the greatest sources of happiness. Our hopes and our ambition lose their selfish character when feeling that fortune smiles upon us from all around, and the flattery which speaks to our hearts from the bright stars and the blue sky, is greater in its mute eloquence, than all the tongue of man can tell us of.

This feeling did I experience in all its fulness, as I ruminated upon my bettered my fortunes, and felt within myself that secret instinct that tells of happiness to come. In such moods of mind my thoughts strayed ever homeward, and I could not help confessing how little were all my successes in my eyes, did I not hope for the day when I should pour forth my tale of war and battle-field to the ears of those who loved me.

I resolved to write home at once to my uncle. I longed to tell him each incident of my career, and my heart glowed as I thought over the broken and disjointed sentences which every cottier around would whisper of my fortunes, far prouder as they would be in the humble deeds of one they knew, than in the proudest triumphs of a nation's glory.

Indeed Mike himself gave the current to my thoughts. After riding beside me for some time in silence, he remarked—

"And isn't it Father Rush will be proud when he sees your honour's a captain; to think of the little boy that he used to take before him on the ould gray mare for a ride down the avenue, to think of him being a real captain, six feet two without boots, and galloping over the French as if they were lurchers. Peggy Mahon, that nursed you, will be the proud woman the day she hears it; and there won't be a soldier sober in his quarters that night in Portumna barracks. 'Pon my soul, there's not a thing with a red coat on it, if it was even a scarecrow to frighten the birds from the barley, that won't be treated with respect when they hear the news."

The country through which we travelled was marked at every step by the traces of a retreating army; the fields of rich corn lay flattened beneath the tramp of cavalry or the wheels of the baggage-wagons; the roads, cut up and nearly impassable, were studded here and there with marks which indicated a bivouac: at the same time every thing around bore a very different aspect from what we had observed in Portugal; there, the vindictive cruelty of the French soldier had been seen in full sway. The ruined chateaux, the burned villages, the desecrated altars, the murdered peasantry—all attested the revengeful spirit of a beaten and baffled enemy. No sooner, however, had they crossed the frontiers than, as if by magic, their character became totally changed. Discipline and obedience succeeded to recklessness and pillage; and, instead of treating the natives with inhumanity and cruelty, in all their intercourse with the Spaniards the French behaved with moderation and even kindness. Paying for every thing, obtaining their billets peaceably and quietly, marching with order and regularity, they advanced into the heart of the country, showing, by the most irrefragable proof, the astonishing evidences of a discipline which, by a word, could convert the lawless irregularities of a ruffian soldiery into the orderly habits and obedient conduct of a highly organised army.

As we neared the Azara, the tracks of the retiring enemy became gradually less perceptible, and the country, uninjured by the march, extended for miles around us in all the richness and abundance of a favoured climate. The tall corn waving its yellow gold, reflected like a sea the clouds that moved slowly above it. The wild gentian and the laurel grew thickly around, and the cattle stood basking in the clear streams, while some listless peasant lounged upon the bank beside them. Strange as all these evidences of peace and tranquillity were so near to the devastating track of a mighty army, yet I have more than once witnessed the fact, and remarked how but a short distance from the line of our hurried march, the country lay untouched and uninjured; and, though the clank of arms, and the dull roll of the artillery, may have struck upon the ear of the far-off dweller in his native valley, he listened as he would have done to the passing thunder as it crashed above him, and when the bright sky and pure air succeeded to the lowering atmosphere and the darkening storm, he looked forth upon his smiling fields and happy home, while he muttered to his heart a prayer of thanksgiving that the scourge was passed.

We bivouacked upon the bank of the Azara, a truly Salvator Rosa scene; the rocks, towering high above us, were fissured by the channel of many a trickling stream, seeking in its zigzag current the bright river below. The dark pine tree and the oak mingled their foliage with the graceful cedar, which spread its fan-like branches about us. Through the thick shade some occasional glimpses of a starry sky could yet be seen, and a faint yellow streak upon the silent river told that the queen of night was there.

When I had eaten my frugal supper, I wandered forth alone upon the bank of the stream, now standing to watch its bold sweeps as it traversed the lonely valley before me, now turning to catch a passing glance at our red watch-fires and the hardy features which sat around. The hoarse and careless laugh, the deep-toned voice of some old campaigner holding forth his tale of flood and field, were the only sounds I heard; and gradually I strolled beyond the reach of even these. The path beside the river, which seemed scarped from the rock, was barely sufficient for the passage of one man,—a rude balustrade of wood being the only defence against the precipice which, from a height of full thirty feet, looked down upon the stream. Here and there some broad gleam of moonlight would fall upon the opposite bank, which, unlike the one I occupied, stretched out into rich meadow and pasturage, broken by occasional clumps of lilex and beech. River scenery had been ever a passion with me. I can glory in the bold and broken outline of a mighty mountain; I can gaze with delighted eyes upon the boundless sea, and know not whether to like it more in all the mighty outpouring of its wrath, when the white waves lift their heads to heaven, and break themselves in foam upon the rocky beach, or in the calm beauty of its broad and mirrored surface, in which the bright world of sun and sky are seen full many a fathom deep. But far before these, I love the happy and tranquil beauty of some bright river, tracing its winding current through valley and through plain, now spreading into some calm and waveless lake, now narrowing to an eddying stream, with mossy rocks and waving trees darkening over it. There's not a hut, however lowly, where the net of the fisherman is stretched upon the sward around, around whose hearth I do not picture before me, the faces of happy toil and humble contentment, while, from the ruined tower upon the crag, methinks I hear the ancient sounds of wassail and of welcome; and, though the keep is fissured and the curtain fallen, and, though for banners there "waves some tall wall flower," I can people its crumbling walls with images of the past; and the merry laugh of the warder, and the clanking tread of the mailed warrior, are as palpably before me as the tangled lichen that now trails from its battlements.

As I wandered on I reached a little rustic stair, which led downward from the path to the river side; and, on examining further, perceived that in this place the stream was fordable: a huge flat rock filling up a great part of the river's bed, occupied the middle, on either side of which the current ran with increased force.

Bent upon exploring, I descended the cliff, and was preparing to cross, when my attention was attracted by the twinkle of a fire at some distance from me, on the opposite side; the flame rose and fell in fitful flashes, as though some hand were ministering to it at the moment: as it was impossible, from the silence on every side, that it could proceed from a bivouac of the enemy—I resolved on approaching it and examining it for myself. I knew what the shepherds in remote districts were accustomed thus to pass the summer nights with no other covering save the blue vault above them. It was not impossible too, that it might prove a guerilla party, who frequently, in small numbers, hang upon the rear of a retreating army. Thus conjecturing, I crossed the stream, and, quickening my pace, walked forward in the direction of the blaze. For a moment a projecting rock obstructed my progress; and, while I was devising some means of proceeding further, the sound of voices near me arrested my attention. I listened, and what was my astonishment to hear that they spoke in French; I now crept cautiously to the verge of the rock, and looked over: the moon was streaming in its full brilliancy upon a little shelving strand beside the stream; and here I now beheld the figure of a French officer. He was habited in the undress uniform of a chasseur a cheval, but wore no arms; indeed, his occupation at the moment was any thing but a warlike one, he being leisurely employed in collecting some flasks of Champagne which apparently had been left to cool within the stream.

"Eh bien, Alphonse!" said a voice in the direction of the fire, "what are you delaying for?" "I'm coming, I'm coming," said the other; "but, par Dieu! I can only find five of our bottles; one seems to have been carried away by the stream." "No matter," replied the other, "we are but three of us, and one is, or should be, on the sick list."

The only answer to this was, the muttered chorus of a French drinking song, interrupted at intervals by an imprecation on the missing flask. It chanced, at this moment, a slight clinking noise attracted me, and, on looking down, I perceived at the foot of the rock the prize he sought for. It had been, as he conceived, carried away by an eddy of the stream, and was borne, as a true prisoner of war, within my grasp. I avow that from this moment my interest in the scene became considerably heightened: such a waif as a bottle of Champagne, was not to be despised in circumstances like mine; and I watched with anxious eyes every gesture of the impatient Frenchman, and alternately vibrated between hope and fear, as he neared or receded from the coveted flask.

"Let it go to the devil," shouted his companion once more. "Jacques has lost all patience with you."

"Be it so, then," said the other, as he prepared to take up his burthen. At this instant I made a slight effort so to change my position as to obtain a view of the rest of the party. The branch by which I supported myself, however, gave way beneath my grasp with a loud crash. I lost my footing, and slipping downward from the rock, came plump into the stream below. The noise, the splash, and more than all, the sudden appearance of a man beside him, astounded the Frenchman, who almost let fall his pannier, and thus we stood confronting each other for at least a couple of minutes in silence. A hearty burst of laughter from both parties terminated this awkward moment, while the Frenchman, with the readiness of his country, was the first to open the negotiation.

"Sacre Dieu!" said he, "what can you be doing here? You're English, without doubt."

"Even so," said I; "but that is the very question I was about to ask you; what are you doing here?"

"Eh bien!" replied the other gayly, "you shall be answered in all frankness. Our captain was wounded in the action of the eighth, and we heard had been carried up the country by some peasants. As the army fell back, we obtained permission to go in search of him: for two days all was fruitless; the peasantry fled at our approach; and, although we captured some of our stolen property, among other things the contents of this basket, yet we never came upon the track of our comrade till this evening. A good-hearted shepherd had taken him to his hut, and treated him with every kindness, but no sooner did he hear the gallop of our horses, and the clank of our equipments, than, fearing himself to be made a prisoner, he fled up the mountains, leaving our friend behind him: Voila notre histoire. Here we are, three in all, one of us with a deep sabre cut in his shoulder. If you are the stronger party, we are, I suppose, your prisoners; if not ——."

What was to have followed I know not, for at this moment his companion, who had finally lost all patience, came suddenly to the spot.

"A prisoner," cried he, placing a heavy hand upon my shoulder, while with the other, he held his drawn sword pointed toward my breast.

To draw a pistol from my bosom was the work of a second; and while gently turning the point of his weapon away, I coolly said—

"Not so fast, my friend, not so fast! The game is in my hands, not yours. I have only to pull this trigger, and my dragoons are upon you; whatever fate befal me, yours is certain."

A half scornful laugh betrayed the incredulity of him I addressed, while the other, apparently anxious to relieve the awkwardness of the moment, suddenly broke in with—

"He is right, Auguste, and you are wrong; we are in his power; that is," added he, smiling, "if he believes there is any triumph in capturing such paurres diables as ourselves."

The features of him he addressed suddenly lost their scornful expression, and sheathing his sword with an air of almost melo-dramatic solemnity, he gravely pulled up his moustaches, and after a pause of a few seconds, solemnly ejaculated a malediction upon his fortune.

"C'est toujours la meme chose," said he, with a bitterness that only a Frenchman can convey when cursing his destiny.

"Soyez bon enfant, and see what will come of it. Only be good natured, only be kind, and if you haven't bad luck at the end of it, it's only because fortune has a heavier stroke in reserve for you hereafter."

I could not help smiling at the Frenchman's philosophy, which, assuming as a good augury, he gaily said, "So, then, you'll not make us prisoners. Isn't it so?"

"Prisoners," said the other: "nothing of the kind. Come and sup with us, I'll venture to say our larder is as well stocked as your own; in any case an omelette, a cold chicken, and a glass of champagne are not bad things in our circumstances."

I could not help laughing outright at the strangeness of the proposal. "I fear I must decline," said I, "you seem to forget I am placed here to watch, not to join you."

"A la bonheur," cried the younger of the two: "do both. Come along; soyez bon comrade; you are always near your own people, so don't refuse us."

In proportion as I declined, they both became more pressing in their entreaties, and, at last, I began to dread lest my refusal might seem to proceed from some fear as to the good faith of the invitation, and I never felt so awkwardly placed as when one plumply pressed me by saying—

"Mais pourquoi pas? mon cher."

I stammered out something about duty and discipline, when they both interrupted me by a long burst of laughter.

"Come, come!" said they; "in an hour—in half an hour, if you will—you shall be back with your own people. We've had plenty of fighting latterly, and we are likely to have enough in future: we know something of each other by this time in the field; let us see how we get on in the bivouac!"

Resolving not to be outdone in generosity, I replied at once, "Here goes then!"

Five minutes afterwards I found myself seated at their bivouac fire. The captain, who was the oldest of the party, was a fine soldier-like fellow of some forty years old: he had served in the Imperial Guard through all the campaigns of Italy and Austria, and abounded in anecdotes of the French army. From him I learned many of those characteristic traits which so eminently distinguish the imperial troops, and saw how completely their bravest and boldest feats of arms depended upon the personal valour of him who led them on. From the daring enterprise of Napoleon at Lodi to the conduct of the lowest corporal in the grande armee, the picture presents nothing but a series of brilliant and splendid chivalry; while at the same time, the warlike character of the nation is displayed by that instinctive appreciation of courage and daring which teaches them to follow their officers to the very cannon's mouth.

"It was at Elchingen," said the captain, "you should have seen them. The regiment in which I was a lieutenant was ordered to form close column; and, charging through a narrow ravine to carry a brigade of guns, which, by a flanking fire, were devastating our troops. Before we could reach the causeway, we were obliged to pass an open plain in which the ground dipped for about a hundred yards; the column moved on, and, though it descended one hill, not a man ever mounted the opposite one. A very avalanche of balls swept the entire valley; and yet, amid the thunder and the smoke, the red glare of the artillery, and the carnage around them, our grenadiers marched firmly up. At last, Marshal Ney sent an aide-de-camp with orders to the troops to lay flat down, and in this position the artillery played over us for above half an hour. The Austrians gradually slackened and finally discontinued their fire: this was a moment to resume the attack. I crept cautiously to my knees and looked about. One word brought my men around me; but I found to my horror that of a battalion who came into action fourteen hundred strong, not five hundred remained; and that I myself, a mere lieutenant, was now the senior officer of the regiment. Our gallant colonel lay dead beside my feet. At this instant a thought struck me. I remembered a habit he possessed, in moments of difficulty and danger, of placing in his shako a small red plume which he commonly carried in his belt. I searched for it, and found it. As I held it aloft a maddening cheer burst around me, while from out of the line each officer sprang madly forward and rushed to the head of the column. It was no longer a march: with a loud cry of vengeance the mass rushed forward, the men trying to outstrip their officers, and come first in contact with the foe. Like tigers on the spring, they fell upon the enemy, who, crushed, overwhelmed, and massacred, lay in slaughtered heaps around the cannon; the cavalry of the guard came thundering on behind us, a whole division followed, and 3500 prisoners and fourteen pieces of artillery were captured.

"I sat upon the carriage of a gun, my face begrimed with powder, and my uniform blackened and blood stained; the whole thing appeared like some shocking dream. I felt a hand upon my shoulder while a rough voice called in my ear, 'Captaine, du soixante neuvieme! tu es mon frere.'"

"It was Ney who spoke. This," added the brave captain, his eyes filling as he said the words, "and this is the sabre he gave me."

I know not why I have narrated this anecdote, it has little in itself, but somehow to me it brings back in all its fulness the recollection of that night.

There was something so strongly characteristic of the old Napoleonist in the tone of his narrative that I listened throughout with breathless attention. I began to feel too, for the first time, what a powerful arm in war the emperor had created by fostering the spirit of individual enterprise. The field thus opened to fame and distinction, left no bounds to the ambition of any. The humble conscript, as he tore himself from the embraces of his mother, wiped his tearful eyes to see before him in the distance the baton of a marshal. The bold soldier who stormed a battery felt his heart beat more proudly and more securely beneath the cordon of the legion than behind a cuirasse of steel, and to a people in whom the sense of duty alone would seem cold, barren, and inglorious, he had substituted the highly wrought chivalrous enthusiasm, and by the prestige of his own name, the proud memory of his battles, and the glory of those mighty tournaments at which all Europe were the spectators, he had converted the nation into an army.

By a silent and instinctive compact, we appeared to avoid those topics of the campaign in which the honour of our respective arms was interested; and once, when by mere accident, the youngest of the party adverted to Fuentes d'Onoro, the old captain adroitly turned the current of the conversation by saying, "Come, Alphonse, let's have a song."

"Yes," said the other, "Le pas de charge."

"No, no," said the captain; "if I am to have a choice, let it be that little Breton song you gave us on the Danube."

"So be it then," said Alphonse. "Here goes."

I have endeavoured convey, by a translation, the words he sang; but I feel conscious how totally their feeling and simplicity are lost when deprived of their own patois, and the wild but touching melody that accompanied them.

"When the battle is o'er, and the sounds of fight
Have closed with the closing day,
How happy, around the watch-fire's light,
To chat the long hours away,
To chat the long hours away, my boy,
And talk of the days to come,
Or a better still, and a purer joy,
To think of our far off home.

How many a cheek will then grow pale,
That never felt a tear!

And many a stalwart heart will quail,
That never quailed in fear!
And the breast that, like some mighty rock
Amid the foaming sea,
Bore high against the battle's shock,
Now heaves like infancy.

And those who knew each other not,
Their hands together steal,
Each thinks of some long hallowed spot,
And all like brothers feel:
Such holy thoughts to all are given;
The lowliest has his part;
The love of home, like love of heaven,
Is woven in our heart."

There was a pause, as he concluded, each sunk in his own reflections.

How long we should have thus remained, I know not; but we were speedily aroused by the tramp of horses near us. We listened, and could plainly detect in their rude voices and coarse laughter the approach of a body of guerillas. We looked from one to the other in silence and fear. Nothing could be more unfortunate should we be discovered. Upon this point we were left little time to deliberate; for, with a loud cheer, four Spanish horsemen galloped up to the spot, their carbines in the rest. The Frenchmen sprang to their feet and seized their sabres, bent on making a resolute resistance. As for me, my determination was at once taken. Remaining quietly seated upon the grass, I stirred not for a moment, but, addressing him who appeared to be the chief of the guerillas, said in Spanish—

"These are my prisoners; I am a British officer of dragoons, and my party is yonder."

This evidently unexpected declaration seemed to surprise them, and they conferred for a few moments together. Meanwhile, they were joined by two others, in one of whom we could recognise, by his costume, the real leader of the party.

"I am captain in the light dragoons," said I, repeating my declaration.

"Morte de Dios!" replied he; "it is false; you are a spy!"

The word was repeated from lip to lip by his party, and I saw in their lowering looks and darkening features, that the moment was a critical one for me.

"Down with your arms!" cried he, turning to the Frenchmen: "Surrender yourselves our prisoners; I'll not bid ye twice!"

The Frenchmen turned upon me an enquiring look, as though to say that upon me now their hopes entirely reposed.

"Do as he bids you," said I; while at the same moment I sprang to my legs, and gave a loud shrill whistle, the last echo of which had not died away in the distance, ere it was replied to.

"Make no resistance now," said I to the Frenchmen, "our safety depends upon this."

While this was passing, two of the Spaniards had dismounted, and, detaching a coil of rope which hung from their saddle peak, were proceeding to tie the prisoners wrist to wrist, the others, with their carbines to the shoulder, covered us man by man, the chief of the party having singled out me as his peculiar prey.

"The fate of Mascarhenhas might have taught you better," said he, "than to play this game;" and then added, with a grim smile, "but we'll see if an Englishman will not make as good a carbonado as a Portuguese."

This cruel speech made my blood run cold, for I knew well to what he alluded. I was at Lisbon at the time it happened; but the melancholy fate of Julian Mascarhenhas the Portuguese spy, had reached me there. He was burnt to death at Torres Vedras!

The Spaniard's triumph over my terror was short-lived indeed; for scarcely had the words fallen from his lips, when a party of the fourteenth, dashing through the river at a gallop, came riding up. The attitude of the guerillas, as they sat with presented arms, was sufficient for my fellows, who needed not the exhortation of him who rode formost of the party—

"Ride them down, boys! Tumble them over! Flatten their broad beavers, the infernal thieves!"

"Whoop!" shouted Mike, as he rode at the chief, with the force of a catapult. Down went the Spaniard, horse and all, and, before he could disentangle himself, Mike was upon him, his knee pressed upon his neck.

"Isn't it enough for ye to pillage the whole country, without robbing the king's throops?" cried he, as he held him fast to the earth with one hand, while he presented a loaded pistol to his face.

By this time the scene around me was sufficiently ludicrous. Such of the guerillas as had not been thrown by force from their saddles, had slid peaceably down, and, depositing their arms upon the ground, dropped upon their knees in a semicircle around us, and, amid the hoarse laughter of the troopers and the irrepressible merriment of the Frenchmen, rose up the muttered prayers of the miserable Spaniards, who believed their last hour had come.

"Madre de Dios, indeed!" cried Mike, imitating the tone of a repentant old sinner in a patched mantle; "it's much the blessed Virgin thinks of the like o' ye, thieves and rogues as ye are; it a'most puts me beyond my senses, to see ye there crossing yourselves like rale Christians."

I could not help indulging myself in this retributive cruelty toward the chief, and leaving him to the tender mercies of Mike, I ordered the others to rise and form in a line before me. Affecting to occupy myself entirely with them, I withdrew the attention of all from the French officers, who remained quiet spectators of the scene around them.

"There, Mike, let the poor devil rise." I confess appearances were strong against me, just now. "Well Capitain, are you convinced by this time, that I was not deceiving you?"

The guerilla muttered some words of apology between his teeth, and while he shook the dust from his cloak, and arranged the broken feathers of his hat, cast a look of scowling and indignant meaning upon Mike, whose rough treatment he had evidently not forgiven.

"Don't be looking at me that way, you black thief! or I'll——"

"Hold there!" said I—"no more of this. Come, gentlemen, we must be friends. If I mistake not, we've got something like refreshment at our bivouac. In any case you'll partake of our watchfire till morning.

They gladly accepted our invitation, and ere half an hour elapsed, Mike's performance in the part of host had completely erased every unpleasant impression his first appearance gave rise to; and as for myself, when I did sleep at last, the confused mixture of Spanish and Irish airs, which issued from the thicket beside me, proved that a most friendly alliance had grown up between the parties.

"Point de façons, gentlemen," said I in a whisper. "Get to your horses and away! now's your time; good bye!"

A warm grasp of the hand from each was the only reply, and I turned once more to my discomfited friends, the guerillas.

CHAPTER XCIV.—The Arrest.

An hour before daybreak the guerillas were in motion, and, having taken a most ceremonious leave of us, they mounted their horses and set out upon their journey. I saw their gaunt figures wind down the valley, and watched them till they disappeared in the distance. Yes, brigands though they be, thought I, there is something fine, something heroic, in the spirit of their unrelenting vengeance; the sleuth-hound never followed the lair of his victim with a more ravening appetite for blood than they track the retreating columns of the enemy. Hovering around the line of march, they sometimes swoop down in masses, and carry off a part of the baggage, or the wounded. The wearied soldier, overcome by heat and exhaustion, who drops behind his ranks, is their certain victim; the sentry on an advanced post is scarcely less so. Whole pickets are sometimes attacked and carried off to a man; and, when traversing the lonely passes of some mountain gorge, or defiling through the dense shadows of a wooded glen, the stoutest heart has felt a fear, lest from behind the rock that frowned above him, or from the leafy thicket, whose branches stirred without a breeze, the sharp ring of a guerilla carbine might sound his death knell.

It was thus in the retreat upon Corunna fell Colonel Lefebre. Ever foremost in the attack upon our rear guard, this gallant youth (he was scarce six-and twenty) a colonel of his regiment, and decorated with the legion of honour, he led on every charge of his bold "sabreurs," riding up to the very bayonets of our squares, waving his hat above his head, and seeming actually to court his death wound; but so struck were our brave fellows with his gallant bearing, that they cheered him as he came on.

It was in one of these moments as, rising high in his stirrups, he bore down upon the unflinching ranks of the British infantry, the shrill whistle of a ball strewed the leaves upon the road side, the exulting shout of a guerilla followed it, and at the same instant Lefebre fell forward upon his horse's mane, a deluge of blood bursting from his bosom. A broken cry escaped his lips, a last effort to cheer on his men; his noble charger galloped forward between our squares, bearing to us as our prisoner the corpse of his rider.

"Captain O'Malley," said a mounted dragoon to the advanced sentry at the bottom of the little hill upon which I was standing; "despatches from head quarters, sir," said he, delivering into my hands a large sealed packet from the adjutant-general's office. While he proceeded to search for another letter of which he was the bearer, I broke the seal and read as follows:

Sir,—On the receipt of this order you are directed, having previously resigned your command to the officer next in seniority, to repair to head quarters at Fuentes D'Onoro, there to report yourself under arrest. "I have the honour to be

"Your obedient servant,

"George Hopeton,

"Military Secretary."

What the devil can this mean? said I to myself as I read the lines over again and again. What have I done lately, or what have I left undone to involve me in this scrape? Ah! thought I, to be sure it can be nothing else. Lord Wellington did recognise me that unlucky morning, and has determined not to let me pass unpunished. How unfortunate! scarcely twenty-four hours have elapsed since fortune seemed to smile upon me from every side, and now the very destiny I most dreaded stares me fully in the face. A reprimand, or the sentence of a court-martial, I shrunk from with a coward's fear: it mattered comparatively little from what source arising, the injury to my pride as a man and my spirit as a soldier, would be almost the same.

"This is the letter, sir," said the orderly, presenting me with a packet, the address of which was in Power's handwriting. Eagerly tearing it open, I sought for something which might explain my unhappy position. It bore the same date as the official letter, and ran thus:

"My Dear Charley,

"I joined yesterday, just in time to enjoy the heartiest laugh I have had since our meeting. If notoriety can gratify you, by Jove you have it; for Charles O'Malley and his man Mickey Free are by-words in every mess from Villa Formosa to the rear-guard. As it's only fair you should participate a little in the fun you've originated, let me explain the cause: Your inimitable man Mike, to whom it appears you intrusted the report of killed and wounded for the adjutant-general, having just at that moment accomplished a letter to his friends at home, substituted his correspondence for your returns, and doubtless sent the list of the casualties as very interesting information to his sweetheart in Ireland. If such be the case, I hope and trust she has taken the blunder in better part than old Colbourn, who swears he'll bring you to a court-martial, under heaven knows what charges. In fact, his passion has known no bounds since the event; and a fit of jaundice has given his face a kind of neutral tint between green and yellow, like nothing I know of except the facings of the 'dirty half-hundred.'*

"As Mr. Free's letter may be as great a curiosity to you, as it has been to us, I enclose you a copy of it, which Hopeton obtained for me. It certainly places the estimable Mike in a strong light as a despatch-writer. The occasional interruption to the current of the letter, you will perceive, arises from Mike having used the pen of a comrade, writing being, doubtless, an accomplishment forgotten in the haste of preparing Mr. Free for the world; and the amanuensis has, in more than one instance, committed to paper more than was meant by the author:

"'MRS. M'GRA: Tear and ages, sure I need not be treating her that way. Now just say, Mrs. Mary—ay, that'll do—Mrs. Mary, it's maybe surprised that you'll be to be reading a letter from your humble servant, sitting on the top of the Alps. Arrah, maybe it's not the Alps; but sure she'll never know—forment the whole French army, with Bony himself and all his jinnerals—God be between us and harm—ready to murther every mother's son of us, av they was able, Molly darlin'; but, with the blessing of Providence, and Lord Wellington, and Misther Charles, we'll bate them yet, as we bate them afore.

"'My lips is wathering at the thought o' the plunder. I often think of Tim Riley, that was hanged for sheep-stealing; he'd be worth his weight in gold here.

"'Misther Charles is now Captain—devil a less—and myself might be somethin' that same, but ye see I was always of a bashful nature, and recommended the masther in my place. He's mighty young, Mr. Charles is, says my Lord Wellington to me—he's mighty young, Mr. Free. 'He is, my lord,' says I; 'he's young, as you obsarve, but he's as much divilment in him as many that might be his father.' 'That's somethin', Mr. Free,' says my lord; 'ye say he comes of a good stock.' 'The rale sort, my lord,' says I; 'an ould, ancient family, that's spent every sixpence they had in treating their neighbours. My father lived near them for years'—you see, Molly, I said that to season the discourse. 'We'll make him a captain,' says my lord; 'but, Mr. Free, could we do nothing for you?' 'Nothing, at present, my lord. When my friends comes into power,' says I, 'they'll think of me. There's many a little thing to give away in Ireland, and they often find it mighty hard to find a man for Lord Lieutenant; and if that same, or a tide-waiter's place was vacant'——'Just tell me,' says my lord. 'It's what I'll do,' says I. 'And now, wishing you happy dreams, I'll take my lave.' Just so, Molly, it's hand and glove we are. A pleasant face, agreeable manners, seasoned with natural modesty, and a good pair of legs, them's the gifts to push a man's way in the world. And even with the ladies—but sure I'm forgetting, my masther was proposed for, and your humble servant, too, by two illigant creatures in Lisbon; but it wouldn't do, Molly—it's higher nor that we'll be looking—rale princess, the devil a less. Tell Kitty Hannigan, I hope she's well: she was a disarving young woman in her situation in life. Shusey Dogherty, at the cross-roads, if I don't forget the name—was a good-looking slip too, give her my affectionate salutations, as we say in the Portuguese. I hope I'll be able to bear the inclementuous nature of your climate, when I go back; but I can't expect to stay long, for Lord Wellington can't get along without me. We play duets on the guitar together every evening. The masther is shouting for a blanket, so no more at present from Your very affectionate friend,

"'MICKEY FREE.

"'P. S.—I don't write this myself, for the Spanish tongue puts me out o' the habit of English. Tell Father Rush, if he'd study the Portuguese, I'd use my interest for him with the Bishop of Toledo. It's a country he'd like—no regular stations, but promiscuous eating and drinking, and as pretty girls as ever confessed their sins.'

"My poor Charley, I think I'm looking at you. I think I can see the struggle between indignation and laughter, which every line of this letter inflicts upon you. Get back as quickly as you can, and we'll try if Crawford won't pull you through the business. In any case, expect no sympathy, and if you feel disposed to be angry with all who laugh at you, you had better publish a challenge in the next General Order. George Scott, of the Greys, bids me say, that if you're hard-up for cash, he'll give you a couple of hundred for Mickey Free. I told him, I thought you'd accept it, as your uncle has the breed of those fellows upon his estate, and might have no objection to weed his stud. Hammersley's gone back with the Dashwoods; but I don't think you need fear any thing in that quarter. At the same time, if you wish for success, make a bold push for the peerage, and half-a-dozen decorations, for Miss Lucy is decidedly gone wild about military decorations. As for me, my affairs go on well; I've had half-a-dozen quarrels with Inez, but we parted good friends, and my bad Portuguese has got me out of all difficulties with papa, who pressed me tolerable close as to fortune. I shall want your assistance in this matter yet. If parchments would satisfy him, I think I could get up a qualification; but somehow the matter must be done, for I'm resolved to have his daughter.

"The orderly is starting, so no more till we meet.

Yours ever, FRED. POWER."

"Godwin," said I, as I closed the letter, "I find myself in a scrape at head-quarters: you are to take the command of the detachment, for I must set out at once."

"Nothing serious, I hope, O'Malley."

"Oh no, nothing of consequence. A most absurd blunder of my rascally servant."

"The Irish fellow, yonder?"

"The same."

"He seems to take it easily, however."

"Oh, confound him! he does not know what trouble he has involved me in; not that he'll care much when he does."

"Why, he does not seem to be of a very desponding temperament. Listen to the fellow! I'll be hanged if he's not singing!"

"I'm devilishly disposed to spoil his mirth. They tell me, however, he always keeps the troop in good humour; and see, the fellows are actually cleaning his horses for him, while he is sitting on the bank."

"Faith, O'Malley, that fellow knows the world. Just hear him."

Mr. Free was, as Godwin described, most leisurely reposing on a bank, a mug of something drinkable beside him, and a pipe of that curtailed proportion which an Irishman loves, held daintily between his fingers. He appeared to be giving his directions to some soldiers of the troop, who were actually cleaning his horses and accoutrements for him.

"That's it, Jim! Rub 'em down along the hocks; he won't kick; it's only play. Scrub away, honey; that's the devil's own carbine to get clean."

"Well, I say, Mr. Free, are you going to give us that ere song?"

"Yes; I'll be danged if I burnish your sabre if you don't sing."

"Tear and ages! aint I composin' it? Av I was Tommy Moore I couldn't be quicker."

"Well, come along, my hearty; let's hear it."

"Oh murther! said Mike, draining the pot to its last few drops, which he poured pathetically upon the grass before him, and then having emptied the ashes from his pipe, he heaved a deep sigh, as though to say, life had no more pleasures in store for him. A brief pause followed, after which, to the evident delight of his expectant audience, he began the following song, to the popular air of "Paddy O'Carroll:"

"BAD LUCK TO THIS MARCHING."

AIR—Paddy O'Carroll.

"Bad luck to this marching,
Pipeclaying and starching;
How neat one must be to be killed by the French!
I'm sick of parading,
Through wet and cowld wading,
Or standing all night to be shot in the trench.
To the tune of a fife,
They dispose of your life,
You surrender your soul to some illigant lilt,
Now I like Garryowen,
When I hear it at home,
But it's not half so sweet when you're going to be kilt.

"Then though up late and early,
Our pay comes so rarely,
The devil a farthing we've ever to spare;
They say some disaster,
Befel the paymaster;
On my conscience I think that the money's not there.
And, just think, what a blunder;
They won't let us plunder,
While the convents invite us to rob them, 'tis clear;
Though there is n't a village,
But cries 'come and pillage,'
Yet we leave all the mutton behind for Mounseer.

"Like a sailor that's nigh land,
I long for that island
Where even the kisses we steal if we please;
Where it is no disgrace,
If you don't wash your face,
And you've nothing to do but to stand at your ease.
With no serjeant t' abuse us,
We fight to amuse us,
Sure it's better beat Christian than kick a baboon;
How I'd dance like a fairy,
To see ould Dunleary,
And think twice ere I'd leave it to be a dragoon!"

"There's a sweet little bit for you," said Mike, as he concluded; "thrown off as aisy as a game of foot-ball."

"I say, Mr. Free, the Captain's looking for you; he's just received despatches from the camp, and wants his horses."

"In that case, gentlemen, I must take my leave of you—with the more regret, too, that I was thinking of treating you to a supper this evening. You need n't be laughing, it's in earnest I am. Coming, sir!—coming!" shouted he in a louder tone, answering some imaginary call, as an excuse for his exit.

When he appeared before me, an air of most business-like alacrity had succeeded to his late appearance, and having taken my orders to get the horses in readiness, he left me at once, and in less than half an hour we were upon the road.

CHAPTER XCV.—MONSOON IN TROUBLE.

As I rode along toward Fuentes d'Onoro, I could not help feeling provoked at the absurd circumstances in which I was involved. To be made the subject of laughter for a whole army, was by no means a pleasant consideration; but what I felt far worse was, the possibility that the mention of my name in connection with a reprimand might reach the ears of those who knew nothing of the cause.

Mr. Free himself seemed little under the influence of similar feelings; for when, after a silence of a couple of hours, I turned suddenly toward him with a half angry look, and remarked, "You see, sir, what your confounded blundering has done;" his cool reply was—

"Ah, then, won't Mrs. M'Gra be frightened out of her life, when she reads all about the killed and wounded in your honour's report! I wonder if they ever had the manners to send my own letter afterward, when they found out their mistake!"

"Their mistake! do you say! rather yours! You appear to have a happy knack of shifting blame from your own shoulders; and do you fancy that they've nothing else to do than to trouble their heads about your absurd letters?"

"Faith! it's easily seen you never saw my letter, or you wouldn't be saying that; and sure it's not much trouble it would give Colonel Fitzroy, or any o' the staff that writes a good hand, just to put in a line to Mrs. M'Gra, to prevent her feeling alarmed about that murthering paper. Well, well, it's God's blessing! I don't think there's any body of the name of Mickey Free high up in the army but myself; so that the family won't be going into mourning for me on a false alarm."

I had not patience to participate in this view of the case; so that I continued my journey without speaking. We had jogged along for some time after dark, when the distant twinkle of the watch-fires announced our approach to the camp. A detachment of the fourteenth formed the advanced post, and from the officer in command I learned that Power was quartered at a small mill about half a mile distant; thither I accordingly turned my steps, but, finding that the path which led abruptly down to it was broken, and cut up in many places, I sent Mike back with the horses, and continued my way alone on foot.

The night was deliciously calm, and, as I approached the little rustic mill, I could not help feeling struck with Power's taste in a billet.

A little vine-clad cottage, built close against a rock nearly concealed by the dense foliage around it, stood beside a clear rivulet whose eddying current supplied water to the mill, and rose in a dew-like spray which sparkled like gems in the pale moonlight. All was still within, but as I came nearer I thought I could detect the chords of a guitar. Can it be, thought I, that Master Fred has given himself up to minstrelsy? or, is it some little dress rehearsal for a serenade? But, no, thought I, that certainly is not Power's voice. I crept stealthily down the little path, and approached the window; the lattice lay open, and, as the curtain waved to and fro with the night air, I could see plainly all who were in the room.

Close beside the window sat a large dark-featured

Spaniard, his hands crossed upon his bosom, and his head inclined heavily forward; the attitude perfectly denoting deep sleep, even had not his cigar, which remained passively between his lips, ceased to give forth its blue smoke wreath. At a little distance from him sat a young girl, who even by the uncertain light I could perceive was possessed of all that delicacy of form and gracefulness of carriage which characterises her nation.

Her pale features, paler still from the contrast with her jet black hair and dark costume, were lit up with an expression of animation and enthusiasm as her fingers swept rapidly and boldly across the strings of a guitar.

"And you're not tired of———?" said she, bending her head downward toward one, whom I now for the first time perceived.

Reclining carelessly at her feet, his arm leaning upon her chair, while his hand occasionally touched her taper fingers, lay my friend Master Fred Power. An undress jacket thrown loosely open, and a black neckcloth negligently knotted, bespoke the nonchalance with which he prosecuted his courtship.

"Do sing it again!" said he, pressing her fingers to his lips.

What she replied I could not catch; but Fred resumed—"No, no, he never wakes: the infernal clatter of that mill is his lullaby."

"But your friend will be here soon," said she; "is it not so?"

"Oh, poor Charley! I'd almost forgotten him; by-the-bye, you musn't fall in love with him; there now, do not look angry; I only meant that, as I knew he'd be desperately smitten, you shouldn't let him fancy he got any encouragement."

"What would you have me do?" said she artlessly.

"I've been thinking over that too. In the first place, you'd better never let him hear you sing; scarcely ever smile; and, as far as possible, keep out of his sight."

"One would think, senor, that all these precautions were to be taken more on my account than his. Is he so very dangerous, then?"

"Not a bit of it!—good looking enough he is, but—only a boy; at the same time a devilish bold one! and he'd think no more of springing through that window, and throwing his arms round your neck, the very first moment of his arrival, than I should of whispering how much I love you."

"How very odd he must be! I'm sure I should like him."

"Many thanks to both for your kind hints, and now, to take advantage of them." So saying, I stepped lightly upon the window-sill, cleared the miller with one spring, and before Power could recover his legs, or ——— her astonishment, I clasped her in my arms, and kissed her on either cheek.

"Charley! Charley! Damn it man, it won't do," cried Fred, while the young lady, evidently more amused at his discomfiture than affronted at the liberty, threw herself into a seat, and laughed immoderately.

"Ha! Holloa there! What is't?" shouted the miller, rousing himself from his nap, and looking eagerly around. "Are they coming? Are the French coming?"

A hearty renewal of his daughter's laughter was the only reply; while Power relieved his anxiety by saying—

"No, no, Pedrillo, not the French; a mere marauding party: nothing more. I say, Charley," continued he in a lower tone, "you had better lose no time in reporting yourself at head-quarters.—We'll walk up together. Devilish awkward scrape yours."

"Never fear, Fred, time enough for all that. For the present, if you permit me, I'll follow up my acquaintance with our fair friend here."

"Gently, gently!" said he, with a look of imposing seriousness. "Don't mistake her; she's not a mere country girl: you understand—been bred in a convent here—rather superior kind of a thing,"

"Come, come, Fred, I'm not the man to interfere with you for a moment."

"Good night, senor," said the old miller, who had been waiting patiently all this time to pay his respects before going.

"Yes; that's it!" cried Power eagerly. "Good night, Pedrillo."

"Buenos noches," lisped out Margaritta, with a slight courtesy.

I sprang forward to acknowledge her salutation, when Power coolly interposed between us, and, closing the door after them, placed his back against it.

"Master Charley, I must read you a lesson——"

"You inveterate hypocrite, don't attempt this nonsense with me. But come, tell me how long you have been here."

"Just twenty-four of the shortest hours I ever passed at an outpost. But listen: do you know that voice? Is n't it O'Shaughnessy?"

"To be sure it is: hear the fellow's song."

"My father cared little for shot or shell,
He laughed at death and dangers;
And he'd storm the very gates of hell,
With a company of the 'Rangers.'
So sing tow, row, row, row, &c."

"Ah then, Mister Power, it's twice I'd think of returning your visit, if I knew the state of your avenue. If there's a grand jury in Spain, they might give you a presentment for this bit of road. My knees are as bare as a commissary's conscience, and I've knocked as much flesh off my shin bones as would make a cornet in the hussars."

A regular roar of laughter from both of us apprised Dennis of our vicinity.

"And it's laughing ye are! Wouldn't it be as polite just to hold a candle or lantern for me, in this confounded watercourse?"

"How goes it, major?" cried I, extending my hand to him through the window.

"Charley—Charley O'Malley, my son! I'm glad to see you. It's a hearty laugh you gave us this morning. My friend Mickey's a pleasant fellow for a secretary at war. But it's all settled now; Crawford arranged it for you this afternoon."

"You don't say so! Pray tell me all about it."

"That's just what I won't; for, ye see, I don't know it: but I believe old Monsoon's affair has put every thing out of their heads."

"Monsoon's affair! What is that? Out with it, Dennis."

"Faith, I'll be just as discreet about that as your own business. All I can tell you is, that they brought him up to head-quarters this evening, with a serjeant's guard, and they say he's to be tried by court-martial; and Picton is in a blessed humour about it."

"What could it possibly have been? some plundering affair, depend on it."

"Faith, you may swear it wasn't for his little charities, as Dr. Pangloss calls them, they've pulled him up," cried Power.

"Maurice is in high feather about it," said Dennis. "There are five of them up at Fuentes, making a list of charges to send to Monsoon; for Bob Mahon, it seems, heard of the old fellow's doings up the mountains."

"What glorious fun!" said Power. "Haste and join them, boys!"

"Agreed," said I, "is it far from this?"

"Another stage. When we've got something to eat," said the Major, "if Power has any intentions that way——"

"Well I really did begin to fear Fred's memory was lapsing; but somehow, poor fellow, smiles have been more in his way than sandwiches lately."

An admonishing look from Power was his only reply, as he walked toward the door. Bent upon teasing him, however, I continued—

"Who, Monsoon is it?"

"No, no. Not Monsoon; another friend of ours."

"Faith, I scarcely thought your fears of old Monsoon worth calling for. He's a fox—the devil a less."

"No, no, Dennis. I wasn't thinking of him. My anxieties were for a most soft-hearted young gentleman—one Fred Power."

"Charley, Charley!" said Fred from the door, where he had been giving directions to his servant about supper; "a man can scarce do a more silly thing than marry in the army; all the disagreeables of married life, with none of its better features."

"Marry—marry!" shouted O'Shaughnessy; "upon my conscience, it is incomprehensible to me how a man can be guilty of it. To be sure, I don't mean to say that there are not circumstances—such as half-pay, old age, infirmity, the loss of your limbs, and the like; but that, with good health, and a small balance at your bankers, you should be led into such an embarrassment——"

"Men will flirt," said I, interrupting; "men will press taper fingers, look into bright eyes, and feel their witchery; and, although the fair owners be only quizzing them half the time, and amusing themselves the other, and though they be the veriest hackneyed coquettes——"

"Did you ever meet the Dalrymple girls, Dennis?" said Fred, with a look I shall never forget.

What the reply was I cannot tell. My shame and confusion were overwhelming, and Power's victory complete.

"Here comes the prog," cried Dennis, as Power's servant entered with a very plausible-looking tray, while Fred proceeded to place before us a strong army of decanters.

Our supper was excellent; and we were enjoying ourselves to the utmost, when an orderly serjeant suddenly opened the door, and raising his hand to his cap, asked if Major Power was there?

"A letter for you, sir."

"Monsoon's writing, by Jove! Come, boys, let us see what it means. What a hand the old fellow writes! the letters look all crazy, and are tumbling against each other on every side. Did you ever see any thing half so tipsy as the crossing of that t?"

"Read it: read it out, Fred!"

"Tuesday Evening

"Dear Power,

"I'm in such a scrape! Come up and see me at once: bring a little sherry with you; and we'll talk over what's to be done. "Yours ever,

"Quarter General. B. Monsoon."

We resolved to finish our evening with the major: so that, each having armed himself with a bottle or two, and the remnants of our supper, we set out toward his quarters, under the guidance of the orderly. After a sharp walk of half an hour, we reached a small hut, where two sentries of the eighty-eighth were posted at the door.

O'Shaughnessy procured admittance for us, and in we went. At a small table, lighted by a thin tallow candle, sat old Monsoon, who, the weather being hot, had neither coat nor wig on; an old cracked china teapot, in which, as we found afterward, he had mixed a little grog, stood before him, and a large mass of papers lay scattered around on every side: he himself being occupied in poring over their contents, and taking occasional draughts from his uncouth goblet.

As we entered noiselessly he never perceived us, but continued to mumble over, in a low tone, from the documents before him—

"Upon my life, it's like a dream to me. What infernal stuff this brandy is!

"'Charge No. 8.—For conduct highly unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, in forcing the cellar of the San Nicholas convent at Banos, taking large quantities of wine therefrom, and subsequently compelling the prior to dance a bolero, thus creating a riot, and tending to destroy the harmony between the British and the Portuguese, so strongly inculcated to be preserved by the general orders.'

"'Destroying the harmony! Bless their hearts! How little they know of it! I've never seen a jollier night in the Peninsula! The prior's a trump, and, as for the bolero, he would dance it. I hope they say nothing about my hornpipe.

"'Charge No 9.—For a gross violation of his duty as an officer, in sending a part of his brigade to attack and pillage the alcade of Banos; thereby endangering the public peace of the town, being a flagrant breach of discipline and direct violation of the articles of war.'

"Well, I'm afraid I was rather sharp on the alcade, but we did him no harm except the fright. What sherry the fellow had! 'twould have been a sin to let it fall into the hands of the French.

"'Charge No. 10.—For threatening, on or about the night of the 3d, to place the town of Banos under contribution, and subsequently forcing the authorities to walk in procession before him, in absurd and ridiculous costumes.'

"Lord, how good it was!—I shall never forget the old alcade! One of my fellows fastened a dead lamb round his neck, and told him it was the goldea fleece. The commander-in-chief would have laughed himself if he were there. Picton's much too grave; never likes a joke.

"'CHARGE No. 11.—For insubordination and disobedience, in refusing to give up his sword, and rendering it necessary for the Portuguese guard to take it by force; thereby placing himself in a situation highly degrading to a British officer.'"

"Didn't I lay about me before they got it!—— Who's that! Who's laughing there! Ah! boys I'm glad to see you. How are you, Fred! Well, Charley, I've heard of your scrape; very sad thing for so young a fellow as you are; I don't think you'll be broke; I'll do what I can—I'll see what I can do with Picton; we are very old friends—were at Eton together."

"Many thanks, major, but I hear your own affairs are not flourishing. What's all this court-martial about!"

"A mere trifle; some little insubordination in the legion. Those Portuguese are sad dogs. How very good of you, Fred., to think of that little supper."

While the major was speaking, his servant with a dexterity, the fruit of long habit, had garnished the table with the contents of our baskets, and Monsoon, apologising for not putting on his wig, sat down among us with a face as cheerful as though the floor was not covered with the charges of the court-martial to be held on him.

As we chatted away over the campaign and its chances, Monsoon seemed little disposed to recur to his own fortunes. In fact, he appeared to suffer much more from what he termed my unlucky predicament than from his own mishaps. At the same time, as the evening wore on, and the sherry began to tell upon him, his heart expanded into its habitual moral tendency, and, by an easy transition, he was led from the religious association of convents, to the pleasures of pillaging them.

"What wine they have in their old cellars!—It's such fun drinking it out of great silver vessels as old as Methuselah. 'There's much treasure in the house of the righteous,' as David says; and any one who has ever sacked a nunnery knows that."

"I should like to have seen that prior dancing the bolero," said Power.

"Wasn't it good though! he grew jealous of me, for I performed a hornpipe. Very good fellow the prior; not like the alcade; there was no fun in him. Lord bless him, he'll never forget me."

"What did you do with him, major!"

"Well, I'll tell you; but you mustn't let it be known, for I see they have not put it in the court-martial. Is there no more sherry there! There, that will do; I'm always contented. 'Better a dry morsel with quietness," as Moses says. Ay, Charley, and never forget—'and a merry heart is just like medicine.' Job found that you know."

"Well, but the alcade, major."

"Oh, the alcade, to be sure: these pious meditations make me forget earthly matters."

"This old alcade at Banos, I found out was quite spoiled by Lord Wellington: he used to read all the general orders, and got an absurd notion in his head that, because we were his allies, we were not allowed to plunder. Only think, he used to snap his fingers at Beresford; didn't care twopence about the legion; and laughed outright at Wilson; so when I was ordered down there, I took another way with him; I waited till nightfall, ordered two squadrons to turn their jackets, and sent forward two of my aides-de-camp with a few trooper's to the alcade's house. They galloped into the court-yard, blowing trumpets and making an infernal hubbub. Down came the alcade in a passion. 'Prepare quarters quickly, and rations for eight hundred men.'

"'Who dares to issue such an order?' said he.

"The aid-de-camp whispered one word in his ear, and the old fellow grew as pale as death. 'Is he here?—is he coming?—is he coming?' said he, trembling from head to foot.

"I rode in myself at this moment, looking thus—

"'Ou est le malheureux?' said I in French; you know I speak French like Portuguese.

"Devilish like, I've no doubt," muttered Power.

"'Pardon, gracias excellentissima!' said the alcade on his knees."

"Who the deuce did he take you for, major!"

"You shall hear: you'll never guess, though. Lord! I shall never forget it. He thought I was Marmont: my aid-de-camp told him so."

One loud burst of laughter interrupted the major at this moment, and it was some considerable time before he could continue his narrative.

"And do you really mean," said I, "that you personated the Duke de Ragusa?"

"Did I not though? If you only had seen me with a pair of great moustaches, and a drawn sabre in my hand, pacing the room up and down in presence of the assembled authorities. Napoleon himself might have been deceived. My first order was to cut off all their heads; but I commuted the sentence to a heavy fine. Ah, boys, if they only understood at head-quarters how to carry on a war in the Peninsula, they'd never have to grumble in England about increased taxation. How I'd mulct the nunneries! How I'd grind the corporate towns! How I'd inundate the country with exchequer bills! I'd sell the priors at so much a head, and put the nuns up to auction by the dozen."

"You sacrilegious old villain! But continue the account of your exploits."

Faith, I remember little more. After dinner I grew somewhat mellow, and a kind of moral bewilderment, which usually steals over me about eleven o'clock, induced me to invite the alcade and all the aldermen to come and sup. Apparently, we had a merry night of it, and when morning broke, we were not quite clear in our intellects. Hence came that infernal procession; for when the alcade rode round the town with a paper cap, and all the aldermen after him, the inhabitants felt offended it seems, and sent for a large guerilla force, who captured me and my staff after a vigorous resistance. The alcade fought like a trump for us, for I promised to make him prefect of the Seine; but we were overpowered, disarmed, and carried off: the remainder you can read in the court-martial; for you may think that what, after sacking the town, drinking all night, and fighting in the morning, my memory was none of the clearest."

"Did you not explain that you were not the marshal, general!"

"No, faith; I knew better than that; they'd have murdered me, had they known their mistake. They brought me to head-quarters in the hope of a great reward, and it was only when they reached this, that they found out I was not the Duke de Ragusa; so you see, boys, it's very complicated business."

"Gad, and so it is," said Power, "and an awkward one too."

"He'll be hanged as sure as my name's Dennis," vociferated O'Shaughnessy, with an energy that made the major jump from his chair. "Picton will hang him!"

"I'm not afraid," said Monsoon; "they know me so well. Lord bless you, Beresford couldn't get on without me."

"Well, major," said I, "in any case you certainly take no gloomy nor desponding view of your case."

"Not I, boy. You know what Jeremiah says—'A merry heart is a continual feast;' and so it is. I may die of repletion, but they'll never find me starved with sorrow."

"And, faith, it's a strange thing," muttered O'Shaughnessy, thinking aloud; "a most extraordinary thing. An honest fellow would be sure to be hanged; and there's that old rogue, that's been melting down more saints and blessed virgins than the whole army together, he'll escape. Ye'll see he will!"

"There goes the patrol," said Fred; "we must start."

"Leave the sherry, boys; you'll be back again. I'll have it put up carefully."

We could scarce resist a roar of laughter as we said, "Good night."

"Adieu, major," said I; "we shall meet anon."

So saying, I followed Power and O'Shaughnessy toward their head-quarters.

"Maurice has done it beautifully," said O'Shaughnessy. "Pleasant revelations the old fellow will make on the court-martial, if he only remembers what we heard to-night. But here we are, Charley; so good night; and remember you breakfast with me to-morrow."

From the Athenæum.

THE WIFE.

BY ELENORA LOUISA MONTAGUE.

Oh, come, beloved! to yon gray wood,
Where oft in childhood's hour we strayed,
Ere yet with plighted hands we stood
Beneath yon bending willow's shade;
And I my early dream will tell,
And blush not though thine eye behold me;
I feel thy voice's soothing spell,
Thy loved and loving arms enfold me.

Ah! little did'st thou dream how long
I loved thee with a hidden heart;
When even amid some touching song
My sighs would breathe, my tears would start:
Thou could'st not deem that this weak breast,
Which in thy joy stood mute before thee,
Longed but to share thy soul's unrest
When sorrow's night was deepening o'er thee.

Oh! then the sullen years drew on
When thou must part, yet leave no token,
And I must bear, unshared, alone,
A grief which yet might not be spoken.
Oh, Love! it was a fearful time,
But all is past, forgotten now;
Yet something of its youthful prime
Hath fled from this devoted brow.

This grieves me not, for well I know
Thy spirit will not love me less,
Though time upon my head should snow,
Or on my cheek too rudely press:
I feel that thou wilt dearer be—
If aught to me can make thee dearer—
When the spring leaves of life's young tree
Around thy brow are growing scarer.

Years waned; and thou rememberest yet
The hour which led thee back to me,
When, sicken'd with the world, we met,
And each was changed—yet both were free:
Not changed in soul, but sadder grown,
And touched as by the wand of sorrow;
And doomed, like buds too early blown,
To greet, with wasted bloom, the morrow.

Then once again I dared to dream,
But now no more a dream of sadness;
Thy presence smoothed my life's rough stream,
And led me back to youth and gladness!
And something did our hearts subdue,
A yearning thought—a thought of home—
As though our souls more closely drew
Ere yet the darker days should come.

Now, let them come! I fear them not:
For art not thou, beloved, mine?
And is not this time-hallowed spot
The altar of a love divine?
Oh, may the lamp which lights us now,
For ever on that altar burn,
And ne'er through life our spirits know
One severed hour o'er which to mourn!

CHAPTER XCV—The Confidence.

"I have changed the venue, Charley," said Power, as he came into my room the following morning: "I've changed the venue, and come to breakfast with you."

I could not help smiling as a certain suspicion crossed my mind; perceiving which he quickly added—

"No, no, boy! I guess what you're thinking of: I'm not a bit jealous in that quarter. The fact is, you know one cannot be too guarded."

"Nor too suspicious of one's friends, apparently."

"A truce with quizzing. I say, have you reported yourself?"

"Yes; and received this moment a most kind note from the general. But it appears I'm not destined to have a long sojourn among you, for I'm desired to hold myself in readiness for a journey this very day."

"Where the deuce are they going to send you now?"

"I'm not certain of my destination. I rather suspect there are despatches for Badajos. Just tell Mike to get breakfast, and I'll join you immediately."

When I walked into the little room which served as my saloon, I found Power pacing up and down, apparently rapt in meditation.

"I've been thinking, Charley," said he, after a pause of about ten minutes—"I've been thinking over our adventures in Lisbon. Devilish strange girl, that senhora! When you resigned in my favor, I took it for granted that all difficulty was removed. Confound it! I no sooner began to profit by your absence, in pressing my suit, than she turned short round, treated me with marked coldness, exhibited a hundred wilful and capricious fancies, and concluded one day by quietly confessing to me—you were the only man she cared for."

"You are not serious in all this, Fred," said I.

"Ain't I though, by Jove? I wish to heaven I were not! My dear Charley, the girl is an inveterate flirt—a decided coquette. Whether she has a particle of heart or not, I can't say; but certainly, her greatest pleasure is to trifle with that of another. Some absurd suspicion that you were in love with Lucy Dashwood piqued her vanity, and the anxiety to recover a lapsing allegiance led her to suppose herself attached to you, and made her treat all my advances with a most frigid indifference, or wayward caprice: the more provoking," continued he, with a kind of bitterness in his tone, "as her father was disposed to take the thing favourably; and, if I must say it, I felt devilish spooney about her myself.

"It was only two days before I left, that, in conversation with Don Emanuel, he consented to receive my addresses to his daughter on my becoming lieutenant-colonel. I hastened back with delight to bring her the intelligence, and found her with a lock of hair on the book before her, over which she was weeping. Confound me if it was not yours! I don't know what I said, nor what she replied; but when we parted, it was with a perfect understanding we were never to meet again. Strange girl! She came that evening, put her arm within mine as I was walking alone in the garden, and, half in jest, half in earnest, talked me out of all my suspicions, and left me fifty times more in love with her than ever. Egad! I thought I used to know something about women, but here is a chapter I've yet to read. Come now, Charley, be frank with me: tell me all you know."

"My poor Fred! If you were not head and ears in love, you would see as plainly as I do that your affairs prosper. And after all, how invariable is it, that the man who has been the very veriest flirt with women—sighing, serenading, sonneteering, flinging himself at the feet of every pretty girl he meets with, should become the most thorough dupe to his own feelings when his heart is really touched. Your man of eight-and-thirty is always the greatest fool about women."

"Confound your impudence! How the devil can a fellow with a moustache not stronger than a Circassian's eyebrow read such a lecture to me?"

"Just for the very reason you've mentioned: you glide into an attachment at my time of life: you fall in love at yours."

"Yes," said Power, musingly, "there is some truth in that. This flirting is sad work. It is just like sparring with a friend: you put on the gloves in perfect good humour, with the most friendly intentions of exchanging a few amicable blows; you find yourself insensibly warm with the enthusiasm of the conflict, and some unlucky hard knock decides the matter, and it ends in a downright fight.

"Few men, believe me, are regular seducers; and, among those who behave 'vilely,' (as they call it,) three-fourths of the number have been more sinned against than sinning. You adventure upon love as upon a voyage to India: leaving the cold northern latitudes of first acquaintance behind you, you gradually glide into the warmer and more genial climate of intimacy. Each day you travel southward shortens the miles and the hours of your existence: so tranquil is the passage, and so easy the transition, you suffer no shock by the change of temperature about you. Happy were it for us, that, in our courtship, as in our voyage, there were some certain Rubicon to remind us of the miles we have journeyed! Well were it, if there were some equinox in love!"

"I'm not sure, Fred, that there is not that same shaving process they practise on the line occasionally performed for us by parents and guardians at home; and I'm not certain that the iron hoop of old Neptune is not a pleasanter acquaintance than the hair-trigger of some indignant fire-eating brother. But come, Fred, you have not told me the most important point—How fare your fortunes now? or, in other words—what are your present prospects as regards the senhora?"

"What a question to ask me! why not request me to tell you where Soult will fight us next, and when Marmont will cross the frontier? My dear boy, I have not seen her for a week, an entire week—seven full days and nights, each with their twenty-four hours of change and vacillation!"

"Well then, give me the last bulletin from the seat of war; that at least you can do: tell me how you parted."

"Strangely enough. You must know we had a grand dinner at the Villa the day before I left; and when we adjourned for our coffee to the garden, my spirits were at the top of their bent. Inez never looked so beautiful—never was one half so gracious; and, as she leaned upon my arm, instead of following the others toward the little summer-house, I turned, as if inadvertently, into a narrow dark alley that skirts the lake."

"I know it well: continue."

Power reddened slightly, and went on—

"'Why are we taking this path?' said Donna Inez; 'this is surely not a short way.'

"'Oh! I——wished to make my adieus to my old friends the swans. You know I go to-morrow.'

"'Ah! that's true,' added she. 'I'd quite forgotten it.'

"This speech was not very encouraging; but, as I felt myself in for the battle, I was not going to retreat at the skirmish. Now, or never, thought I. I'll not tell you what I said: I couldn't, if I would. It is only with a pretty woman upon one's arm—it is only when stealing a glance at her bright eyes, as you bend beyond the border of her bonnet—that you know what it is to be eloquent: watching the changeful colour of her cheek with a more anxious heart than ever did mariner gaze upon the fitful sky above him, you pour out your whole soul in love; you leave no time for doubt, you leave no space for reply; the difficulties that shoot across her mind you reply to ere she is well conscious of them: and when you feel her hand tremble, or see her eyelid fall, like the leader of a storming party, when the guns slacken in their fire, you spring boldly forward in the breach, and, blind to every danger around you, rush madly on, and plant your standard upon the walls."

"I hope you allow the vanquished the honours of war," said I, interrupting.

Without noticing my observation he continued—

"I was on my knee before her, her hand passively resting in mine, her eyes bent upon me softly and tearfully——"

"The game was your own, in fact."

"You shall hear.

"'Have we stood long enough thus, senhor?' said she, bursting into a fit of laughter.

"I sprang to my legs in anger and indignation.

"'There, don't be passionate; it is so tiresome. What do you call that tree there?'

"'It is a tulip tree,' said I, coldly.

"'Then, to put your gallantry to the test, do climb up there, and pluck me that flower——No, the far one. If you fall into the lake and are drowned, why, it would put an end to this foolish interview.'

"'And if not?' said I.

"'Oh, then I shall take twelve hours to consider of it; and, if my decision be in your favor, I'll give you the flower ere you leave to-morrow.'

"It's somewhat about thirty years since I went bird-nesting; and hang me! if a tight jacket and spurs are the best equipment for climbing a tree; but up I went, and amid a running fire of laughter and quizzing, reached the branch and brought it down safely.

"Inez took especial care to avoid me the rest of the evening: we did not meet until breakfast the following morning. I perceived then that she wore the flower in her belt; but, alas! I knew her too well to augur favourably from that; beside that, instead of any trace of sorrow or depression at my approaching departure, she was in high spirits, and the life of the party. 'How can I manage to speak with her?' said I to myself; 'but one word—I already anticipate what it must be; but let the blow fall—any thing is better than this uncertainty?'

"'The general and the staff have passed the gate, sir,' said my servant at this moment.

"'Are my horses ready?'

"'At the door, sir; and the baggage gone forward.'

"I gave Inez one look—

"'Did you say more coffee?' said she, smiling.

"I bowed coldly, and rose from the table. They all assembled upon the terrace to see me ride away.

"'You'll let us hear from you,' said Don Emanuel.

"'And pray don't forget the letter to my brother,' cried old Madame Forjas.

"Twenty similar injunctions burst from the party; but not a word said Inez.

"'Adieu, then!' said I. 'Farewell!'

"'Adios! Go with God!' chorussed the party.

"'Good-by, senhora,' said I. 'Have you nothing to tell me ere we part?'

"'Not that I remember,' said she, carelessly. 'I hope you'll have good weather.'

"'There is a storm threatening,' said I, gloomily.

"'Well! a soldier cares little for a wet jacket.'

"'Adieu!' said I sharply, darting at her a look that spoke my meaning.

"'Farewell!' repeated she, curtseying slightly, and giving one of her sweetest smiles.

"I drove the spurs into my horse's flanks, but holding him firmly on the curb at the same moment, instead of dashing forward, he bounded madly in the air.

"'What a pretty creature!' said she, as she turned toward the house; then, stopping carelessly, she looked around.

"'Should you like this bouquet?'

"Before I could reply, she disengaged it from her belt, and threw it towards me. The door closed behind her as she spoke; I galloped on to overtake the staff—et voila tout. Now, Charley, read my fate for me, and tell me what this portends."

"I confess I only see one thing certain in the whole."

"And that is?" said Power,

"That Master Fred Power is more irretrievably in love than any gentleman on full pay I ever met with."

"By Jove! I half fear as much! Is that orderly waiting for you, Charley? Who do you want, my man?"

"Captain O'Malley, sir: General Crawford desires to see you at head quarters immediately."

"Come, Charley, I'm going toward Fuentes. Take your cap: we'll walk down together."

So saying, we cantered toward the village, where we separated—Power to join some fourteenth men stationed there on duty; and I to the general's quarters to receive my orders.

CHAPTER XCVI.—The Cantonment.

Soon after this the army broke up from Caja, and went into cantonments along the Tagus; the head quarters being at Portalegre, we were here joined by four regiments of infantry lately arrived from England, and the 12th light dragoons. I shall not readily forget the first impression created among our reinforcements, by the habit of our life at this period.

Brimful of expectation, they had landed at Lisbon; their minds filled with all the glorious expectancy of a brilliant campaign, sieges, storming, and battle-fields, floated before their excited imagination.—Scarcely, however, had they reached the camp, when these illusions were dissipated. Breakfasts, dinners, private theatricals, pigeon matches, formed our daily occupation. Lord Wellington's hounds threw off regularly twice a week, and here might be seen every imaginable species of equipment, from the artillery officer, mounted on his heavy troop horse, to the infantry subaltern, on a Spanish jennet. Never was any thing more ludicrous than our turn out; every quadruped in the army was put in requisition; and even those who rolled not from their saddles from sheer necessity, were most likely to do so from laughing at their neighbours. The pace may not have equalled Melton, nor the fences been as stubborn as in Leicestershire, but I'll be sworn there was more laughter, more fun, and more merriment, in one day with us, than in a whole season with the best organised pack in England. With a lively trust that the country was open, and the leaps easy, every man took the field; indeed, the only anxiety evinced at all, was to appear at the meeting in something like jockey fashion, and I must confess that this feeling was particularly conspicuous among the infantry.—Happy the man whose kit boasted a pair of cords, or buckskins; thrice happy he who sported a pair of tops. I myself was in that enviable position, and well remember with what pride of heart I cantered up to cover, in all the superior eclat of my costume, though, if truth were to be spoken, I doubt if I should have passed muster among my friends of the "Blazers." A round cavalry jacket, and a foraging cap, with a hanging tassel, were the strange accompaniments of my more befitting nether garments. Whatever our costumes, the scene was a most animated one. Here the shell jacket of a heavy dragoon was seen storming the fence of a vineyard. There the dark green of a rifleman was going the pace over the plain. The unsportsman-like figure of a staff-officer might be observed emerging from a drain, while some neck-or-nothing Irishman, with light infantry wings, was flying at every fence before him, and overturning all in his way. The rules and regulations of the service prevailed not here; the starred and gartered general, the plumed and aiguiletted colonel obtained but little deference, and less mercy, from his more humble subaltern. In fact, I am half disposed to think that many an old grudge of rigid discipline or severe duty met with its retribution here. More than once have I heard the muttered sentences around me which boded something like this:

"Go the pace, Harry! never flinch it! There's old Colquhoun—take him in the haunches—roll him over."

"See here, boys—watch how I'll scatter the staff—beg your pardon, general, hope I have'nt hurt you. Turn about—fair play—I have taught you to take up a position now."

I need scarcely say, there was one whose person was sacred from all such attacks: he was well mounted upon a strong half-bred horse; rode always foremost, following the hounds with the same steady pertinacity with which he would have followed the enemy; his compressed lip rarely opening for a laugh, when even the most ludicrous misadventure was enacting before him; and when, by chance, he would give way, the short ha! ha! was over in a moment, and the cold stern features were as fixed and impassive as before.

All the excitement, all the enthusiasm of a hunting field, seemed powerless to turn his mind from the pre-occupation which the mighty interests he presided over, exacted. I remember once an incident which, however trivial in itself, is worth recording, as illustrative of what I mean. We were going along at a topping pace, the hounds a few fields in advance, were hidden from our view by a small beech copse; the party consisted of not more than six persons, one of whom was Lord Wellington himself. Our run had been a splendid one, and, as we were pursuing the fox to earth, every man of us pushed his horse to his full stride in the hot enthusiasm of such a moment.

"This way, my lord—this way," said Colonel Conyers, an old Melton man who led the way. "The hounds are in the valley—keep to the left." As no reply was made, after a few moments' pause, Conyers repeated his admonition. "You are wrong, my lord, the hounds are hunting yonder."

"I know it!" was the brief answer given, with a shortness that almost savoured of asperity; for a second or two not a word was spoken.

"How far is Niza, Gordon?" enquired Lord Wellington.

"About five leagues, my lord," replied the astonished aid-de-camp.

"That's the direction, is it not?"

"Yes, my lord."

"Let's go over and inspect the wounded."

No more was said, and before a second was given for consideration, away went his lordship, followed by his aid-de-camp; his pace the same stretching gallop, and apparently feeling as much excitement, as he dashed onward towards the hospital, as though following in all the headlong enthusiasm of a fox-chase.

Thus passed our summer; a life of happy ease and recreation succeeding to the harassing fatigues and severe privations of the preceding campaign.—Such are the lights and shadows of a soldier's life; such the checkered surface of his fortunes; constituting by their very change, that buoyant temperament, that happy indifference, which enables him to derive its full enjoyment from each passing incident of his career.

While thus we indulged in all the fascinations of a life of pleasure, the rigid discipline of the army was never forgotten: reviews, parades, and inspections, were of daily occurrence, and even a superficial observer could not fail to detect, that under this apparent devotion to amusement and enjoyment, our commander-in-chief concealed a deep stroke of his policy.

The spirits of both men and officers broken in spite of their successes, by the incessant privations they had endured, imperatively demanded this period of repose. The infantry, many of whom had served in the ill-fated campaign of Walcheren, were still suffering from the effects of the intermittent fever. The cavalry, from deficient forage, severe marches, and unremitting service, were in great part unfit for duty. To take the field under circumstances like these, was therefore impossible, and, with the double object of restoring their wonted spirits to the troops, and checking the ravages which sickness and the casualties of war had made within his ranks, Lord Wellington embraced the opportunity of the enemy's inaction, to take up his present position on the Tagus.

Meanwhile, that we enjoyed all the pleasures of a country life, enhanced tenfold by daily association with the gay and cheerful companions, the master mind, whose reach extended from the profoundest calculations of strategy to the minutest details of military organisation, was never idle. Foreseeing that a period of inaction, like the present, must only be like the solemn calm that precludes the storm, he prepared for the future by those bold conceptions and unrivalled combinations which were to guide him through many a field of battle and of danger, to end his career of glory in the liberation of the Peninsula.

The failure of the attack upon Badajos had neither damped his ardor, nor changed his views; and he proceeded to the investment of Ciudad Rodrigo with the same intense determination of uprooting the French occupation in Spain, by destroying their strongholds and cutting off their resources. Carrying aggressive war in one hand, he turned the other towards the maintenance of those defences which, in the event of disaster or defeat, must prove the refuge of the army.

To the lines of Torres Vedras he once more directed his attention. Engineer officers were despatched thither, the fortresses were put into repair; the bridges broken or injured during the French invasion were restored; the batteries upon the Tagus were rendered more effective, and furnaces for heating shot were added to them.

The inactivity and apathy of the Portuguese government but ill corresponded with his unwearied exertions; and, despite of continual remonstrances and unceasing representations, the bridges over the Leira and Alva were left unrepaired, and the roads leading to them, so broken as to be almost impassable, might seriously have endangered the retreat of the army, should such a movement be deemed necessary.

It was in the first week in September I was sent with despatches for the engineer officer in command of the lines, and, during the fortnight of my absence, was enabled for the first time to examine those extraordinary defences which, for the space of thirty miles, extended over a country undulating in hill and valley, and presenting, by a succession of natural and artificial resources, the strongest and most impregnable barrier that has ever been presented against the advance of a conquering army.

CHAPTER XCVII.—Mickey Free's adventure.

When I returned to the camp, I found the greatest excitement prevailing on all sides. Each day brought in fresh rumours that Marmont was advancing in force; that sixty thousand Frenchmen were in full march upon Ciudad Rodrigo, to raise the blockade, and renew the invasion of Portugal. Intercepted letters corroborated these reports; and the guerillas who joined us, spoke of large convoys which they had seen upon the roads from Salamanca and Tamanes.

Except the light division, which, under the command of Crawford, were posted upon the right of the Aguada, the whole of our army occupied the country from El Bodon to Gallegos; the fourth division being stationed at Fuente Guenaldo, where some entrenchments had been hastily thrown up.

To this position Lord Wellington resolved upon retreating, as affording points of greater strength and more capability of defence than the other line of road, which led to Almeida upon the Coa. Of the enemy's intentions we were not long to remain in doubt; for, on the morning of the 24th a strong body were seen descending from the pass above Ciudad Rodrigo, and cautiously reconnoitring the banks of the Aguada. Far in the distance a countless train of wagons, bullock-cars, and loaded mules were seen winding their slow length along, accompanied by several squadrons of dragoons.

Their progress was slow, but, as evening fell, they entered the gates of the fortress, and the cheering of the garrison mixing with the strains of martial music, faint from distance, reached us where we lay upon the far-off heights of El Bodon. So long as the light lasted, we could perceive fresh troops arriving; and even when the darkness came on, we could detect the position of the reinforcing columns, by the bright watch-fires that gleamed along the plain.

By daybreak we were under arms, anxiously watching for the intentions of the enemy, which soon became no longer dubious. Twenty-five squadrons of cavalry, supported by a whole division of infantry, were seen to defile along the great road from Ciudad Rodrigo to Guenaldo. Another column equally numerous marched straight upon Espeja: nothing could be more beautiful, nothing more martial than their appearance; emerging from a close mountain-gorge, they wound along the narrow road, and appeared upon the bridge of the Aguada, just as the morning sun was bursting forth; his bright beams tipping the polished cuirasses and their glittering equipments, they shone in their panoply like the gay troop of some ancient tournament. The lancers of Berg, distinguished by their scarlet dolmans and gorgeous trappings, were followed by the cuirassiers of the guard, who again were succeeded by the chasseurs a cheval, their bright steel helmets and light blue uniforms, their floating plumes and dappled chargers, looking the very beau ideal of light horsemen; behind, the dark masses of the infantry pressed forward, and deployed into the plain; while bringing up the rear, the rolling din, like distant thunder, announced the "dread artillery."

On they came, the seemingly interminable line converging on to that one spot upon whose summit now we assembled a force of scarcely ten thousand bayonets.

While this brilliant panorama was passing before our eyes, we ourselves were not idle. Orders had been sent to Picton to come up from the left with his division. Alten's cavalry, and a brigade of artillery were sent to the front, and every preparation, which the nature of the ground admitted, was made to resist the advance of the enemy. While these movements on either side occupied some hours, the scene was every moment increasing in interest. The large body of cavalry was now seen forming into columns of attack. Nine battalions of infantry moved up to their support, and, forming into columns, echellons, and squares, performed before us all the manœuvres of a review with the most admirable precision and rapidity; but from these our attention was soon taken by a brilliant display upon our left. Here, emerging from the wood which flanked the Aguada, were now to be seen the gorgeous staff of Marmont himself.—Advancing at a walk, they came forward amid the vivas of the assembled thousands burning with ardour and thirsting for victory. For a moment, as I looked, I could detect the marshal himself, as, holding his plumed hat above his head, he returned the salute of a lancer regiment who proudly waved their banners as he passed; but, hark! what are those clanging sounds, which, rising high above the rest, seem like the war-cry of a warrior?

"I can't mistake those tones," said a bronzed old veteran beside me. "Those are the brass bands of the imperial guard. Can Napoleon be there? see! there they come." As he spoke, the head of a column emerged from the wood, and, deploying as they came, poured into the plain. For above an hour that mighty tide flowed on, and, and before noon, a force of sixty thousand men was collected in the space beneath us.

I was not long to remain an unoccupied spectator of this brilliant display; for I soon received orders to move down with my squadron to the support of the eleventh light dragoons, who were posted at the base of the hill. The order at the moment was any thing but agreeable, for I was mounted upon a hack pony, on which I had ridden over from Crawford's division early in the morning, and, suspecting there might be some hot work during the day, had ordered Mike to follow with my horse. There was no time, however, for hesitation, and I moved my men down the slope in the direction of the skirmishers.

The position we occupied was singularly favourable: our flanks defended on either side by brushwood, we could only be assailed in front; and here, notwithstanding our vast inferiority of force, we steadily awaited the attack. As I rode from out the thick wood I could not help feeling surprised at the sounds which greeted me. Instead of the usual low and murmuring tones—the muttered sentences which precede a cavalry advance—a roar of laughter shook the entire division, while exclamations burst from every side around me:—"Look at him now!" —"they have him!—by heavens they have him!" "Well done!—well done!" "How the fellow rides!" "He's hit!—he's hit!" "No! no!" "Is he down!" "He's down!"

A loud cheer rent the air at this moment, and I reached the front in time to learn the reason of all this excitement. In the wide plain before me a horseman was seen, having passed the ford of the Aguada, to advance at the top of his speed toward the British lines. As he came nearer, it was perceived that he was accompanied by a led horse, and, apparently with a total disregard of the presence of an enemy, rode boldly and carelessly forward: behind rode three lancers, their lances couched, their horses at full speed: the pace was tremendous, and the excitement intense; for sometimes, as the leading horseman of the pursuit neared the fugitive, he would bend suddenly upon his saddle, and swerving to the right or left, totally evade him, while again, at others, with a loud cry of bold defiance, rising in his stirrups, he would press on, and, with a shake of his bridle that bespoke the jockey, almost distance the enemy.

"That must be your fellow, O'Malley; that must be your Irish groom," cried a brother officer. There could be no doubt of it. It was Mike himself.

"I'll be hanged if he's not playing with them," said Baker. "Look at the villain! He's holding in: that's more than the Frenchmen are doing. Look, look at the fellow on the gray horse: he has flung his trumpet to his back and drawn his sabre."

A loud cheer burst from the French lines: the trumpeter was gaining at every stride. Mike had got into deep ground, and the horses would not keep together. "Let the brown horse go! let him go, man!" shouted the dragoons, while I re-echoed the cry with my utmost might. But not so: Mike held firmly on, and, spurring madly, he lifted his horse at each stride; turning, from time to time, a glance at his pursuer. A shout of triumph rose from the French side: the trumpeter was beside him; his arm was uplifted; the sabre above his head. A yell broke from the British, and with difficulty could the squadron be restrained. For above a minute the horses went side by side, but the Frenchman delayed his stroke until he could get a little in the front. My excitement had rendered me speechless: if a word cou'd have saved my poor fellow, I could not have spoken. A mist seemed to gather across my eyes, and the whole plain, and its peopled thousands, danced before my eyes.

"He's down!" "He's down! by heavens!" "No! no! no!" "Look there—nobly done!" "Gallant fellow!" "He has him! he has him, by ——." A cheer that rent the very air above us broke from the squadrons, and Mike galloped in among us, holding the Frenchman by the throat with one hand: the bridle of his horse he firmly grasped with his own in the other.

"How was it? How did he do it?" cried I.

"He broke his sword-arm with a blow, and the Frenchman's sabre fell to the earth."

"Here he is, Misther Charley; and musha, but it's trouble he gave me to catch him! and I hope your honour won't be displeased at me losing the brown horse. I was obliged to let him go when the thief closed on me; but sure there he is: may I never—! if he's not galloping into the lines by himself." As he spoke, my brown charger came cantering up to the squadrons, and took his place in the line with the rest.

I had scarcely time to mount my horse, amid a buzz of congratulations, when our squadron was ordered to the front. Mixed up with detachments from the eleventh and sixteenth, we continued to resist the enemy for above two hours.

Our charges were quick, sharp, and successive, pouring in our numbers wherever the enemy appeared for a moment to be broken, and then retreating under cover of our infantry, when the opposing cavalry came down upon us in overwhelming numbers.

Nothing could be more perfect than the manner in which the different troops relieved each other during this part of the day. When the French squadrons advanced, ours met them as boldly. When the ground became no longer tenable, we broke and fell back, and the bayonets of the infantry arrested their progress. If the cavalry pressed heavily upon the squares, ours came up to the relief, and as they were beaten back, the artillery opened upon them with an avalanche of grape-shot.

I have seen many battles of greater duration, and more important in result—many have there been, in which more tactic was displayed, and greater combinations called forth; but never did I witness a more desperate hand-to-hand conflict than on the heights of El Bodon.

Baffled by our resistance, Montbrun advanced with the cuirassiers of the guard. Riding down our advanced squadrons, they poured upon us like some mighty river overwhelming all before it, and charged, cheering, up the heights. Our brave troopers were thrown back upon the artillery, and many of them cut down beside the guns. The artillery men and the drivers shared the same fate, and the cannon were captured. A cheer of exultation burst from the French, and their vivas rent the air. Their exultation was short-lived, and that cheer their death-cry; for the fifth foot, who had hitherto lain concealed in the grass, sprang madly to their feet, their gallant Major Ridge at their head. With a yell of vengeance they rushed upon the foe: the glistening bayonets glanced amid the cavalry of the French; the troops pressed hotly home; and, while the cuirassiers were driven down the hill, the guns were re-captured, limbered up, and brought away. This brilliant charge was the first recorded instance of cavalry being assailed by infantry in line.

But the hill could no longer be held; the French were advancing on either flank; overwhelming numbers pressed upon the front, and retreat was unavoidable. The cavalry were ordered to the rear, and Picton's division, throwing themselves into squares, covered the retreating movement.

The French dragoons bore down upon every face of those devoted battalions; the shouts of triumph cheered them as the earth trembled beneath their charge; but the British infantry, reserving their fire until the sabres clanked with the bayonet, poured in a shattering volley, and the cry of the wounded and the groans of the dying rose from the smoke around them.

Again and again the French came on; and the same fate ever awaited them; the only movement in the British squares was closing up the spaces as their comrades fell or sank wounded to the earth.

At last reinforcements came up from the left: the whole retreated across the plain, until, as they approached Guenaldo, our cavalry having re-formed, came to their aid with one crushing charge, which closed the day.

That same night Lord Wellington fell back, and, concentrating his troops within a narrow loop of land, bounded on either flank by the Coa, awaited the arrival of the light division, which joined us at three in the morning.

The following day Marmont again made a demonstration of his force, but no attack followed: the position was too formidable to be easily assailed, and the experience of the preceding day had taught him, that, however inferior in numbers, the troops he was opposed to were as valiant as they were ably commanded.

Soon after this Marmont retired on the valley of the Tagus. Dorsenne also fell back, and, for the present, at least, no further effort was made to prosecute the invasion of Portugal.

CHAPTER XCVIII.—The San Petro.

"Not badly wounded, O'Malley, I hope?" said General Crawford, as I waited upon him soon after the action.

I could not help starting at the question, while he repeated it, pointing at the same time to my left shoulder, from which a stream of blood was now flowing down my coat sleeve.

"I never noticed it, sir, till this moment: it can't be of much consequence, for I have been on horseback the entire day, and never felt it."

"Look to it at once, boy: a man wants all his blood for this campaign. Go to your quarters; I shall not need you for the present, so pray see the doctor at once."

As I left the General's quarters I began to feel sensible of pain, and, before a quarter of an hour had elapsed, had quite convinced myself that my wound was a severe one. The hand and arm were swollen, heavy, and distended with hemorrhage beneath the skin; my thirst became great, and a cold shuddering sensation passed over me from time to time.

I sat down for a moment upon the grass, and was just reflecting within myself what course I should pursue, when I heard the tramp of feet approaching. I looked up, and perceived some soldiers in fatigue dresses followed by a few others, who, from their noiseless gesture and sad countenances, I guessed were carrying some wounded comrade to the rear.

"Who is it, boys?" cried I.

"It's the major, sir: the Lord be good to him!" said a hardy looking eighty-eighth man, wiping his eyes with the cuff of his coat as he spoke.

"Not your major? not Major O'Shaughnessy!" said I, jumping up, and rushing towards the litter. Alas! too true, it was the gallant fellow himself; there he lay, pale and cold; his bloodless cheek and parted lips looking like death itself. A thin blue rivulet trickled down his forehead, but his most serious wound appeared to be in the side; his coat was open, and showed a mass of congealed and clotted blood, from the midst of which, with every motion of the way, a fresh stream kept welling upward. Whether from the shock, or my loss of blood, or from both together, I know not, but I sank fainting to the ground.

* * * * * * *

It would have needed a clearer brain and a cooler judgment than I possessed, to have conjectured where I was, and what had occurred to me when next I recovered my senses. Weak, fevered, and with a burning thirst, I lay, unable to move, and could merely perceive the objects which lay within the immediate reach of my vision. The place was cold, calm, and still as the grave. A lamp which hung high above my head, threw a faint light around, and showed me, within a niche of the opposite wall, the figure of a gorgeously dressed female: she appeared to be standing motionless, but, as the pale light flickered upon her features, I thought I could detect the semblance of a smile. The splendour of her costume, and the glittering gems which shone upon her spotless robe, gleamed through the darkness with an almost supernatural brilliancy, and so beautiful did she look, so calm her pale features, that, as I opened and shut my eyes and rubbed my lids, I scarcely dared to trust my erring senses, and believe it could be real. What could it mean! Whence this silence—this cold sense of awe and reverence; was it a dream! was it the fitful vision of a disordered intellect! Could it be death! My eyes were rivetted upon that beautiful figure: I essayed to speak, but could not: I would have beckoned her toward me, but my hands refused their office. I felt I know not what charm she possessed to calm my throbbing brain and burning heart; but, as I turned from the gloom and darkness around, to gaze upon her fair brow and unmoved features, I felt like the prisoner who turns from the cheerless desolation of his cell, and looks upon the fair world and the smiling valleys lying sunlit and shadowed before him.

Sleep at length came over me; and when I awoke, the day seemed breaking, for a faint gray tint stole through a stained glass window, and fell in many coloured patches upon the pavement. A low muttering sound attracted me; I listened—it was Mike's voice. With difficulty raising myself upon one arm, I endeavoured to see more around me. Scarcely had I assumed this position, when my eyes once more fell upon the white-clad figure of the preceding night. At her feet knelt Mike, his hands clasped, and his head bowed upon his bosom. Shall I confess my surprise—my disappointment! It was no other than an image of the blessed virgin, decked out in all the gorgeous splendour which Catholic piety bestows upon her saints. The features, which the imperfect light and my more imperfect faculties had endowed with an expression of calm angelic beauty, were to my waking senses but the cold and barren mockery of loveliness: the eyes, which my excited brain gifted with looks of tenderness and pity, stared with no speculation in them; yet, contrasting my feelings of the night before, full as they were of their deceptions, with my now waking thoughts, I longed once more for that delusion which threw a dreamy pleasure over me, and subdued the stormy passions of my soul into rest and repose.

"Who knows," thought I, "but he who kneels yonder feels now as I did then? Who can tell how little the cold unmeaning reality before him resembles the spiritualised creation the fervor of his love and the ardour of his devotion may have placed upon that altar! Who can limit or bound the depth of that adoration for an object whose attributes appeal not only to every sentiment of the h art, but also to every sense of the brain! I fancy that I can picture to myself how these tinselled relics, these tasteless wax works, changed by the magic of devotion and of dread, become to the humble worshipper images of loveliness and beauty. The dim religious light; the reverberating footsteps echoed along those solemn aisles; the vaulted arches, into whose misty heights the sacred incense floats upward, while the deep organ is pealing its notes of praise or prayer: these are no slight accessaries to all the pomp and grandeur of a church, whose forms and ceremonial, unchanged for ages, and hallowed by a thousand associations, appeal to the mind of the humblest peasant or the proudest noble, by all the weaknesses as by all the more favoured features of our nature."

How long I might have continued to meditate in this strain I know not, when a muttered observation from Mike turned the whole current of my thoughts. His devotion over, he had seated himself upon the steps of the altar, and appeared to be resolving some doubts within himsef concerning his late pious duty.

"Masses is dearer here than in Galway. Father Rush would be well pleased at two and sixpence for what I paid three doubloons for this morning. And sure it's droll enough. How expensive an amusement it is to kill the French. Here's half a dollar I gave for the soul of a cuirassier that I kilt yesterday, and nearly twice as much for an artillery man I cut down at the guns; and because the villain swore like a heythen, Father Pedro told me he'd cost more nor if he died like a decent man."

At these words he turned suddenly round towards the virgin, and crossing himself devoutly, added—

"And sure it's yourself knows if it's fair to make me pay for devils that don't know their duties; and, after all, if you don't understand English nor Irish, I've been wasting my time here this two hours."

"I say, Mike, how's the major? How's Major O'Shaughnessy?"

"Charmingly, sir. It was only loss of blood that ailed him: a thief with a pike—one of the chaps they call Poles, bekase of the long sticks they carry with them—stuck the major in the ribs; but Doctor Quill—God reward him! he's a great doctor, and a funny devil too—he cured him in no time."

"And where is he now, Mike?"

"Just convanient, in a small chapel off the sacristy; and throuble enough we have to keep him quiet. He gave up the *con*fusion of roses and took to punch; and faith it isn't hymns nor pasalms (psalms) he'a singing all night. And they had me there mixing materials and singing songs till I heard the bell for matins, and, what between the punch and the prayers, I never closed my eyes."

"What do they call the convent?"

"It is a hard word, I misremember; it's something like saltpetre, But how's your honor? it's time to ask."

"Much better, Mike; much better. But, as I see that either your drink or your devotion seems to have affected your nerves, you'd better lie down for an hour or two. I shall not want you."

"That's just what I can't; for you see I'm making a song for this evening. The Rangers has a little supper, and I'm to be there: and, though I've made one, I'm not sure it 'll do. Maybe your honor would give me your opinion about it?"

"With all my heart, Mike: let's hear it."

"Arrah! is it here! before the virgin and the two blessed saints that's up there in the glass cases! But sure, when they make an hospital of the place, and after the major's songs last night—"

"Exactly so, Mike; out with it."

"Well, ma'am," said he, turning towards the virgin, "as I suspect you don't know English, maybe you'll think it's my offices I'm singing. So, saving your favour, here it is"—

MR. FREE'S SONG.

AIR—"Arrah, Catty, now, can't you be asy?"

"Oh what stories I'll tell when my sodgering's o'er,
And the gallant fourteenth is disbanded,
Not a drill nor parade will I hear of no more,
When safely in Ireland I'm landed.
With the blood that I spilt—the Frenchmen I kilt,
I'll drive the young girl's half crazy;
And some cute one will cry, with the wink of her eye,
Mister Free, now—'why can't you be asy?'

"I'll tell how we routed the squadrons in fight,
And destroyed them all at 'Talavera,'
And then I'll just add, how we finished the night,
In learning to dance the 'bolera;'
How by the moonshine, we drank raal wine,
And rose next day fresh as a daisy;
Then some one will cry, with a look mighty sly,
'Arrah, Mickey—now can't you be asy?'

"I'll tell how the nights, with Sir Arthur we spent,
Around a big fire in the air too,
Or maybe enjoying ourselves in a tent,
Exactly like Donnybrook fair too;
How he'd call out to me—'pass the wine, Mr. Free,
For you're a man never is lazy!'
Then some one will cry, with the wink of her eye,
'Arrah, Mickey dear—can't you be asy?'

"I'll tell, too, the long years in fighting we passed,
Till Mounseer asked Bony to lead him;
And Sir Arthur, grown tired of glory at last,
Begged of one Mickey Free to succeed him.
'But, acushla,' says I, 'the truth is I'm shy!
There's a lady in Ballymacrazy!
And I swore on the book'—he gave me a look,
And cried, Mickey—'now can't you be asy?'

"Arrah! Mickey, now can't you be asy!" sang out a voice in chorus, and the next moment Dr. Quill himself made his appearance.

"Well, O'Malley, is it a penitential psalm you're singing, or is my friend Mike endeavouring to raise your spirits with a Galway sonata?"

"A little bit of his own muse, doctor, nothing more; but tell me, how goes it with the major—is the poor fellow out of danger?"

"Except from the excess of his appetite, I know of no risk he runs. His servant is making gruel for him all day in a thing like the grog tub of a frigate: but you've heard the news—Sparks has been exchanged; he came here last night, but the moment he caught sight of me, he took his departure. Begad I'm sure he'd rather pass a month in Verdun than a week in my company.

"By-the-bye, doctor, you never told me how this same antipathy of Sparks for you had its origin."

"Sure I drove him out of the tenth before he was three weeks with the regiment."

"Ay, I remember you began the story for me one night on the retreat from the Coa, but something broke it off in the middle."

"Just so; I was sent for to the rear to take off some gentlemen's legs that wern't in dancing condition; but, as there's no fear of interruption now, I'll finish the story. But, first, let us have a peep at the wounded. What beautiful anatomists they are in the French artillery. Do you feel the thing I have now in my forceps—there, don't jump—that's a bit of the brachial nerve, most beautifully displayed—faith, I think I'll give Mike a demonstration."

"Oh! misther Quill dear! Oh! doctor darling!"

"Arrah! Mickey, now can't ye be aisy?" sang out Maurice, with a perfect imitation of Mike's voice and manner.

"A little lint here—bend your arm—that's it—don't move your fingers. Now, Mickey, make me a cup of coffee with a glass of brandy in it. And now, Charley, for Sparks. I believe I told you what kind of fellows the tenth were—regular out and outers; we hadn't three men in the regiment that were not from the south of Ireland; the Bocca Corkana on their lips, fun and devilment in their eyes, and more drollery and humbug in their hearts, than in all the messes in the service put together. No man had any chance among them if he wasn't a real droll one: every man wrote his own songs, and sang them too: it was no small promotion could tempt a fellow to exchange out of the corps. You may think, then, what a prize your friend Sparks proved to us; we held a court martial upon him the week after he joined; it was proved in evidence that he had never said a good thing in his life, and had about as much notion of a joke as a Cherokee has of the Court of Chancery; and, as to singing, Lord bless you! he had a tune with wooden turns to it, it was most cruel to hear; and then the look of him: those eyes, like dropsical oysters, and the hair standing every way, like a field of insane flax, and the mouth, with a curl in it like the slit in the side of a fiddle. A pleasant fellow that for a mess, that always boasted the best looking chaps in the service."

"'What's to be done with him?' said the major; 'shall we tell him we are ordered to India, and terrify him about his liver?'

"'Or drill him into a hectic fever?'

"'Or drink him dry?'

"'Or get him into a fight, and wing him?'

"'Oh no,' said I, 'leave him to me: we'll laugh him out of the corps.'

"'Yes, we'll leave him to you, Maurice,' said the rest.'

"'And that day week you might read in the Gazette, 'Pierce Flynn O'Hagerty, to be ensign, tenth foot, vice Sparks exchanged'"

"But how was it done, Maurice? You haven't told me that."

"Nothing easier. I affected great intimacy with Sparks; bemoaned our hard fate, mutually, in being attached to such a regiment, a damnable corps this—low, vulgar fellows—practical jokes: not the kind of thing one expects in the army. But, as for me, I've joined it partly from necessity. You, however, who might be in a crack regiment, I can't conceive your remaining in it."

"'But why did you join, doctor?' said he; 'what necessity could have induced you.'

"'Ah! my friend,' said I, 'that is the secret; that is the hidden grief that must lie buried in my own bosom.'

"I saw that his curiosity was excited, and took every means to increase it further. At length, as if yielding to a sudden impulse of friendship, and having sworn him to secrecy, I took him aside, and began thus:

"'I may trust you, Sparks, I feel I may, and when I tell you that my honour, my reputation, my whole fortune is at stake, you will judge of the importance of the trust.'

"The goggle eyes rolled fearfully, and his features exhibited the most craving anxiety to hear my story.

"'You wish to know why I left the fifty-sixth. Now I'll tell you, but mind, you're pledged, you're sworn, never to divulge it.'

"'Honor bright.'

"'There, that's enough: I'm satisfied. It was a slight infraction of the articles of war; a little breach of the rules and regulations of the service; a trifling misconception of the mess code: they caught me one evening leaving the mess with—what do you think in my pocket? but you'll never tell! No, no, I know you'll not; eight forks, and a gravy spoon; silver forks every one of them; devil a lie in it.'

"'There now,' said I, grasping his hand, 'you have my secret; my fame and character are in your hands; for, you see, they made me quit the regiment; a man can't stay in a corps where he is laughed at.'

"Covering my face with my handkerchief, as if to conceal my shame, I turned away and left Sparks to his meditations. That same evening we happened to have some strangers at mess, the bottle was passing freely round, and, as usual, the good spirits of the party at the top of their bent, when suddenly, from the lower end of the table, a voice was heard demanding, in tones of the most pompous importance, permission to address the president upon a topic where the honour of the whole regiment was concerned.

"'I rise, gentlemen,' said Mr. Sparks, 'with feelings the most painful, whatever may have been the laxity of habit and freedom of conversation habitual in this regiment, I never believed that so flagrant an instance as this morning came to my ears ——'

"'Oh! murder,' said I; 'Oh, Sparks darling, sure you're not going to tell?'

"'Doctor Quill,' replied he in an austere tone, 'it is impossible for me to conceal it.'

"'Oh! Sparks dear, will you betray me?'

"I gave him here a look of the most imploring entreaty, to which he replied by one of unflinching sternness.

"'I have made up my mind, sir,' continued he; 'it is possible the officers of this corps may look more leniently than I do upon this transaction; but know it they shall.'

"'Out with it, Sparks—tell it by all means,' cried a number of voices, for it was clear to every one, by this time, that he was involved in a hoax.

"Amid, therefore, a confused volley of entreaty on one side, and my reiterated prayers for his silence on the other, Sparks thus began:

"'Are you aware, gentlemen, why Dr. Quill left the fifty-sixth?'

"'No, no, no,' rang from all sides, 'let's have it.'

"'No, sir!' said he, turning toward me, 'concealment is impossible—an officer detected with the mess plate in his pocket'—

"They never let him finish, for a roar of laughter shook the table from one end to the other, while Sparks, horror struck at the lack of feeling and propriety that could make men treat such a matter with ridicule, glared around him on every side.

"'Oh! Maurice, Maurice,' cried the major, wiping his eyes, 'this is too bad—this is too bad.'

"'Gracious heaven!' screamed Sparks, 'can you laugh at it?'

"'Laugh at it,' re-echoed the paymaster. 'God grant I only don't burst a blood vessel;' and, once more, the sounds of merriment rang out anew, and lasted for several minutes.

"'Oh! Maurice Quill,' cried an old captain, 'you've been too heavy on the lad; why, Sparks, man, he's been humbugging you.'

"Scarcely were the words spoken when he sprang from the room; the whole truth flashed at once upon his mind; in an instant he saw that he had exposed himself to the merciless ridicule of a mess table, and that all peace for him in that regiment at least was over.

"We got a glorious fellow in exchange for him; and Sparks descended into a cavalry regiment—I ask your pardon, Charley—where, as you are well aware, sharp wit and quick intellect are by no means indispensable. There now don't be angry, or you'll do yourself harm: so good-by for an hour or two."

CHAPTER XCVIII.—The Count's Letter.

O'Shaughnessy's wound, like my own, was happily only formidable from the loss of blood. The sabre or the lance are rarely, indeed, so death-dealing as the musket or the bayonet; and the murderous fire from a square of infantry is far more terrific in its consequences than the heaviest charge of a cavalry column. In a few weeks, therefore, we were once more about, and fit for duty: but, for the present, the campaign was ended; the rainy season, with the attendant train of sickness and sorrow set in; the troops were cantoned along the line of the frontier, the infantry occupying the villages, and the cavalry being stationed wherever forage could be obtained.

The fourteenth were posted at Avintas; but I saw little of them: I was continually employed upon the staff; and, as General Crawford's activity suffered no diminution from the interruption of the campaign, rarely passed a day without being eight or nine hours on horseback.

The preparations for the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo occupied our undivided attention. To the reduction of this fortress and of Badajos, Lord Wellington looked as the most important objects, and prosecuted his plans with unremitting zeal. To my staff appointment I owed the opportunity of witnessing that stupendous feature of war, a siege; and, as many of my friends formed a part of the blockading force, I spent more than one night in the trenches. Indeed, except for this, the tiresome monotony of life was most irksome at this period. Day after day the incessant rain poured down; the supplies were bad, scanty, and irregular; the hospitals crowded with sick; field-sports impracticable; books there were none; and a dulness and spiritless depression prevailed on every side. Those who were actively engaged around Ciudad Rodrigo had, of course, the excitement and interest which the enterprise involved: but even there, the works made slow progress; the breaching artillery was defective in every way; the rain undermined the fasces of the bastions; the clayey soil sank beneath the weight of the heavy guns; and the storms of one night frequently destroyed more than a whole week's labour had effected.

Thus passed the dreary months along; the cheeriest and gayest among us broken in spirit, and subdued in heart, by the tedium of our life. The very news which reached us partook of the gloomy features of our prospects: we heard only of strong reinforcements marching to the support of the French in Estremadura; we were told that the emperor, whose successes in Germany enabled him to turn his entire attention to the Spanish campaign, would himself be present in the coming spring, with overwhelming odds, and a firm determination to drive us from the peninsula.

In that frame of mind which such gloomy and depressing prospects are well calculated to suggest, I was returning one night to my quarters at Mucia, when suddenly I beheld Mike galloping toward me with a large packet in his hand, which he held aloft to catch my attention. "Letters from England, sir," said he; "just arrived with the general's despatches." I broke the envelope at once, which bore the war-office seal, and as I did so, a perfect avalanche of letters fell at my feet: the first which caught my eye was an official intimation from the Horse Guards, that the Prince Regent had been graciously pleased to confirm my promotion to the troop, my commission to bear date from the appointment, &c., &c. I could not help feeling struck, as my eye ran rapidly across the lines, that although the letter came from Sir George Dashwood's office, it contained not a word of congratulation nor remembrance on his part, but was couched in the usual cold and formal language of an official document. Impatient, however, to look over my other letters, I thought but little of this; so throwing them hurriedly into my sabertash, I cantered on to my quarters without delay. Once more alone and in silence, I sat down to commune with my far-off friends; and, yet, with all my anxiety to hear of home, passed several minutes in turning over the letters, guessing from whom they might have come, and picturing to myself their contents. Ah! Frank Webber, I recognise your slap-dash, bold hand, without the aid of the initials in the corner; and this—what can it be?—this queer, mis-shapen thing, representing nothing save the forty-seventh proposition of Euclid, and the address seemingly put on with a cat's-tail dipped in lampblack? Yes! true enough, it is for Misther Free himself; and what have we here? this queer, quaint hand is no new acquaintance: how many a time have I looked upon it as the ne plus ultra of caligraphy! But here is one I'm not so sure of: who could have written this bolt-upright, old-fashioned superscription; not a letter of which seems on speaking terms with its neighbour—the very O absolutely turns its back upon the M, in O'Malley, and the final Y wags his tail with a kind of independent shake, as if he did not care a curse for his predecessors! and the seal, too: surely I know that griffin's head, and the stern motto—"non rogo sed capio." To be sure, it is Billy Considine's, the Count himself. The very paper, yellow and time-stained, looks coeval with his youth, and I could even venture to wager that his sturdy pen was nibbed half a century since. I'll not look further among this confused mass of three-cornered billets, and long, treacherous-looking epistles, the very folding of which denote the dun: here goes for the Count! So saying to myself, I drew closer to the fire, and began the following epistle:

"O'MALLEY CASTLE, Nov. 3d.

"Dear Charley—Here we sit in the little parlour, with your last letter, 'The Times,' and a big map before us, drinking your health, and wishing you a long career of the same glorious success you have hitherto enjoyed. Old as I am—eighty-two or eighty-three (I forget which) in June—I envy you with all my heart. Luck has stood to you, my boy; and, if a French sabre or a bayonet finish you now, you've at least had a splendid burst of it. I was right in my opinion of you, and Godfrey himself owns it now—a lawyer indeed! Bad luck to them! we've had enough of lawyers: there's old Henessy—honest Jack, as they used to call him—that your uncle trusted for the last forty years, has raised eighteen thousand pounds on the title-deeds——and gone off to America. The old scoundrel——but it's no use talking: the blow is a sore one to Godfrey, and the gout more troublesome than ever. Drumgold is making a motion in Chancery about it, to break the sale, and the tenants are in open rebellion, and swear they'll murther a receiver, if one is sent down among them. Indeed, they came in such force into Galway, during the assizes, and did so much mischief that the cases for trial were adjourned, and the judges left, with a military escort to protect them. This, of course, is gratifying to our feelings; for, thank Providence, there is some good in the world yet. Kilmurry was sold last week for twelve thousand. Andy Blake would foreclose the mortgage, although we offered him every kind of satisfaction. This has done Godfrey a deal of harm; and some pitiful economy—taking only two bottles of claret after his dinner—has driven the gout to his head. They've been telling him he'd lengthen his days by this, and I tried it myself, and faith it was the longest day I ever spent in my life. I hope and trust you take your liquor like a gentleman—and an Irish gentleman.

"Kinshela, we hear, has issued an execution against the house and furniture; but the attempt to sell the demesne nearly killed your uncle. It was advertised in a London paper, and an offer made for it by an old general, whom you may remember when down here. Indeed, if I mistake not, he was rather kind to you in the beginning. It would appear he did not wish to have his name known, but we found him out, and such a letter as we sent him! It's little liking he'll have to buy a Galway gentleman's estate over his head, that same Sir George Dashwood. Godfrey offered to meet him any where he pleased, and, if the doctor thought he could bear the sea voyage, he'd even go over to Holyhead; but the sneaking fellow sent an apologetic kind of a letter, with some humbug excuse about very different motives, &c. But we've done with him, and I think he with us."

When I had read thus far, I laid down the letter, unable to go on; the accumulated misfortunes of one I loved best in the world following so fast one upon another; the insult, unprovoked, gratuitous insult to him upon whom my hopes of future happiness so much depended, completely overwhelmed me. I tried to continue: alas! the catalogue of evils went on; each line bore testimony to some further wreck of fortune—some clearer evidence of a ruined house.

All that my gloomiest and darkest forebodings had pictured was come to pass; sickness, poverty, harassing, unfeeling creditors, treachery and ingratitude were goading to madness and despair a spirit whose kindliness of nature was unequalled. The shock of blasted fortunes was falling upon the dying heart; the convictions which a long life had never brought home, that men were false, and their words a lie, were stealing over the man, upon the brink of the grave; and he who had loved his neighbour like a brother was to be taught, at the eleventh hour, that the beings he trusted were perjured and forsworn.

A more unsuitable adviser than Considine, in difficulties like these, there could not be; his very contempt for all the forms of law and justice, was sufficient to embroil my poor uncle still further, so that I resolved at once to apply for leave, and, if refused, and no other alternative offered, to leave the service. It was not without a sense of sorrow bordering on despair, that I came to this determination. My soldier's life had become a passion with me: I loved it for its bold and chivalrous enthusiasm, its hour of battle and strife, its days of endurance and hardship; its trials, its triumphs, its very reverses were endeared by those they were shared with; and the spirit of adventure, and the love of danger—that most exciting of all gambling—had now entwined themselves in my very nature: to surrender all these at once, and to exchange the daily, hourly enthusiasm of a campaign for the prospects now before me, was almost maddening. But still a sustaining sense of duty of what I owed to him who, in his love, had sacrificed all for me, overpowered every other consideration: my mind was made up.

Father Rush's letter was little more than a recapitulation of the count's. Debt, distress, sickness, and the heartburnings of altered fortunes filled it, and when I closed it, I felt like one over all whose views in life a dark and ill-omened cloud was closing for ever. Webber's I could not read: the light and cheerful raillery of a friend would have seemed, at such a time, like the cold, unfeeling sarcasm of an enemy. I sat down, at last, to write the general, enclosing my application for leave; and begging of him to forward it, with a favourable recommendation, to head-quarters.

This done, I lay down upon my bed, and overcome by fatigue and fretting, fell asleep to dream of my home and those I had left there, which, strangely, too, were presented to my mind with all the happy features that made them so dear to my infancy.

CHAPTER XCIX.—The Trenches.

"I have not had time, O'Malley, to think of your application," said Crawford, "nor is it likely I can for a day or two. Read that." So saying, he pushed towards me a note, written in pencil, which ran thus:

Ciudad Rodrigo, 18th December.

"Dear C.:—Fletcher tells me, that the breaches will be practicable by to-morrow evening, and I think so myself. Come over then at once, for we shall not lose any time. "Yours, "W."

"I have some despatches for your regiment, but if you prefer coming along with me——"

"My dear general, dare I ask for such a favour?"

"Well, come along: only remember that, although my division will be engaged, I cannot promise you any thing to do; so now, get your horses ready; let's away."

It was in the afternoon of the following day that we rode into the large plain before Ciudad Rodrigo, and in which the allied armies were now assembled to the number of twelve thousand men. The loud booming of the siege artillery had been heard by me for some hours before; but, notwithstanding this prelude and my own high-wrought expectations, I was far from anticipating the magnificent spectacle which burst upon my astonished view. The air was calm and still; a clear blue wintry sky stretched over head, but, below, the dense blue smoke of the deafening guns rolled in mighty volumes along the earth, and entirely concealed the lower part of the fortress; above this the tall towers and battlemented parapets rose into the thin transparent sky, like fairy palaces. A bright flash of flame would now and then burst forth from the walls, and a clanging crash of the brass metal he heard; but the unceasing roll of our artillery nearly drowned all other sounds, save when a loud cheer would burst from the trenches; while the clattering fall of masonry, and the crumbling stones as they rolled down, bespoke the reason of the cry. The utmost activity prevailed on all sides; troops pressed forward to the reliefs in the parallels; ammunition wagons moved to the front; general and staff officers rode furiously about the plain; and all betokened that the hour of attack was no longer far distant.

While all parties were anxiously awaiting the decision of our chief, the general order was made known, which, after briefly detailing the necessary arrangements, concluded with the emphatic words, "Ciudad Rodrigo must be stormed to-night." All speculation as to the troops to be engaged in this daring enterprise, was soon at an end; for, with his characteristic sense of duty, Lord Wellington made no invidious selection, but merely commanded that the attack should be made by whatever divisions might chance to be that day in the trenches. Upon the third and light divisions, therefore, this glorious task devolved; the former was to attack the main breach; to Crawford's division was assigned the, if possible, more difficult enterprise of carrying the lesser one, while Pack's Portuguese brigade were to menace the convent of La Caridad by a feint attack, to be converted into a real one, if circumstances should permit.

The decision, however matured and comprehensive in all its details, was finally adopted so suddenly that every staff-officer upon the ground was actively engaged during the entire evening in conveying the orders to the different regiments. As the day drew to a close the cannonade slackened on either side, a solitary gun would be heard at intervals, and, in the calm stillness around, its booming thunder re-echoed along the valleys of the Sierra; but, as the moon rose and night set in, these were no longer heard, and a perfect stillness and tranquillity prevailed around. Even in the trenches, crowded with armed and anxious soldiers, not a whisper was heard; and, amid that mighty host which filled the plan, the tramp of a patrol could be distinctly noted, and the hoarse voice of the French sentry upon the walls, telling that all was well in Ciudad Rodrigo.

The massive fortress looming larger as its dark shadow stood out from the sky, was still as the grave; while in the greater breach a faint light was seen to twinkle for a moment, and then suddenly to disappear, leaving all gloomy and dark as before.

Having been sent with orders to the third division, of which the eighty-eighth formed a part, I took the opportunity of finding out O'Shaughnessy, who was himself to lead an escalade party in M'Kinnon's brigade. He sprang towards me as I came forward, and, grasping my hand with more than usual earnestness, called out, "the very man I wanted! Charley my boy, do us a service now!"

Before I could reply, he continued in a low tone, "A young fellow of ours, Harry Beauclerc, has been badly wounded in the trenches, but, by some blunder, his injury is reported as a slight one, and, although the poor fellow can scarcely stand, he insists upon going with the stormers."

"Come here, major! come here!" cried a voice at a little distance.

"Follow me, O'Malley," cried O'Shaughnessy, moving in the direction of the speaker.

By the light of a lantern we could descry two officers, kneeling upon the ground; between them on the grass lay the figure of a third, upon whose features, as the pale light fell, the hand of death seemed rapidly stealing. A slight froth, tinged with blood, rested on his lip, and the florid blood, which stained the buff facing of the uniform, indicated that his wound was through the lungs.

"He has fainted," said one of the officers in a low tone.

"Are you certain it is fainting?" said the other, in a still lower.

"You see how it is, Charley," said O'Shaughnessy; "this poor boy must be carried to the rear. Will you then, like a kind fellow, hasten back to Colonel Campbell and mention the fact. It will kill Beauclerc, should any doubt rest upon his conduct, if he ever recover this."

While he spoke, four soldiers of the regiment place the wounded officer in a blanket. A long sigh escaped him, and he muttered a few broken words.

"Poor fellow! it's his mother he's talking of. He only joined a month since, and he is a mere boy. Come, O'Malley, lose no time. By Jove! it is too late, there goes the first rocket for the columns to form. In ten minutes more the stormers must fall in."

"What's the matter, Giles," said he to one of the officers, who had stopped the soldiers as they were moving off with their burden; what is it?"

"I have been cutting the white tape off his arm; for, if he sees it on waking, he'll remember all about the storming."

"Quite right—thoughtfully done!" said the other; "but who is to lead his fellows? He was in the forlorn hope."

"I'll do it," cried I with eagerness. "Come, O'Shaughnessy, you'll not refuse me——"

"Refuse you, boy!" said he, grasping my hand with both of his. "Never! but you must change your coat. The gallant eighty-eighth will never mistake their countryman's voice. But your uniform will be devilish likely to get you a bayonet through it, so come back with me, and we'll make you a ranger in no time."

"I can give your friend a cap."

"And I," said the other, "a brandy flask, which, after all, is not the worst part of a storming equipage."

"I hope," said O'Shaughnessy, "they may find Maurice in the rear. Beauclerc's all safe in his hands."

"That they'll not," said Giles, "you may swear. Quill is this moment in the trenches, and will not be the last man in the breach."'

"Follow me now, lads," said O'Shaughnessy, in a low voice. "Our fellows are at the angle of this trench. Who the deuce can that be, talking so loud?"

"It must be Maurice," said Giles.

The question was soon decided by the doctor himself, who appeared giving directions to his hospital-sergeant.

"Yes, Peter, take the tools up to a convenient spot near the breach. There's many a snug corner there in the ruins, and, although we mayn't have as good an operation-room as in old 'Stephens's,' yet we'll beat them hollow in cases."

"Listen to the fellow," said Giles, with a shudder. "The thought of his confounded thumb-screws and tourniquets is worse to me than a French howitzer."

"The devil a kinder hearted fellow than Maurice," said O'Shaughnessy, "for all that; and, if his heart was to be known this moment, he'd rather handle a sword than a saw."

"True for you, Dennis," said Quill, overhearing him; "but we are both useful in our way, as the hangman said to Lord Clare."

"But should you not be in the rear, Maurice?" said I.

"You are right, O'Malley," said he, in a whisper; but you see I owe the Cork Insurance Company a spite, for making me pay a gout premium, and that's the reason I'm here. I warned them at the time that their stinginess would come to no good."

"I say, Captain O'Malley," said Giles, "I find I can't be as good as my word with you; my servant has moved to the rear with all my traps."

"What is to be done?" said I.

"Is it shaving utensils you want?" said Maurice. "Would a scalpel serve your turn?"

"No, doctor, I'm going to take a turn of duty with your fellows to-night."

"In the breach?—with the stormers?"

"With the forlorn hope," said O'Shaughnessy. "Beauclerc is so badly wounded that we've sent him back, and Charley, like a good fellow, has taken his place."

"Martin told me," said Maurice, "that Beauclerc was only stunned, but, upon my conscience, the hospital mates now-a-days are no better than the watchmakers; they can't tell what's wrong with the instrument, till they pick it to pieces. Whiz——there goes a blue light."

"Move on; move on; whispered O'Shaughnessy; they're telling off the stormers. That rocket is the order to fall in."

"But what am I to do for a coat?"

"Take mine, my boy," said Maurice, throwing off an upper garment of coarse gray frieze, as he spoke.

"There's a neat bit of uniform," continued he, turning himself round for our admiration; "don't I look mighty like the pictures of George the First, at the battle of Dettingen!"

A burst of approving laughter was our only answer to this speech, while Maurice proceeded to denude himself of his most extraordinary garment.

"What, in the name of Heaven, is it!" said I.

"Don't despise it, Charley; it knows the smell of gunpowder as well as any bit of scarlet in the service," while he added in a whisper, "it's the ould Roscommon yeomanry. My uncle commanded them in the year '42, and this was his coat. I don't mean to say that it was new then, for you see it's a kind of heir-loom in the Quill family, and it's not every one I'd be giving it to."

"A thousand thanks, Maurice," said I, as I buttoned it on, amid an ill-suppressed titter of laughter.

"It fits you like a sentry box," said Maurice, as he surveyed me with his lantern. "The skirts separate behind in the most picturesque manner, and, when you button the collar, it will keep your head up so high, that the devil a bit you'll see except the blessed moon. It's a thousand pities you haven't the three-cocked hat, with the feather trimming. If you wouldn't frighten the French, my name's not Maurice."

"Turn about here till I admire you. If you only saw yourself in a glass, you'd never join the dragoons again. And look now, don't be exposing yourself, for I wouldn't have those blue facings destroyed for a week's pay."

"Ah, then, it's yourself is the darlin, doctor dear," said a voice behind me. I turned round; it was Mickey Free, who was standing with a most profound admiration of Maurice, beaming in every feature of his face. "It's yourself has a joke for every hour o' the day."

"Get to the rear, Mike, get to the rear with the cattle; this is no place for you or them."

"Good night, Mickey," said Maurice.

"Good night! your honour," muttered Mike to himself; "may I never die till you set a leg for me."

"Are you dressed for the ball?" said Maurice, fastening the white tape upon my arm. "There now, my boy, move on, for I think I hear Picton's voice; not that it signifies now, for he's always in a heavenly temper when any one's going to be killed. I'm sure he'd behave like an angel, if he only knew the ground was mined under his feet."

"Charley, Charley," cried out O'Shaughnessy, in a suppressed voice, "come up quickly."

"No. 24, John Forbes—here! Edward Gillespie—here!"

"Who leads this party, Major O'Shaughnessy?"

"Mr. Beauclerc, sir," replied O'Shaughnessy, pushing me forward by the arm while he spoke.

"Keep your people together, sir: spare the powder, and trust to your cold iron." He grasped my hand within his iron grip, and rode on.

"Who was it Dennis?" said I.

"Don't you know him, Charley? that was Picton."

CHAPTER C.

The storming of Ciudad Rodrigo.

Whatever the levity of the previous moment, the scene before us now repressed it effectually. The deep-toned bell of the cathedral tolled seven, and scarcely were its notes dying away in the distance, when the march of the columns was heard stealing along the ground. A low murmuring whisper ran along the advanced files of the forlorn hope; stocks were loosened, packs and knapsacks thrown to the ground; each man pressed his cap more firmly down upon his brow, and, with lip compressed and steadfast eye, waited for the word to move.

It came at last: the word "march!" passed in whispers from rank to rank, and the dark mass moved on. What a moment was that, as we advanced to the foot of the breach! The consciousness that, at the same instant, from different points of that vast plain, similar parties were moving on; the feeling that, at a word, the flame of the artillery and the flash of steel would spring from that dense cloud, and death and carnage in every shape our imagination can conceive, be dealt on all sides. The hurried fitful thought of home; the years long past, compressed into one minute's space; the last adieu to all we've loved, mingling with the muttered prayer to heaven, while, high above all, the deep pervading sense that earth has no temptation strong enough to turn us from that path whose ending must be a sepulchre.

Each heart was too full for words. We followed noiselessly along the turf, the dark figure of our leader guiding us through the gloom. On arriving at the ditch the party with the ladders moved to the front. Already some hay packs were thrown in, and the forlorn hope sprang forward.

All was still and silent as the grave. "Quietly, my men—quietly!" said M'Kinnon; "don't press." Scarcely had he spoken, when a musket, whose charge contrary to orders had not been drawn, went off. The whizzing bullet could not have struck the wall, when suddenly a bright flame burst forth from the ramparts, and shot upward towards the sky.—For an instant the whole scene before us was bright as noonday. On one side the dark ranks and glistening bayonets of the enemy; on the other, the red uniform of the British columns, compressed like some solid wall, they stretched along the plain.

A deafening roll of musketry from the extreme right announced that the third division was already in action, while the loud cry of our leader as he sprang into the trench, summoned us to the charge. The leading sections, not waiting for the adders, jumped down, others pressed rapidly behind them, when a loud rumbling thunder crept along the earth, a hissing crackling noise followed, and from the dark ditch a forked and livid lightning burst like the flame from a volcano, and a mine exploded. Hundreds of shells and grenades scattered along the ground were ignited at the same moment; the air sparkled with the whizzing fuses; the musketry plied incessantly from the walls, and every man of the leading company of the stormers was blown to pieces. While this dreadful catastrophe was enacting before our eyes, the different assaults were made on all sides; the whole fortress seemed girt around with fire. From every part arose the yells of triumph and the shouts of the assailants. As for us, we stood upon the verge of the ditch breathless, hesitating, and horror-struck. A sudden darkness succeeded to the bright glare, but from the midst of the gloom the agonizing cries of the wounded and the dying, rent our very hearts.

"Make way there! make way! here comes Mackie's party," cried an officer in front, and as he spoke the forlorn hope of the eighty-eighth came forward at a run; jumping recklessly into the ditch, they made towards the breach; the supporting division of stormers gave one inspiriting cheer, and sprang after them. The rush was tremendous; for scarcely had we reached the crumbling ruins of the rampart, when the vast column, pressing on like some mighty torrent, bore down upon our rear. Now commenced a scene to which nothing I ever before conceived of war could in any degree compare: the whole ground, covered with combustibles of every deadly and destructive contrivance, was rent open with a crash; the huge masses of masonry bounded into the air like things of no weight; the ringing clangour of the iron howitzers, the crackling of the fuses, the blazing splinters, the shouts of defiance, the more than savage yell of those in whose ranks alone the dying and the dead were numbered, made up a mass of sights and sounds almost maddening with their excitement. On we struggled; the mutilated bodies of the leading files almost filling the way.

By this time the third division had joined us, and the crush of our thickening ranks was dreadful; every moment some well-known leader fell dead or mortally wounded, and his place was supplied by some gallant fellow, who, springing from the leading files, would scarcely have uttered his cheer of encouragement, ere he himself was laid low. Many a voice, with whose notes I was familiar, would break upon my ear in tones of heroic daring, and the next moment burst forth in a death-cry. For above an hour the frightful carnage continued, fresh troops continually advancing, but scarcely a foot of ground was made; the earth belched forth its volcanic fires, and that terrible barrier did no man pass. In turn the bravest and the boldest would leap into the whizzing flame, and the taunting cheers of the enemy, triumphed in derision at the effort.

"Stormers, to the front! only the bayonet! trust to nothing but the bayonet," cried a voice, whose almost cheerful accents contrasted strangely with the death notes around, and Gurwood, who led the forlorn hope of the fifty-second, bounded into the chasm; all the officers sprang simultaneously after him; the men pressed madly on, a roll of withering musketry crashed upon them; a furious shout replied to it. The British, springing over the dead and the dying, bounded like blood-hounds on their prey. Meanwhile, the ramparts trembled beneath the tramp of the light division, who, having forced the lesser breach, came down upon the flank of the French. The garrison, however, thickened their numbers, and bravely held their ground. Man to man was now the combat. No cry for quarter. No supplicating look for mercy; it was the death struggle of vengeance and despair. At this instant an explosion louder than the loudest thunder shook the air; the rent and torn up ramparts sprang into the sky; the conquering and the conquered were alike the victims: for one of the great magazines had been ignited by a shell; the black smoke, streaked with lurid flame, hung above the dead and the dying, The artillery and the murderous musketry were stilled, paralysed, as it were, by the ruin and devastation before them: both sides stood leaning upon their arms; the pause was but momentary; the cries of wounded comrades called upon their hearts. A fierce burst of vengeance rent the air; the British closed upon the foe; for one instant they were met: the next, the bayonets gleamed upon the ramparts, and Ciudad Rodrigo was won.

SHEEP ON THE CHEVIOT HILLS.

Graze on, graze on—there comes no sound
Of border warfare here;
No slogan cry of gathering clan,
No battle-axe or spear.
No belted knight in armour bright,
With glance of kindling ire,
Doth change the sport of Chevy Chase
To conflict stern and dire.

Say, know ye that ye press the spot
Where Percy held his way
Across the marches, in his pride,
The "chiefest harts" to slay!
And where the stout Earl Douglass rode Upon his milk-white steed,
With fifteen hundred Scottish spears,
To stay the invader's deed!

Graze on, graze on—there's many a rill
Wild wandering through the glade,
Where you may freely slake your thirst,
With none to make afraid:
There's many a murmuring stream that flows
From Cheviot's terraced side,
Yet not one drop of warrior's gore
Distains its crystal tide.

For Scotia from her hills hath come,
And Albion o'er the Tweed,
To give the mountain breeze the feuds
That made their noblest bleed;
And like two friends, around whose hearts
Some brief estrangement run,
Love all the closer for the past,
And sit them down as one.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-FIRST.

Pondering on his unhappy lot, Joe sat and listened for a long time, expecting every moment to hear their creaking footsteps on the stairs, or to be greeted by his worthy father with a summons to capitulate unconditionally, and deliver himself up straightway. But neither voice nor footstep came; and though some distant echoes, as of closing doors and people hurrying in and out of rooms, resounding from time to time through the great passages, and penetrating to his remote seclusion, gave note of unusual commotion down stairs, no nearer sound disturbed his place of retreat, which seemed the quieter for these far-off noises, and was as dull and full of gloom as any hermit's cell.

It came on darker and darker. The old-fashioned furniture of the chamber, which was a kind of hospital for all the invalided movables in the house, grew indistinct and shadowy in its many shapes; chairs and tables, which by day were as honest cripples as need be, assumed a doubtful and mysterious character; and one old leprous screen of faded India leather and gold binding, which had kept out many a cold breath of air in days of yore and shut in many a jolly face, frowned on him with a spectral aspect, and stood at full height in its allotted corner, like some gaunt ghost who waited to be questioned. A portrait opposite the window—a queer, old, gray-eyed general, in an oval frame—seemed to wink and doze as the light decayed, and at length when the last faint glimmering speck of day went out, to shut its eyes in good earnest and fall sound asleep. There was such a hush and mystery about every thing that Joe could not help following its example; and so went off into a slumber likewise, and dreamed of Dolly, until the clock of Chigwell church struck two.

Still nobody came. The distant noises in the house had ceased, and out of doors all was quiet; save for the occasional barking of some deep-mouthed dog, and the shaking of the branches by the night-wind. He gazed mournfully out of the window at each well-known object as it lay sleeping in the dim light of the moon; and creeping back to his former seat, thought about the late uproar, until, with long thinking of, it seemed to have occurred a month ago. Thus, between dozing and thinking, and walking to the window and looking out, the night wore away; the grim old screen, and the kindred chairs and tables, began slowly to reveal themselves in their accustomed forms; the gray-eyed general seemed to wink and yawn and rouse himself; and at last he was broad awake again, and very uncomfortable and cold and haggard he looked, in the dull gray light of morning.

The sun had begun to peep above the forest trees, and already flung across the curling mist bright bars of gold, when Joe dropped from his window on the ground below, a little bundle and his trusty stick, and prepared to descend himself.

It was not a very difficult task; for there were so many projections and gable ends in the way, that they formed a series of clumsy steps, with no greater obstacle than a jump of some few feet at least. Joe, with his stick and bundle on his shoulder, quickly stood on the firm earth, and looked up at the old Maypole, it might be for the last time.

He didn't apostrophise it, for he was no great scholar. He didn't curse it, for he had little ill-will to give to any thing on earth. He felt more affectionate and kind to it than ever he had done in all his life before, so said with all his heart, "God bless you!" as a parting wish, and turned away.

He walked along at a brisk pace, big with the great thoughts of going for a soldier and dying in some foreign country where it was very hot and sandy, and leaving God knows what unheard-of wealth in prize-money to Dolly, who would be very much affected when she came to know of it; and full of such youthful visions, which were sometimes sanguine and sometimes melancholy, but always had her for their main point and centre, pushed on vigorously until the noise of London sounded in his ears, and the Black Lion hove in sight.

It was only eight o'clock then, and very much astonished the Black Lion was, to see him come walking in with dust upon his feet at that early hour, with no gray mare to bear him company. But as he ordered breakfast to be got ready with all speed, and on its being set before him gave him indisputable tokens of a hearty appetite, the Lion received him, as usual, with a hospitable welcome; and treated him with those marks of distinction, which, as a regular customer, and one within the freemasonry of the trade, he had a right to claim.

This lion or landlord—for he was called both man and beast, by reason of his having instructed the artist who painted his sign, to convey into the features of the lordly brute whose effigy it bore, as near a counterpart of his own face as his skill could compass and devise—was a gentleman almost as quick of apprehension, and of almost as subtle a wit as the mighty John himself. But the difference between them lay in this, that whereas Mr. Willet's extreme sagacity and acuteness were the efforts of unassisted nature, the lion stood indebted, in no small amount, to beer, of which he swigged such copious draughts, that most of his faculties were utterly drowned and washed away, except the one great faculty of sleep, which he retained in surprising perfection. The creaking lion over the house door was, therefore, to say the truth, rather a drowsy, tame, and feeble lion; and as these social representatives of a savage class are usually of a conventional character, (being depicted, for the most part, in impossible attitudes and unearthly colours,) he was frequently supposed by the more ignorant and uninformed among the neighbours, to be the veritable portrait of the host as he appeared on the occasion of some great funeral ceremony or public mourning.

"What noisy fellow is that in the next room!" said Joe, when he had disposed of his breakfast, and had washed and brushed himself.

"A recruiting serjeant," replied the Lion.

Joe started involuntarily. Here was the very thing he had been dreaming of, all the way along.

"And I wish," said the Lion, "he was any where else but here. The party make noise enough, but they don't call for much. There's great cry there, Mr. Willet, but very little wool. Your father wouldn't like 'em, I know."

Perhaps not much under any circumstances.—

Perhaps if he could have known what was passing at that moment in Joe's mind, he would have liked them still less.

"Is he recruiting for a—for a fine regiment?" said Joe, glancing at a little round mirror that hung in the bar.

"I believe he is," replied the host. "It's much the same thing, whatever regiment he's recruiting for. I'm told there a'n't a deal of difference between a fine man and another one, when they're shot through and through."

"They're not all shot," said Joe.

"No," the Lion answered, "not all. Those that are—supposing it's done easy—are the best off in my opinion."

"Ah!" retorted Joe, "but you don't care for glory."

"For what?" said the Lion.

"Glory."

"No," returned the Lion, with supreme indifference. "I don't. You're right in that, Mr. Willet. When Glory comes here, and calls for any thing to drink, and changes a guinea to pay for it, I'll give it to him for nothing. It's my belief, sir, that the Glory's arms wouldn't do a very strong business."

These remarks were not at all comforting. Joe walked out, stopped at the door of the next room and listened. The serjeant was describing a military life. It was all drinking, he said, except that there were frequent intervals of eating and love-making. A battle was the finest thing in the world—when your side won it—and Englishmen always did that. "Supposing you should be killed, sir?" said a timid voice in one corner. "Well, sir, supposing you should be," said the serjeant, "what then? Your country loves you, sir; his Majesty King George the Third loves you; your memory is honoured, revered, respected; every body's fond of you, and grateful to you; your name's wrote down at full length in a book in the War Office. Damme, gentlemen, we must all die some time or another, eh?"

The voice coughed, and said no more.

Joe walked into the room. A group of half-a-dozen fellows had gathered together in the tap-room, and were listening with greedy ears. One of them, a carter in a smock frock, seemed wavering and disposed to enlist. The rest, who were by no means disposed, strongly urged him to do so (according to the custom of mankind,) backed the serjeant's arguments, and grinned among themselves. "I say nothing, boys," said the serjeant, who sat a little apart, drinking his liquor. "For lads of spirit,"—here he cast an eye on Joe—"this is the time. I don't want to inveigle you. The king's not come to that, I hope. Brisk young blood is what we want; not milk and water. We won't take five men out of six. We want top-sawyers, we do. I'm not a going to tell tales out of school, but, damme, if every gentleman's son that carries arms in our corps, through being under a cloud and having little differences with his relations, was counted up"—here his eye fell on Joe again, and so good-naturedly, that Joe beckoned him out. He came directly.

"You're a gentleman, by G—!" was his first remark, as he slapped him on the back. "You're a gentleman in disguise. So am I. Let's swear a friendship."

Joe did'nt exactly do that, but he shook hands with him, and thanked him for his good opinion.

"You want to serve," said his new friend. "You shall. You were made for it. You are one of us by nature. What'll you take to drink?"

"Nothing just now," replied Joe, smiling faintly. "I haven't quite made up my mind."

"A mettlesome fellow like you, and not made up his mind!" cried the serjeant. "Here—let me give the bell a pull, and you'll make up your mind in half a minute, I know."

"You're right, so far"—answered Joe, "for if you pull the bell here, where I'm known, there'll be an end of my soldiering inclinations in no time. Look in my face. You see me, do you?"

"I do," replied the serjeant with an oath, "and a finer young fellow or one better qualified to serve his king and country, I never set my—" he used an adjective in this place—"eyes on."

"Thank you," said Joe, "I didn't ask you for want of a compliment, but thank you all the same. Do I look like a sneaking fellow or a liar?"

The serjeant rejoined with many choice asseverations that he didn't; and that if his (the serjeant's) own father were to say he did, he would run the old gentleman through the body cheerfully, and consider it a meritorious action.

Joe expressed his obligation, and continued, "You can trust me then, and credit what I say. I believe I shall enlist in your regiment to-night. The reason I don't do so now is, because I don't want, until to-night, to do what I can't recall. Where shall I find you this evening?"

His friend replied with some unwillingness, and after much ineffectual entreaty having for its object the immediate settlement of the business, that his quarters would be at the Crooked Billet in Tower Street; where he would be found waking until midnight, and sleeping until breakfast time to-morrow.

"And if I do come—which it's a million to one I shall—when will you take me out of London?" demanded Joe.

"To-morrow morning, at half-past eight o'clock," replied the serjeant. "You'll go abroad—a country where it's all sunshine and plunder—the finest climate in the world."

"To go abroad," said Joe, shaking hands with him, "is the very thing I want. You may expect me."

"You're the kind of lad for us," cried the serjeant, holding Joe's hand in his, in the excess of his admiration. "You're the boy to push your fortune. I don't say it because I owe you any envy, or would take away from the credit of the rise you'll make, but if I'd been bred and taught like you, I'd have been a colonel by this time."

"Tush man!" said Joe, "I'm not so young as that. Needs must when the devil drives; and the devil that drives me is an empty pocket and an unhappy home. For the present, good-bye."

"For king and country!" cried the serjeant, flourishing his cap.

"For bread and meat!" cried Joe, snapping his fingers. And so they parted.

He had very little money in his pocket; so little, indeed, that, after paying for his breakfast (which he was too honest and perhaps too proud to score up to his father's charge) he had but a penny left. He had courage, notwithstanding, to resist all the affectionate importunities of the serjeant, who waylaid him at the door with many protestations of eternal friendship, and did in particular request that he would do him the favour to accept of only one shilling as a temporary accommodation. Rejecting his offers both of cash and credit, Joe walked away with stick and bundle as before, bent upon getting through the day as he best could, and going down to the locksmith's in the dusk of the evening; for it should go hard, he had resolved, but he would have a parting word with charming Dolly Varden.

He went out by Islington, and so on to Highgate, and sat on many stones and gates, but there were no voices in the bells to bid him turn. Since the time of noble Whittington, fair flower of merchants, bells have come to have less sympathy with humankind. They only ring for money and on state occasions. Wanderers have increased in number; ships leave the Thames for distant regions, carrying from stem to stern no other cargo; the bells are silent; they ring out no entreaties or regrets; they are used to it, and have grown worldly.

Joe bought a roll, and reduced his purse to the condition (with a difference) of that celebrated purse of Fortunatus, which, whatever were its favoured owner's necessities, had one unvarying amount in it. In these real times, when all the Fairies are dead and buried, there are still a great many purses which possess that quality. The sum-total they contain is expressed in arithmetic by a circle, and whether it be added to or multiplied by its own amount, the result of the problem is more easily stated than any known in figures.

Evening drew on at last. With the desolate and solitary feeling of one who had no home or shelter, and was alone utterly in the world for the first time, he bent his steps towards the locksmith's house. He had delayed till now, knowing that Mrs. Varden sometimes went out alone, or with Miggs for her sole attendant, to lectures in the evening; and devoutly hoping that this might be one of her nights of moral culture.

He had walked up and down before the house, on the opposite side of the way, two or three times, when he returned to it again, he caught a glimpse of a fluttering skirt at the door. It was Dolly's—to whom else could it belong! no dress but hers had such a flow as that. He plucked up his spirits, and followed it into the workshop of the Golden Key.

His darkening the door caused her to look round. Oh that face! "If it hadn't been for that," thought Joe, "I should never have walked into poor Tom Cobb. She's twenty times handsomer than ever. She might marry a Lord!"

He didn't say this. He only thought it—perhaps looked it also. Dolly was glad to see him, and was so sorry her father and mother were away from home. Joe begged she wouldn't mention it on any account.

Dolly hesitated to lead the way into the parlour, for there it was nearly dark; at the same time she hesitated to stand talking in the workshop, which was yet light and open to the street. They had got by some means, too, before the little forge; and Joe having her hand in his (which he had no right to have, for Dolly only gave it him to shake,) it was so like standing before some homely altar being married, that it was the most embarrassing state of things in the world.

"I have come," said Joe, "to say good-bye—to say good-bye, for I don't know how many years; perhaps for ever. I am going abroad."

Now this was exactly what he should not have said. Here he was, talking like a gentleman at large who was free to come and go and roam about the world at his pleasure, when that gallant coach-maker had vowed but the night before that Miss Varden held him bound in adamantine chains; and had positively stated in so many words that she was killing him by inches, and that in a fortnight more or thereabouts he expected to make a decent end and leave the business to his mother.

Dolly released her hand and said "Indeed!" She remarked in the same breath that it was a fine night, and in short, betrayed no more emotion than the forge itself.

"I couldn't go," said Joe, "without coming to see you. I hadn't the heart to."

Dolly was more sorry than she could tell, that he should have taken so much trouble. It was such a long way, and he must have had such a deal to do. And how was Mr. Willet—that dear old gentleman—

"Is this all you say!" cried Joe.

All! Good gracious, what did the man expect! She was obliged to take her apron in her hand and run her eyes along the hem from corner to corner, to keep herself from laughing in his face;—not because his gaze confused her—not at all.

Joe had small experience in love affairs, and had no notion how different young ladies are at different times: he had expected to take Dolly up again at the very point where he had left her after that delicious evening ride, and was no more prepared for such an alteration than to see the sun and moon change places. He had buoyed himself up all day with an indistinct idea that she would certainly say "Don't go," or "Don't leave us," or "Why do you go?" or "Why do you leave us?" or would give him some little encouragement of that sort; he had even entertained the possibility of her bursting into tears, of her throwing herself into his arms, of her falling down in a fainting-fit without previous word or sign, but any approach to such a line of conduct as this, had been so far from his thoughts that he could only look at her in silent wonder.

Dolly in the meanwhile, turned to the corners of her apron and measured the sides, and smoothed out the wrinkles, and was as silent as he. At last after a long pause, Joe said good-bye. "Good-bye"—said Dolly—with as pleasant a smile as if he were going into the next street, and were coming back to supper; "good-bye."

"Come," said Joe, putting out both his hands, "Dolly, dear Dolly, don't let us part like this. I love you dearly, with all my heart and soul; with as much truth and earnestness as ever man loved woman in this world, I do believe. I am a poor fellow, as you know—poorer now than ever, for I have fled from home, not being able to bear it any longer, and must fight my own way without help. You are beautiful, admired, are loved by every body, are well off and happy; and may you ever be so!

Heaven forbid I should ever make you otherwise; but give me a word of comfort. Say something kind to me. I have no right to expect it of you, I know, but I ask it because I love you, and shall treasure the slightest word from you all through my life. Dolly, dearest, have you nothing to say to me?"

No. Nothing. Dolly was a coquette by nature, and a spoilt child. She had no notion of being carried by storm in this way. The coachmaker would have been dissolved in tears, and would have knelt down, and called himself names, and clasped his hands, and beat his breast, and tugged wildly at his cravat, and done all kinds of poetry. Joe had no business to be going abroad. He had no right to be able to do it. If he was in adamantine chains, he couldn't.

"I have said good-bye," said Dolly, "twice. Take your arm away directly, Mr. Joseph, or I'll call Miggs."

"I'll not reproach you," answered Joe, "it's my fault, no doubt. I have thought sometimes that you didn't quite despise me, but I was a fool to think so. Every one must, who has seen the life I have led—you most of all. God bless you!"

He was gone, actually gone. Dolly waited a little while, thinking he would return, peeped out at the door, looked up the street and down as well as the increasing darkness would allow, came in again, waited a little longer, went up stairs humming a tune, bolted herself in, laid her head down on her bed, and cried as if her heart would break. And yet such natures are made up of so many contradictions, that if Joe Willet had come back that night, next day, next week, next month, the odds are a hundred to one she would have treated him in the very same manner, and have wept for it afterward with the very same distress.

She had no sooner left the workshop than there cautiously peered out from behind the chimney of the forge, a face which had already emerged from the same concealment twice or thrice, unseen, and which, after satisfying itself that it was now alone, was followed by a leg, a shoulder, and so on by degrees, until the form of Mr. Tappertit stood confessed with a brown-paper cap stuck negligently on one side of his head, and its arms very much a-kimbo.

"Have my ears deceived me," said the 'Prentice, "or do I dream! am I to thank thee, Fortun', or to cus thee—which?"

He gravely descended from his elevation, took down his piece of looking-glass, planted it against the wall upon the usual bench, twisted his head round, and looked closely at his legs.

"If they're a dream," said Sim, "let sculptures have such visions, and chisel 'em out when they wake. This is reality. Sleep has no such limbs as them. Tremble, Willet, and despair. She's mine! She's mine!"

With these triumphant expressions, he seized a hammer and dealt a heavy blow at a vice, which in his mind's eye represented the sconce or head of Joseph Willet. That done, he burst into a peal of laughter which startled Miss Miggs even in her distant kitchen, and dipping his head into a bowl of water, had recourse to a jack-towel inside the closet door, which served the double purpose of smothering his feelings and drying his face.

Joe, disconsolate and down-hearted, but full of courage too, on leaving the locksmith's house made the best of his way to the Crooked Billet, and there enquired for his friend, the serjeant, who, expecting no man less, received him with open arms. In the course of five minutes after his arrival at that house of entertainment, he was enrolled among the gallant defenders of his native land; and within half an hour, was regaled with a steaming supper of boiled tripe and onions, prepared, as his friend assured him more than once, at the express command of his most Sacred Majesty the King. To this meal, which tasted very savoury after his long fasting, he did ample justice—and when he had followed it up, or down, with a variety of loyal and patriotic toasts, he was conducted to a straw mattress in a loft over the stable, and locked in there for the night.

The next morning, he found that the obliging care of his martial friend had decorated his hat with sundry parti-coloured streamers, which made a very lively appearance; and in company with that officer, and three other military gentlemen newly enrolled, who were under a cloud so dense that it only left three shoes, a boot, and a coat and a half visible among them, repaired to the river-side. Here they were joined by a corporal and four more heroes, of whom two were drunk and daring, and two sober and penitent, but each of whom, like Joe, had his dusty stick and bundle. The party embarked in a passage-boat bound for Gravesend, whence they were to proceed on foot to Chatham; the wind was in their favour, and they soon left London behind them, a mere dark mist—a giant phantom in the air.

CHAPTER THE TWENTY-SECOND.

Misfortunes, saith the adage, never come singly. There is little doubt that troubles are exceedingly gregarious in their nature, and flying in flocks, are apt to perch capriciously; crowding on the heads of some poor wights until there is not an inch of room left on their unlubky crowns, and taking no more notice of others who offer as good resting-places for the soles of their feet than if they had no existence. It may have happened that a flight of troubles brooding over London, and looking out for Joseph Willet, whom they couldn't find, darted down hap-hazard on the first young man that caught their fancy, and settled on him instead. However this may be, certain it is that on the very day of Joe's departure they swarmed about the ears of Edward Chester, and did so buzz and flap their wings, and persecute him, that he was most profoundly wretched.

It was evening, and just eight o'clock, when he and his father, having wine and dessert set before them, were left to themselves for the first time that day. They had dined together, but a third person had been present during the meal, and until they met at table they had not seen each other since the previous night.

Edward was reserved and silent. Mr. Chester was more than usually gay; but not caring, as it seemed, to open a conversation with one whose humour was so different, he vented the lightness of his spirit in smiles and sparkling looks, and made no effort to awaken his attention. So they remained for some time: the father lying on a sofa with his accustomed air of graceful negligence; the son seated opposite to him with downcast eyes, busied, it was plain, with painful and uneasy thoughts.

"My dear Edward," said Mr. Chester at length, with a most engaging laugh, "do not extend your drowsy influence to the decanter. Suffer that to circulate, let your spirits be never so stagnant."

Edward begged his pardon, passed it, and relapsed into his former state.

"You do wrong not to fill your glass," said Mr. Chester, holding up his own before the light. "Wine in moderation—not in excess, for that makes men ugly—has a thousand pleasant influences. It brightens the eyes, improves the voice, imparts a new vivacity to one's thoughts and conversation: you should try it, Ned."

"Ah father!——" cried his son.

"My good fellow," interposed the parent hastily, as he set down his glass, and raised his eyebrows with a startled and horrified expression, "for heaven's sake don't call me by that obsolete and ancient name. Have some regard for delicacy. Am I gray, or wrinkled, do I go on crutches, have I lost my teeth, that you adopt such a mode of address? Good God, how very coarse!"

"I was about to speak to you from my heart, sir," returned Edward, "in the confidence which should subsist between us; and you check me in the outset."

"Now do, Ned, do not," said Mr. Chester, raising his delicate hand imploringly, "talk in that monstrous manner. About to speak from your heart! Don't you know that the heart is an ingenious part of our formation—the centre of the blood-vessels and all that sort of thing—which has no more to do with what you say or think, than your knees have? How can you be so very vulgar and absurd? These anatomical allusions should be left to gentlemen of the medical profession. They are really not agreeable in society. You quite surprise me, Ned."

"Well! there are no such things to wound, or heal, or have regard for. I know your creed, sir, and will say no more," returned his son.

"There again," said Mr. Chester, sipping his wine, "you are wrong. I distinctly say there are such things. We know there are. The hearts of animals—of bullocks, sheep, and so forth—are cooked and devoured, as I am told, by the lower classes, with a vast deal of relish. Men are sometimes stabbed to the heart, shot to the heart; but as to speaking from the heart, or to the heart, or being warm-hearted, or cold-hearted, or broken-hearted, or being all heart, or having no heart—bah! these things are nonsense, Ned."

"No doubt, sir," returned his son, seeing that he paused for him to speak. "No doubt."

"There's Haredale's niece, your late flame," said Mr. Chester, as a careless illustration of his meaning, "No doubt in your mind she was all heart once. Now she has none at all. Yet she is the same person, Ned, exactly."

"She is a changed person, sir," cried Edward, reddening; "and changed by vile means, I believe."

"You have had a cool dismissal, have you?" said his father. "Poor Ned! I told you last night what would happen. May I ask you for the nut crackers?"

"She has been tampered with, and most treacherously deceived," cried Edward, rising from his seat. "I never will believe that the knowledge of my real position, given her by myself, has worked this change. I know she is beset and tortured. But though our contract is at an end, and broken past all redemption; though I charge upon her want of firmness and want of truth, both to herself and me; I do not now, and never will believe, that any sordid motive or her own unbiased will, has led her to this course—never!"

"You make me blush," returned his father gayly, "for the folly of your nature, in which—but we never know ourselves—I devoutly hope there is no reflection of my own. With regard to the young lady herself, she has done what is very natural and proper, my dear fellow; what you yourself proposed, as I learn from Haredale; and what I predicted—with no great exercise of sagacity—she would do. She supposed you to be rich, or at least quite rich enough; and found you poor. Marriage is a civil contract; people marry to better their worldly condition and improve appearances: it is an affair of house and furniture, of liveries, servants, equipage, and so forth. The lady being poor, and you poor also, there is an end of the matter. You cannot enter upon these considerations, and have no manner of business with the ceremony. I drink her health in this glass, and respect and honour her for her extreme good sense. It is a lesson to you. Fill yours, Ned."

"It is a lesson," returned his son, "by which I hope I may never profit, and if years and their experience impress it on—"

"Don't say on the heart," interposed his father.

"On men whom the world and its hypocrisy have spoiled," said Edward, warmly, "Heaven keep me from its knowledge."

"Come, sir," returned his father, raising himself a little on the sofa, and looking straight toward him; "we have had enough of this. Remember, if you please, your interest, your duty, your moral obligations, you filial affections, and all that sort of thing, which is so very delightful and charming to reflect upon; or you will repent it."

"I shall never repent the preservation of my self-respect, sir," said Edward. "Forgive me if I say that I will not sacrifice it at your bidding, and that I will not pursue the track which you would have me take, and to which the secret share you have had in this late separation, tends."

His father rose a little higher still, and looking at him as though curious to know if he were quite resolved and earnest, dropped gently down again, and said in the calmest voice—eating his nuts meanwhile.

"Edward, my father had a son, who being a fool like you, and, like you, entertaining low and disobedient sentiments, he disinherited and cursed one morning after breakfast. The circumstance occurs to me with a singular clearness of recollection this evening. I remember eating muffins at the time, with marmalade. He led a miserable life (the son, I mean) and died early; it was a happy release on all accounts; he degraded the family very much. It is a sad circumstance, Edward, when a father finds it necessary to resort to such strong measures."

"It is," replied Edward, "and it is sad when a son, proffering him his love and duty in their best and truest sense, finds himself repelled at every turn, and forced to disobey. Dear father," he added, more earnestly, though in a gentler tone, "I have reflected many times on what occurred between us when we first discussed this subject. Let there be a confidence between us; not in terms, but truth. Hear what I have to say."

"As I anticipate what it is, and cannot fail to do so, Edward," returned the father coldly, "I decline. I couldn't possibly. I am sure it would put me out of temper, which is a state of mind I can't endure. If you intend to mar my plans for your establishment in life, and the preservation of that gentility and becoming pride, which our family have so long sustained—if, in short, you are resolved to take your own course, you must take it, and my curse with it. I am very sorry, but there's really no alternative."

"The curse may pass your lips," said Edward, "but it will be but empty breath. I do not believe that any man on earth has greater power to call one down upon his fellow—least of all, upon his own child—than he has to make one drop of rain or flake of snow fall from the clouds above us, at his impious bidding. Beware, sir, what you do."

"You are so very irreligious, so exceedingly undutiful, so horribly profane," rejoined his father, turning his face lazily toward him, and cracking another nut, "that I positively must interrupt you here. It is quite impossible we can continue to go on upon such terms as these. If you will do me the favour to ring the bell, the servant will show you to the door. Return to this roof no more, I beg you. Go, sir, since you have no moral sense remaining; and go to the devil, at my express desire. Good day."

Edward left the room without another word or look, and turned his back upon the house for ever.

The father's face was slightly flushed and heated, but his manner was quite unchanged, as he rung the bell again, and addressed his servant on his entrance.

"Peak, if that gentleman who has just gone out——"

"I beg your pardon, sir—Mr. Edward?"

"Were there more than one, dolt, that you ask the question? If that gentleman should send here for his wardrobe, let him have it—do you hear? If he should call himself at any time, I'm not at home. You'll tell him so—and shut the door."

So, it soon got whispered about, that Mr. Chester was very unfortunate in his son, who had occasioned him grief and sorrow. And the good people who heard this and told it again, marvelled the more at his equanimity and even temper, and said, "What an amiable nature that man must have, who, having undergone so much, could be so placid and so calm." And when Edward's name was spoken, society shook its head and laid its finger on its lip, and sighed, and looked very grave; and those who had sons about his age, waxed wrathful and indignant, and hoped, for Virtue's sake, that he was dead. And the world went on turning round, as usual, for five years, concerning which this narrative is silent.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-THIRD.

One wintry evening, early in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty, a keen north wind arose as it grew dark, and night came on with black and dismal looks. A bitter storm of sleet, sharp, dense, and icy-cold, swept the wet streets, and rattled on the trembling windows. Signboards, shaken past endurance in their creaking frames, fell crashing on the pavement; old tottering chimneys reeled and staggered in the blast; and many a steeple rocked again that night, as though the earth were troubled.

It was not a time for those who could by any means get light and warmth, to brave the fury of the weather. In the coffee-houses of the better sort, guests crowded round the fire, forgot to be political, and told each other with a secret gladness that the blast grew fiercer every minute. Each humble tavern by the water-side, had its group of uncouth figures round the hearth; who talked of vessels foundering at sea, and all hands lost, related many a dismal tale of shipwreck and drowned men, and hope that some they knew were safe, and shook their heads in doubt. In private dwellings, children clustered near the blaze; listening with timid pleasure to tales of ghosts and goblins, and tall figures clad in white standing by bedsides, and people who had gone to sleep in old churches and being overlooked had found themselves alone there at the dead hour of the night: until they shuddered at the thought of the dark rooms up stairs, yet loved to hear the wind moan too, and hoped it would continue bravely. From time to time these happy in-door people stopt to listen, or one held up his finger and cried, "Hark!" and then, above the rumbling of the chimney, and the fast pattering on the glass, was heard a wailing, rushing sound, which shook the walls as though a giant's hand were on them; then a hoarse roar as if the sea had risen; then such a whirl and tumult that the air seemed mad; and then, with a lengthened howl, the waves of wind swept on, and left a moment's interval of rest.

Cheerily, though there were none abroad to see it, shone the Maypole light that evening. Blessings on the red—deep, ruby, glowing red—old curtain of the window; blending into one rich stream of brightness, fire and candle, meat, drink, and company, and gleaming like a jovial eye upon the bleak waste out of doors! Within, what carpet like its crunching sand, what music merry as its crackling logs, what perfume like its kitchen's dainty breath, what weather genial as its hearty warmth! Blessings on the old house, how sturdily it stood! How did the vexed wind chafe and roar about its stalwart roof; how did it pant and strive with its wide chimneys, which still poured forth from their hospitable throats, clouds of smoke, and puffed defiance in its face; how above all, did it strive and rattle at the casement, emulous to extinguish that cheerful glow, which would not be put down and seemed the brighter for the conflict!

The profusion too, the rich and lavish bounty, of that goodly tavern! It was not enough that one fire roared and sparkled on its spacious hearth; in the tiles which paved and compassed it, five hundred flickering fires burnt brightly also. It was not enough that one red curtain shut the wild night out, and shed its cheerful influence on the room. In every saucepan lid, and candlestick, and vessel of copper, brass, or tin that hung upon the walls, were countless ruddy hangings, flashing and gleaming with every motion of the blaze, and offering, let the eye wander where it might, interminable vistas of the same rich colour. The old oak wainscoting, the beams, the chairs, the seats, reflected it in a deep, dull glimmer. There were fires and red curtains in the very eyes of the drinkers, in their buttons, in their liquor, in the pipes they smoked.

Mr. Willet sat in what had been his accustomed place five years before, with his eyes on the eternal boiler; and had sat there since the clock struck eight, giving no other signs of life than breathing with a loud and constant snore (though he was wide awake), and from time to time putting his glass to his lips, or knocking the ashes out of his pipe, and filling it anew. It was now half-past ten. Mr. Cobb and long Phil Parkes were his companions, as of old, and for two mortal hours and a half, none of the company had pronounced one word.

Whether people, by dint of sitting together in the same place and the same relative positions, and doing exactly the same things for a great many years, acquire a sixth sense, or some unknown power of influencing each other which serves them in its stead, is a question for philosophy to settle. But certain it is that old John Willet, Mr. Parkes, and Mr. Cobb, were one and all firmly of opinion that they were very jolly companions — rather choice spirits than otherwise; that they looked at each other every now and then as if there were a perpetual interchange of ideas going on among them; that no man considered himself or his neighbour by any means silent; and that each of them nodded occasionally when he caught the eye of another, as if he would say, "You have expressed yourself extremely well, sir, in relation to that sentiment, and I quite agree with you."

The room was so very warm, the tobacco so very good, and the fire so very soothing, that Mr. Willet by degrees began to doze; but as he had perfectly acquired, by dint of long habit, the art of smoking in his sleep, and as his breathing was pretty much the same, awake or asleep, saving that in the latter case he sometimes experienced a slight difficulty in respiration (such as a carpenter meets with when he is planing and comes to a knot), neither of his companions was aware of the circumstance, until he met with one of these impediments and was obliged to try again.

"Johnny's dropped off," said Mr. Parkes in a whisper.

"Fast as a top," said Mr. Cobb.

Neither of them said any more until Mr. Willet came to another knot—one of surpassing obduracy—which bade fair to throw him into convulsions, but which he got over at last without waking, by an effort quite superhuman.

"He sleeps uncommon hard," said Mr. Cobb.

Mr. Parkes, who was possibly a hard sleeper himself, replied with some disdain, "Not a bit on it;" and directed his eyes towards a handbill pasted over the chimney-piece, which was decorated at the top with a woodcut representing a youth of tender years running away very fast, with a bundle over his shoulder at the end of a stick, and—to carry out the idea—a finger-post and a mile-stone beside him. Mr. Cobb likewise turned his eyes in the same direction, and surveyed the placard as if that were the first time he had ever beheld it. Now this was a document which Mr. Willet had himself indited on the disappearance of his son Joseph, acquainting the nobility and gentry and the public in general with the circumstances of his having left his home; describing his dress and appearance; and offering a reward of five pounds to any person or persons who would pack him up and return him safely to the Maypole at Chigwell, or lodge him in any of his Majesty's jails until such time as his father should come and claim him. In this advertisement Mr. Willet had obstinately persisted, despite the advice and entreaties of his friends, in describing his son as a "young boy;" and furthermore as being from eighteen inches to a couple of feet shorter than he really was: two circumstances which perhaps accounted in some degree, for its never having been productive of any other effect than the transmission to Chigwell at various times and at a vast expense, of some five-and-forty run-aways varying from six years old to twelve.

Mr. Cobb and Mr. Parkes looked mysteriously at this composition, at each other, and at old John. From the time he had pasted it up with his own hands, Mr. Willet had never by word or sign alluded to the subject, or encouraged any one else to do so. Nobody had the least notion what his thoughts or opinions were, connected with it; whether he remembered it or forgot it; whether he had any idea that such an event had ever taken place. Therefore, even while he slept, no one ventured to refer to it in his presence; and for such sufficient reasons, these his chosen friends were silent now.

Mr. Willet had got by this time into such a complication of knots, that it was perfectly clear he must wake or die. He chose the former alternative, and opened his eyes.

"If he don't come in five minutes," said John, "I shall have supper without him."

The antecedent of this pronoun had been mentioned for the last time at eight o'clock. Messrs. Parkes and Cobb being used to this style of conversation, replied without difficulty that to be sure Solomon was very late, and they wondered what had happened to detain him.

"He a'n't blow away, I suppose," said Parkes. "It's enough to carry a man of his figure off his legs, and easy too. Do you hear it? It blows great guns, indeed. There'll be many a crash in the Forest to-night, I reckon, and many a broken branch upon the ground to-morrow."

"It won't break any thing in the Maypole, I take it, sir," returned old John. "Let it try. I give it leave—what's that?"

"The wind," cried Parkes. "It's howling like a Christian, and has been all night long."

"Did you ever, sir," asked John, after a minute's contemplation, "hear the wind say 'Maypole?'"

"Why, what man ever did?" said Parkes.

"Nor 'ahoy,' perhaps?" added John.

"No. Nor that neither."

"Very good, sir," said Mr. Willet, perfectly unmoved; "then if that was the wind just now, and you'll wait a little time without speaking, you'll hear it say both words very plain."

Mr. Willet was right. After listening for a few moments, they could clearly hear, above the roar and tumult out of doors, this shout repeated; and that with a shrillingness and energy, which denoted that it came from some person in great distress or terror. They looked at each other, turned pale, and held their breath. No man stirred.

It was in this emergency, that Mr. Willet displayed something of that strength of mind and plenitude of mental resource, which rendered him the admiration of all his friends and neighbours. After looking at Messrs. Parkes and Cobb for some time in silence, he clapped his two hands to his cheeks, and sent forth a roar which made the glasses dance and rafters ring—a long-sustained, discordant bellow, that rolled onward with the wind, and startling every echo, made the night a hundred times more boisterous—a deep, loud, dismal bray, that sounded like a human gong. Then, with every vein in his head and face swoln with the great exertion, and his countenance suffused with a lively purple, he drew a little nearer to the fire, and turning his back upon it, said with dignity:

"If that's any comfort to any body, they're welcome to it. If it an't, I'm sorry for 'em. If either of you two gentlemen likes to go out and see what's the matter, you can. I'm not curious, myself."

While he spoke the cry drew nearer and nearer, footsteps passed the window, the latch of the door was raised, it opened, was violently shut again, and Solomon Daisy, with a lighted lantern in his hand, and the rain streaming from his disordered dress, dashed into the room.

A more complete picture of terror than the little man presented, it would be difficult to imagine. The perspiration stood in beads upon his face, his knees knocked together, his every limb trembled, the power of articulation was quite gone; and there he stood, panting for breath, gazing on them with such livid ashy looks, that they were infected with his fear, though ignorant of its occasion, and, reflecting his dismayed and horror-stricken visage, stared back again without venturing to question him; until old John Willet, in a fit of temporary insanity, made a dive at his cravat, and, seizing him by that portion of his dress, shook him to and fro until his very teeth appeared to rattle in his head.

"Tell us what's the matter, sir," said John, "or I'll kill you. Tell us what's the matter, sir, or in another second, I'll have your head under the biler. How dare you look like that? Is any body a following of you? What do you mean? Say something, or I'll be the death of you, I will."

Mr. Willet, in his frenzy, was so near keeping his word to the very letter (Solomon Daisy's eyes already beginning to roll in an alarming manner, and certain guttural sounds, as of a choking man, to issue from his throat,) that the two bystanders, recovering in some degree, plucked him off his victim by main force, and placed the little clerk of Chigwell in a chair. Directing a fearful gaze all round the room, he implored them in a faint voice to give him some drink; and above all to lock the house-door and close and bar the shutters of the room, without a moment's loss of time. The latter request did not tend to re-assure his hearers, or to fill them with the most comfortable sensations; they complied with it, however, with the greatest expedition; and having handed him a bumper of brandy-and-water, nearly boiling hot, waited to hear what he might have to tell them.

"Oh, Johnny," said Solomon, shaking him by the hand. "Oh, Parkes. Oh, Tommy Cobb. Why did I leave this house to-night! On the nineteenth of March—of all nights in the year, on the nineteenth of March!"

They all drew closer to the fire. Parkes, who was nearest to the door, started and looked over his shoulder. Mr. Willet, with great indignation, enquired what the devil he meant by that—and then said, "God forgive me," and glanced over his own shoulder, and came a little nearer.

"When I left here to-night," said Solomon Daisy, "I little thought what day of the month it was. I have never gone alone into the church after dark on this day, for seven-and-twenty years. I have heard it said that as we keep our birthdays when we are alive, so the ghosts of dead people, who are not easy in their graves, keep the day they died upon.—How the wind roars!"

Nobody spoke. All eyes were fastened on Solomon.

"I might have known," he said, "what night it was, by the foul weather. There's no such night in the whole year round as this is, always. I never sleep quietly in my bed on the nineteenth of March."

"Go on," said Tom Cobb, in a low voice. "Nor I neither."

Solomon Daisy raised his glass to his lips: put it down upon the floor with such a trembling hand that the spoon tinkled in it like a little bell; and continued thus:

"Have I ever said that we are always brought back to this subject in some strange way, when the nineteenth of this month comes round? Do you suppose it was by accident, I forgot to wind up the church-clock? I never forget it at any other time, though it's such a clumsy thing that it has to be wound up every day. Why should it escape my memory on this day of all others?

"I made as much haste down there as I could when I went from here, but I had to go home first for the keys; and the wind and rain being dead against me all the way, it was pretty well as much as I could do at times to keep my legs. I got there at last, opened the church-door, and went in. I had not met a soul all the way, and you may judge whether it was dull or not. Neither of you would bear me company. If you could have known what was to come, you'd have been in the right.

"The wind was so strong, that it was as much as I could do to shut the church-door by putting my whole weight against it; and even as it was, it burst wide open twice, with such strength that any of you would have sworn, if you had been leaning against it, as I was, that somebody was pushing on the other side. However, I got the key turned, went into the belfry, and wound up the clock—which was very near run down, and would have stood stock-still in half an hour.

"As I took up my lantern again to leave the church, it came upon me all at once that this was the nineteenth of March. It came upon me with a kind of shock, as if a hand had struck the thought upon my forehead; at the very same moment, I heard a voice outside the tower—rising from among the graves."

Here old John precipitately interrupted the speaker, and begged that if Mr. Parkes (who was seated opposite to him and was staring directly over his head) saw any thing, he would have the goodness to mention it. Mr. Parkes apologised, and remarked that he was only listening; to which Mr. Willet angrily retorted, that his listening with that kind of expression in his face was not agreeable, and that if he couldn't look like other people, he had better put his pocket-handkerchief over his head. Mr. Parkes with great submission pledged himself to do so, if again required, and John Willet turning to Solomon desired him to proceed. After waiting until a violent gust of wind and rain, which seemed to shake even that sturdy house to its foundation, had passed away, the little man complied:

"Never tell me that it was my fancy, or that it was any other sound which I mistook for that I tell you of. I heard the wind whistle through the arches of the church. I heard the steeple strain and creak. I heard the rain as it came driving against the walls. I felt the bells shake. I saw the ropes sway to and fro. And I heard that voice."

"What did it say?" asked Tom Cobb.

"I don't know what; I don't know that it spoke. It gave a kind of cry, as any one of us might do, if something dreadful followed us in a dream, and came upon us unawares; and then it died off: seeming to pass quite round the church."

"I don't see much in that," said John, drawing a long breath, and looking round him like a man who felt relieved.

"Perhaps not," returned his friend, "but that's not all."

"What more do you mean to say, sir, is to come?" asked John, pausing in the act of wiping his face upon his apron. "What are you going to tell us of next?"

"What I saw."

"Saw!" echoed all three, bending forward.

"When I opened the church-door to come out," said the little man, with an expression of face which bore ample testimony to the sincerity of his conviction, "when I opened the church-door to come out, which I did suddenly, for I wanted to get it shut again before another gust of wind came up, there crossed me—so close that by stretching out my finger I could have touched it—something in the likeness of a man. It was bare-headed to the storm. It turned its face without stopping, and fixed its eyes on mine. It was a ghost—a spirit."

"Whose?" they all three cried together.

In the excess of his emotion (for he fell back trembling in his chair, and waved his hand as if entreating them to question him no further,) his answer was lost on all but old John Willet, who happened to be seated close beside him.

"Who?" cried Parkes and Tom Cobb, looking eagerly by turns at Solomon Daisy and at Mr. Willet. "Who was it?"

"Gentlemen," said Mr. Willet, after a long pause, "you needn't ask. The likeness of a murdered man. This is the nineteenth of March."

A profound silence ensued.

"If you'll take my advice," said John, "we had better, one and all, keep this a secret. Such tales would not be liked at the Warren. Let us keep it to ourselves for the present time at all events, or we may get into trouble, and Solomon may lose his place. Whether it was really as he says, or whether it wasn't, is no matter. Right or wrong, nobody would believe him. As to the probabilities, I don't myself think," said Mr. Willet, eyeing the corners of the room in a manner which showed that, like some other philosophers, he was not quite easy in his theory, "that a ghost as had been a man of sense in his lifetime, would be out a-walking in such weather—I only know that I wouldn't, if I was one."

But this heretical doctrine was strongly opposed by the other three, who quoted a great many precedents to show that bad weather was the very time for such appearances; and Mr. Parkes, (who had had a ghost in his family, by the mother's side,) argued the matter with so much ingenuity and force of illustration, that John was only saved from having to retract his opinion by the opportune appearance of supper, to which they applied themselves with a dreadful relish. Even Solomon Daisy himself, by dint of the elevating influences of fire, lights, brandy, and good company, so far recovered as to handle his knife and fork in a highly creditable manner, and to display a capacity both of eating and drinking, such as banished all fear of his having sustained any lasting injury from his fright.

Supper done, they crowded round the fire again, and, as is common on such occasions, propounded all manner of leading questions calculated to surround the story with new horrors and surprises. But Solomon Daisy, notwithstanding these temptations, adhered so steadily to his original account, and repeated it so often, with such slight variations, and with such solemn asseverations of its truth and reality, that his hearers were (with good reason) more astonished than at first. As he took John Willet's view of the matter in regard to the propriety of not bruiting the tale abroad, unless the spirit should appear to him again, in which case it would be necessary to take immediate counsel with the clergyman, it was solemnly resolved that it should be hushed up and kept quiet. And as most men like to have a secret to tell which may exalt their own importance, they arrived at this conclusion with perfect unanimity.

As it was by this time growing late, and was long past their usual hour of separating, the cronies parted for the night. Solomon Daisy, with a fresh candle in his lantern, repaired homewards under the escort of Long Phil Parkes and Mr. Cobb, who were rather more nervous than himself. Mr. Willet, after seeing them to the door, returned to collect his thoughts with the assistance of the boiler, and to listen to the storm of wind and rain, which had not yet abated one jot of its fury.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-FOURTH.

Before old John had looked at the boiler quite twenty minutes, he got his ideas into a focus, and brought them to bear on Solomon Daisy's story. The more he thought of it, the more impressed he became with a sense of his own wisdom, and a desire that Mr. Haredale should be impressed with it likewise. At length, to the end that he might sustain a principal and important character in the affair; and might have the start of Solomon and his two friends, through whose means he knew the adventure, with a variety of exaggerations, would be known to at least a score of people, and most likely to Mr. Haredale himself, by breakfast-time to-morrow; he determined to repair to the Warren before going to bed.

"He's my landlord," thought John, as he took a candle in his hand, and setting it down in a corner out of the wind's way, opened a casement in the rear of the house, looking towards the stables. "We haven't met of late years so often as we used to do—changes are taking place in the family—it's desirable that I should stand as well with them, in point of dignity, as possible—the whispering about of this here tale will anger him—it's good to have confidences with a gentleman of his natur', and set one's-self right besides. Halloa there! Hugh—Hugh. Hal-loa!"

When he had repeated this shout a dozen times, and startled every pigeon from its slumbers, a door in one of the ruinous old buildings opened, and a rough voice demanded what was amiss now, that a man couldn't even have his sleep in quiet.

"What! Haven't you sleep enough, growler, that you're not to be knocked up for once?" said John.

"No," replied the voice, as the speaker yawned and shook himself. "Not half enough."

"I don't know how you can sleep, with the wind a bellowing and roaring about you, making the tiles fly like a pack of cards," said John; "but no matter for that. Wrap yourself up in something or another, and come here, for you must go as far as the Warren with me. And look sharp about it."

Hugh, with much low growling and muttering, went back into his lair; and presently reappeared, carrying a lantern and a cudgel, and enveloped from head to foot in an old, frowsy, slouching horse-cloth. Mr. Willet received this figure at the back door, and ushered him into the bar, while he wrapt himself in sundry great-coats and capes, and so tied and knotted his face in shawls and handkerchiefs, that how he breathed was a mystery.

"You don't take a man out of doors at near midnight in such weather, without putting some heart into him, do you, master?" said Hugh.

"Yes I do, sir," returned Mr. Willet. "I put the heart (as you call it) into him when he has brought me safe home again, and his standing steady on his legs an't of so much consequence. So hold that light up, if you please, and go on a step or two before, to show the way."

Hugh obeyed with a very indifferent grace, and a longing glance at the bottles. Old John, laying strict injunctions on his cook to keep the doors locked in his absence, and to open to nobody but himself on pain of dismissal, followed him into the blustering darkness out of doors.

The way was wet and dismal, and the night so black, that if Mr. Willet had been his own pilot, he would have walked into a deep horsepond within a few hundred yards of his own house, and would certainly have terminated his career in that ignoble sphere of action. But Hugh, who had a sight as keen as any hawk's, and, apart from that endowment, could have found his way blindfold to any place within a dozen miles, dragged old John along, quite deaf to his remonstrances, and took his own course without the slightest reference to, or notice of, his master. So they made head against the wind as they best could; Hugh crushing the wet grass beneath his heavy tread, and stalking on after his ordinary savage fashion; John Willet following at arm's length, picking his steps, and looking about him, now for bogs and ditches, and now for such stray ghosts as might be wandering abroad, with looks of as much dismay and uneasiness as his immovable face was capable of expressing.

At length they stood upon the broad gravel-walk before the Warren-house. The building was profoundly dark, and none were moving near it save themselves. From one solitary turret-chamber, however, there shone a ray of light; and towards this speck of comfort in the cold, cheerless, silent scene, Mr. Willet bade his pilot lead him.

"The old room," said John, looking timidly upward; "Mr. Reuben's own apartment, God be with us! I wonder his brother likes to sit there, so late at night—on this night too."

"Why, where else should he sit?" asked Hugh, holding the lantern to his breast, to keep the candle from the wind, while he trimmed it with his fingers. "It's snug enough, an't it?"

"Snug!" said John indignantly. "You have a comfortable idea of snugness, you have, sir. Do you know what was done in that room, you ruffian?"

"Why, what is it the worse for that?" cried Hugh, looking into John's fat face. "Does it keep out the rain, and snow, and wind, the less for that? Is it less warm or dry, because a man was killed there? Ha, ha, ha! Never believe it, master. One man's no such matter as that comes to."

Mr. Willet fixed his dull eyes on his follower, and began—by a species of inspiration—to think it just barely possible that he was something of a dangerous character, and that it might be advisable to get rid of him one of these days. He was too prudent to say any thing, with the journey home before him; and therefore turned to the iron gate before which this brief dialogue had passed, and pulled the handle of the bell that hung beside it. The turret at which the light appeared being at one corner of the building, and only divided from the path by one of the garden-walks, upon which this gate opened, Mr. Haredale threw up the window directly, and demanded who was there.

"Begging pardon, sir," said John, "I knew you sat up late, and made bold to come round, having a word to say to you."

"Willet—is it not?"

"Of the Maypole—at your service, sir."

Mr. Haredale closed the window, and withdrew. He presently appeared at a door in the bottom of the turret, and coming across the garden-walk, unlocked the gate and let them in.

"You are a late visiter, Willet. What is the matter?"

"Nothing to speak of, sir," said John; "an idle tale, I thought you ought to know of; nothing more."

"Let your man go forward with the lantern, and give me your hand. The stairs are crooked and narrow.—Gently with your light, friend. You swing it like a censer."

Hugh, who had already reached the turret, held it more steadily, and ascended first, turning round from time to time to shed his light downward on the steps. Mr. Haredale following next, eyed his lowering face with no great favour; and Hugh, looking down on him, returned his glances with interest, as they climbed the winding stair.

It terminated in a little ante-room adjoining that from which they had seen the light. Mr. Haredale entered first, and led the way through it into the latter chamber, where he seated himself at a writing table from which he had risen when they rang the bell.

"Come in," he said, beckoning to old John, who remaining bowing at the door. "Not you, friend," he added hastily to Hugh, who entered also. "Willet, why do you bring that fellow here?"

"Why, sir," returned John, elevating his eyebrows, and lowering his voice to the tone in which the question had been asked him, "he's a good guard, you see."

"Don't be too sure of that," said Mr. Haredale, looking towards him as he spoke. "I doubt it. He has an evil eye."

"There's no imagination in his eye, returned Mr. Willet, glancing over his shoulder at the organ in question, "certainly."

"There is no good there, be assured," said Mr. Haredale. "Wait in that little room, friend, and close the door between us."

Hugh shrugged his shoulders, and with a disdainful look, which showed, either that he had overheard, or that he guessed the purport of their whispering, did as he was told. When he was shut out, Mr. Haredale turned to John, and bade him go on with what he had to say, but not to speak too loud, for there were quick ears yonder.

Thus cautioned, Mr. Willet, in an oily whisper, recited all that he had heard and said that night; laying particular stress upon his own sagacity, upon his great regard for the family, and upon his solicitude for their peace of mind and happiness. The story moved his auditor much more than he had expected. Mr. Haredale often changed his attitude, rose and paced the room, returned again, desired him to repeat, as nearly as he could, the very words that Solomon had used, and gave so many other signs of being disturbed and ill at ease, that even Mr. Willet was surprised.

"You did quite right," he said, at the end of a long conversation, "to bid them keep this story secret. It is a foolish fancy upon the part of this weak-brained man, bred in his fears and superstition. But Miss Haredale, though she would know it to be so, would be disturbed by it if it reached her ears; it is too nearly connected with a subject very painful to us all, to be heard with indifference. You were most prudent, and have laid me under a great obligation. I thank you very much."

This was equal to John's most sanguine expectations; but he would have preferred Mr. Haredale's looking at him when he spoke, as if he really did thank him, to his walking up and down, speaking by fits and starts, often stopping with his eyes fixed on the ground, moving hurriedly on again, like one distracted, and seeming almost unconscious of what he said or did.

This, however, was his manner; and it was so embarrassing to John that he sat quite passive for a long time, not knowing what to do. At length he rose. Mr. Haredale stared at him for a moment as though he had quite forgotten his being present, then shook hands with him, and opened the door. Hugh, who was, or feigned to be, fast asleep on the ante-chamber floor, sprang up on their entrance, and throwing his cloak about him, grasped his stick and lantern, and prepared to descend the stairs.

"Stay," said Mr. Haredale. "Will this man drink?"

"Drink! He'd drink the Thames up, if it was strong enough, sir," replied John Willet. "He'll have something when he gets home. He's better without it, now, sir."

"Nay. Half the distance is done;" said Hugh. "What a hard master you are! I shall go home the better for one glassful, half-way. Come!"

As John made no reply, Mr. Haredale brought out a glass of liquor, and gave it to Hugh, who, as he took it in his hand, threw part of it upon the floor.

"What do you mean by splashing your drink about a gentleman's house, sir?" said John.

"I'm drinking a toast," Hugh rejoined, holding the glass above his head, and fixing his eyes on Mr. Haredale's face; "a toast to this house and its master." With that he muttered something to himself, and drank the rest, and setting down the glass, preceded them without another word.

John was a good deal scandalised by this observance, but seeing that Mr. Haredale took little heed of what Hugh said or did, and that his thoughts were otherwise employed, he offered no apology, and went in silence down the stairs, across the walk, and through the garden-gate. They stopped upon the outer side for Hugh to hold the light while Mr. Haredale locked it on the inner; and then John saw with wonder (as he often afterwards related,) that he was very pale, and that his face had changed so much and grown so haggard since their entrance, that he almost seemed another man.

They were in the open road again, and John Willet was walking on behind his escort, as he had come, thinking very steadily of what he had just now seen, when Hugh drew him suddenly aside, and almost at the same instant three horsemen swept past—the nearest brushed his shoulder even then—who, checking their steeds as suddenly as they could, stood still, and waited for their coming up.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-FIFTH.

When John Willet saw that the horsemen wheeled smartly round, and drew up three abreast in the narrow road, waiting for him and his man to join them, it occurred to him with unusual precipitation that they must be highwaymen; and had Hugh been armed with a blunderbuss, in place of his stout cudgel, he would certainly have ordered him to fire it off at a venture, and would, while the word of command was obeyed, have consulted his own personal safety in immediate flight. Under the circumstances of disadvantage, however, in which he and his guard were placed, he deemed it prudent to adopt a different style of generalship, and therefore whispered his attendant to address them in the most peaceable and courteous terms. By way of acting up to the spirit and letter of this instruction, Hugh stepped forward, and flourishing his staff before the eyes of the rider nearest to him, demanded roughly what he and his fellows meant by so nearly galloping over them, and why they scoured the king's highway at that late hour of night.

The man whom he addressed was beginning an angry reply in the same strain, when he was checked by the horseman in the centre, who, interposing with an air of authority, enquired in a somewhat loud but not harsh or unpleasant voice:

"Pray, is this London road?"

"If you follow it right, it is," replied Hugh, roughly.

"Nay, brother," said the same person, "you're but a churlish Englishman, if Englishman you be—which I should much doubt but for your tongue. Your companion, I am sure, will answer more civilly. How say you, friend?"

"I say it is the London road, sir," answered John. "And I wish," he added in a subdued voice, as he turned to Hugh, "that you was in any other road, you vagabond. Are you tired of your life, sir, that you go a trying to provoke three great neck-or-nothing chaps, that could keep on running over us, back'ards and for'ards, till we was dead, and then take our bodies up behind 'em, and drown us ten miles off?"

"How far is it to London?" enquired the same speaker.

"Why, from here, sir," answered John, persuasively, "it's thirteen very easy mile."

The adjective was thrown in, as an inducement to the travellers to ride away with all speed; but instead of having the desired effect, it elicited from the same person, the remark, "Thirteen miles!" That's a long distance!" which was followed by a short pause of indecision.

"Pray," said the gentleman, "are there any inns hereabouts?"

At the word "inns," John plucked up his spirit in a surprising manner; his fears rolled off like smoke; all the landlord stirred within him.

"There are no inns," rejoined Mr. Willet, with a strong emphasis on the plural number; "but there's an Inn—one Inn—the Maypole Inn. That's an Inn indeed. You won't see the like of that Inn often."

"You keep it, perhaps?" said the horseman, smiling.

"I do, sir," replied John, greatly wondering how he had found this out.

"And how far is the Maypole from here?"

"About a mile"—John was going to add that it was the easiest mile in all the world, when the third rider, who had hitherto kept a little in the rear, suddenly interposed:

"And have you one excellent bed, landlord? Hem! A bed that you can recommend—a bed that you are sure is well aired—a bed that has been slept in by some perfectly respectable and unexceptionable person?

"We don't take in no tagrag and bobtail at our house, sir," answered John. "And as to the bed itself—"

"Say, as to three beds," interposed the gentleman who had spoken before; "for we shall want three if we stay, though my friend only speaks of one."

"No, no, my lord; you are too good, you are too kind; but your life is of far too much importance to the nation in these portentous times, to be placed upon a level with one so useless and so poor as mine. A great cause, my lord, a mighty cause, depends on you. You are its leader and its champion, its advance guard and its van. It is the cause of our altars and our homes, our country and our faith. Let me sleep on a chair—the carpet—any where. No one will repine if I take cold or fever. Let John Grueby pass the night beneath the open sky—no one will repine for him. But forty thousand men of this our island in the wave (exclusive of women and children) rivet their eyes and thoughts on Lord George Gordon; and every day, from the rising up of the sun to the going down of the same, pray for his health and vigour. "My lord," said the speaker, rising in his stirrups, "it is a glorious cause, and must not be forgotten. My lord, it is a mighty cause, and must not be endangered. My lord, it is a holy cause, and must not be deserted."

"It is a holy cause," exclaimed his lordship, lifting up his hat with great solemnity. "Amen!"

"John Grueby," said the long-winded gentleman, in a tone of mild reproof, "his lordship said Amen!"

"I heard my lord, sir," said the man, sitting like a statue on his horse.

"And do not you say amen likewise?"

To which John Grueby made no reply at all, but sat looking straight before him.

"You surprise me, Grueby," said the gentleman. "At a crisis like the present, when Queen Elizabeth, that maiden monarch, weeps within her tomb, and Bloody Mary, with a brow of gloom and shadow, stalks triumphant—"

"Oh, sir," cried the man, gruffly, "where's the use of talking of Bloody Mary, under such circumstances as the present, when my lord's wet through and tired with hard riding? Let's either go on to London, sir, or put up at once; or that unfort'nate Bloody Mary will have more to answer for—and she's done a deal more harm in her grave than she ever did in her lifetime, I believe."

By this time Mr. Willet, who had never heard so many words spoken together at one time, or delivered with such volubility and emphasis as by the long-winded gentleman; and whose brain, being wholly unable to sustain or compass them, had quite given itself up for lost; recovered so far as to observe that there was ample accommodation at the Maypole for all the party: good beds; neat wines; excellent entertainment for man and beast; private rooms for large or small parties; dinners dressed upon the shortest notice; choice stabling, and a lock-up coach-house: and, in short, to run over such recommendatory scraps of language as were painted up on various portions of the building, and which, in the course of some forty years, he had learnt to repeat with tolerable correctness. He was considering whether it was at all possible to insert any novel sentences to the same purpose, when the gentleman who had spoken first, turning to him of the long wind, exclaimed, "What say you, Gashford? Shall we tarry at this house he speaks of, or press forward? You shall decide."

"I would submit, my lord, then," returned the person he appealed to, in a silky tone, "that your health and spirits—so important, under Providence, to our great cause, our pure and truthful cause"—here his lordship pulled off his hat again, though it was raining hard—"require refreshment and repose."

"Go on before, landlord, and show the way," said Lord George Gordon; "we will follow at a footpace."

"If you'll give me leave, my lord," said John Grueby, in a low voice, "I'll change my proper place, and ride before you. The looks of the landlord's friend are not over honest, and it may be as well to be cautious with him."

"John Grueby is quite right," interposed Mr. Gashford, falling back hastily. "My lord, a life so precious as yours must not be put in peril. Go forward, John, by all means. If you have any reason to suspect the fellow, blow his brains out."

John made no answer, but looking straight before him, as his custom seemed to be when the secretary spoke, bade Hugh push on, and followed close behind him. Then came his lordship, with Mr. Willet at his bridle-rein; and, last of all, his lordship's secretary—for that, it seemed, was Gashford's office.

Hugh strode briskly on, often looking back at the servant, whose horse was close upon his heels, and glancing with a leer at his holster case of pistols, by which he seemed to set great store. He was a square-built, strong-made, bull-necked fellow, of the true English breed; and as Hugh measured him with his eye, he measured Hugh, regarding him meanwhile with a look of bluff disdain. He was much older than the Maypole man, being to all appearance five-and-forty; but was one of those self-possessed, hard-headed, imperturbable fellows, who, if they ever are beat at fisty-cuffs, or other kind of warfare, never know it, and go on coolly till they win.

"If I led you wrong now," said Hugh, tauntingly, "you'd—ha, ha, ha, ha!—you'd shoot me through the head, I suppose."

John Grueby took no more notice of this remark than if he had been deaf and Hugh dumb; but kept riding on, quite comfortably, with his eyes fixed on the horizon.

"Did you ever try a fall with a man when you were young, master?" said Hugh. "Can you make any play at single-stick?"

John Grueby looked at him sideways with the same contented air, but deigned not a word in answer.

"—Like this!" said Hugh, giving his cudgel one of those skilful flourishes, in which the rustic of that time delighted. "Whoop!"

"—Or that," returned John Grueby, beating down his guard with his whip, and striking him on the head with its butt end. "Yes, I played a little once. You wear your hair too long; I should have cracked your crown if it had been a little shorter."

It was a pretty smart, loud-sounding rap, as it was, and evidently astonished Hugh; who, for the moment, seemed disposed to drag his new acquaintance from his saddle. But his face betokening neither malice, triumph, rage, nor any lingering idea that he had given him offence; his eyes gazing steadily in the old direction, and his manner being as careless and composed as if he had merely brushed away a fly; Hugh was so puzzled, and so disposed to look upon him as a customer of almost supernatural toughness, that he merely laughed, and cried "Well done!" then sheering off a little, led the way in silence.

Before the lapse of many minutes the party halted at the Maypole door. Lord George and his secretary quickly dismounting, gave their horses to their servant, who, under the guidance of Hugh, repaired to the stables. Right glad to escape from the inclemency of the night, they followed Mr. Willet into the common room, and stood warming themselves and drying their clothes before the cheerful fire, while he busied himself with such orders and preparations as his guest's high quality required.

As he bustled in and out of the room, intent on these arrangements, he had an opportunity of observing the two travellers, of whom, as yet, he knew nothing but the voice. The Lord, the great personage, who did the Maypole so much honour, was about the middle height, of a slender make, and sallow complexion, with an aquiline nose, and long hair of a reddish brown, combed perfectly straight and smooth about his ears, and slightly powdered, but without the faintest vestige of a curl. He was attired, under his great-coat, in a full suit of black, quite free from any ornament, and of the most precise and sober cut. The gravity of his dress, together with a certain lankness of cheek and stiffness of deportment, added nearly ten years to his age, but his figure was that of one not yet past thirty. As he stood musing in the red glow of the fire, it was striking to observe his very bright large eye, which betrayed a restlessness of thought and purpose, singularly at variance with the studied composure and sobriety of his mien, and with his quaint and sad apparel. It had nothing harsh or cruel in its expression; neither had his face, which was thin and mild, and wore an air of melancholy; but it was suggestive of an indefinable uneasiness, which infected those who looked upon him, and filled them with a kind of pity for the man: though why it did so, they would have had some trouble to explain.

Gashford, the secretary, was taller, angularly made, high-shouldered, bony, and ungraceful. His dress, in imitation of his superior, was demure and staid in the extreme; his manner, formal and constrained. This gentleman had an overhanging brow, great hands and feet and ears, and a pair of eyes that seemed to have made an unnatural retreat into his head, and to have dug themselves a cave to hide in. His manner was smooth and humble, but very sly and slinking. He wore the aspect of a man who was always lying in wait for something that wouldn't come to pass; but he looked patient—very patient—and fawned like a spaniel dog. Even now, while he warmed and rubbed his hands before the blaze, he had the air of one who only presumed to enjoy it in his degree as a commoner; and though he knew his lord was not regarding him, he looked into his face from time to time, and with a meek and deferential manner, smiled as if for practice.

Such were the guests whom old John Willet, with a fixed and leaden eye, surveyed a hundred times, and to whom he now advanced with a state candlestick in each hand, beseeching them to follow him into a worthier chamber. "For, my lord," said John—it is odd enough, but certain people seem to have as great a pleasure in pronouncing titles as their owners have in wearing them—"this room, my lord, isn't at all the sort of place for your lordship, and I have to beg your lordship's pardon for keeping you here, my lord, one minute."

With this address, John ushered them up stairs into the state apartment, which, like many other things of state, was cold and comfortless. Their own footsteps, reverberating through the spacious room, struck upon their hearing with a hollow sound; and its damp and chilly atmosphere was rendered doubly cheerless by contrast with the homely warmth they had deserted.

It was of no use, however, to propose a return to the place they had quitted, for the preparations went on so briskly, that there was no time to stop them. John, with the tall candlesticks in his hands, bowed them up to the fire-place; Hugh striding in with a lighted brand and pile of fire-wood, cast it down upon the hearth, and set it in a blaze; John Grueby (who had a great blue cockade in his hat, which he appeared to despise mightily) brought in the portmanteau he had carried on his horse, and placed it on the floor; and presently all three were busily engaged in drawing out the screen, laying the cloth, inspecting the beds, lighting fires in the bedrooms, expediting the supper, and making every thing as cosy, and as snug as might be, on so short a notice. In less than an hour's time, supper had been served, and ate, and cleared away; and Lord George and his secretary, with slippered feet, and legs stretched out before the fire, sat over some hot mulled wine together.

"So ends, my lord," said Gashford, filling his glass with great complacency, "the blessed work of a most blessed day."

"And of a blessed yesterday," said his lordship, raising his head.

"Ah!"—and here the secretary clasped his hands—"a blessed yesterday indeed! The Protestants of Suffolk are godly men and true. Though others of our country have lost their way in darkness, even as we, my lord, did lose our road to-night, theirs is the light and glory."

"Did I move them, Gashford!" said Lord George.

"Move them, my lord! Move them! They cried to be led on against the Papists, they vowed a dreadful vengeance on their heads, they roared like men possessed—"

"But not by devils," said his lord.

"By devils! my lord! By angels."

"Yes—oh surely—by angels, no doubt," said Lord George, thrusting his hands into his pockets, taking them out again to bite his nails, and looking uncomfortably at the fire. "Of course by angels—eh, Gashford?"

"You do not doubt it, my lord?" said the secretary.

"No—no," returned his lord. "No—Why should I? I suppose it would be decidedly irreligious to doubt it—wouldn't it, Gashford? Though there certainly were," he added, without waiting for an answer, "some plaguy ill-looking characters among them."

"When you warmed," said the secretary, looking sharply at the other's downcast eyes, which brightened slowly as he spoke; "when you warmed into that noble outbreak: when you told them that you were never of the lukewarm or the timid tribe, and bade them take heed that they were prepared to follow one who would lead them on, though to the very death; when you spoke of a hundred and twenty thousand men across the Scottish border who would take their own redress at any time, if it were not conceded; when you cried 'Perish the Pope and all his base adherents; the penal laws against them shall never be repealed while Englishmen have hearts and hands'—and waved your own and touched your sword; and when they cried 'No Popery!' and you cried 'No; not even if we wade in blood,' and they threw up their hats and cried 'Hurrah! not even if we wade in blood; No Popery! Lord George! Down with the Papists—Vengeance on their heads:' when this was said and done, and a word from you, my lord, could raise or still the tumult—ah! then I felt what greatness was indeed, and thought, When was there ever power like this of Lord George Gordon's!"

"It's a great power. You're right. It is a great power!" he cried with sparkling eyes. "But—dear Gashford—did I really say all that?"

"And how much more!" cried the secretary, looking upwards. "Ah! how much more!"

"And I told them what you say, about the one hundred and forty thousand men in Scotland, did I!" he asked with evident delight. "That was bold."

"Our cause is boldness. Truth is always bold."

"Certainly. So is religion. She's bold, Gashford?"

"The true religion is, my lord."

"And that's ours," he rejoined, moving uneasily in his seat, and biting his nails as though he would pare them to the quick. "There can be no doubt of ours being the true one. You feel as certain of that as I do, Gashford, don't you?"

"Does my lord ask me," whined Gashford, drawing his chair nearer with an injured air, and laying his broad flat hand upon the table; "me," he repeated, bending the dark hollows of his eyes upon him with an unwholesome smile, "who, stricken by the magic of his eloquence in Scotland but a year ago, abjured the errors of the Romish church, and clung to him as one whose timely hand had plucked me from a pit?"

"True. No—No. I—I didn't mean it," replied the other, shaking him by the hand, rising from his seat, and pacing restlessly about the room. "It's a proud thing to lead the people, Gashford," he added as he made a sudden halt.

"By force of reason, too," returned the pliant secretary.

"Ay, to be sure. They may cough, and jeer, and groan in Parliament, and call me fool and madman; but which of them can raise this human sea and make it swell and roar at pleasure? Not one."

"Not one," repeated Gashford.

"Which of them can say for his honesty, what I can say for mine; which of them has refused a minister's bribe of one thousand pounds a year to resign his seat in favour of another? Not one."

"Not one" repeated Gashford again—taking the lion's share of the mulled wine between whiles.

"And as we are honest, true, and in a sacred cause, Gashford," said Lord George with a heightened colour and in a louder voice, as he laid his fevered hand upon his shoulder, "and are the only men who regard the mass of people out of doors, or are regarded by them, we will uphold them to the last; and will raise a cry against these un-English Papists which shall re-echo through the country, and roll with a noise like thunder. I will be worthy of the motto on my coat of arms, 'Called and chosen and faithful.'"

"Called," said the secretary, "by Heaven."

"I am."

"Chosen by the people."

"Yes."

"Faithful to both."

"To the block!"

It would be difficult to convey an adequate idea of the excited manner in which he gave these answers to the secretary's promptings; of the rapidity of his utterance, or of the violence of his tone and gesture; in which, struggling through his Puritan's demeanour, was something wild and ungovernable which broke through all restraint. For some minutes he walked rapidly up and down the room, then stopping suddenly, exclaimed,

"Gashford—You moved them yesterday too. Oh yes! You did."

"I shone with a reflected light, my lord," replied the humble secretary, laying his hand upon his heart. "I did my best."

"You did well," said his master, "and are a great and worthy instrument. If you will ring for John Grueby to carry the portmanteau into my room, and will wait here while I undress, we will dispose of business as usual, if you're not too tired."

"Too tired, my lord!—But this is his consideration! Christian from head to foot." With which soliloquy, the secretary tilted the jug, and looked very hard into the mulled wine, to see how much remained.

John Willet and John Grueby appeared together. The one bearing the great candlesticks, and the other the portmanteau, showed the deluded lord into his chamber; and left the secretary alone, to yawn and shake himself, and finally to fall asleep before the fire.

"Now Mr. Gashford sir," said John Grueby in his ear, after what appeared to him a moment of unconsciousness; "my lord's abed."

"Oh. Very good, John," was his mild reply. "Thank you, John. Nobody need sit up. I know my room."

"I hope you're not a going to trouble your head to-night, or my lord's head neither, with anything more about Bloody Mary," said John. "I wish the blessed old creetur had never been born."

"I said you might go to bed, John," returned the secretary. "You didn't hear me, I think."

"Between Bloody Marys, and blue cockades, and glorious Queen Besses, and no Poperys, and Protestant associations, and making of speeches," pursued John Grueby, looking, as usual, a long way off, and taking no notice of this hint, "my lord's half off his head. When we go out o' doors, such a set of ragamuffins comes a shouting after us 'Gordon for ever!' that I'm ashamed of myself and don't know where to look. When we're indoors, they come a roaring and screaming about the house like so many devils: and my lord, instead of ordering them to be drove away, goes out into the balcony and demeans himself by making speeches to 'em, and calls 'em 'Men of England,' and 'Fellow-countrymen,' as if he was fond of 'em and thanked 'em for coming. I can't make it out, but they're all mixed up somehow or another with that unfort'nate Bloody Mary, and call her name out till they're hoarse. They're all Protestants too—every man and boy among 'em: and Protestants is very fond of spoons I find, and silver plate in general, whenever area-gates is left open accidentally. I wish that was the worst of it, and that no more harm might be to come; but if you don't stop these ugly customers in time, Mr. Gashford, (and I know you; you're the man that blows the fire) you'll find 'em grow a little bit too strong for you. One of these evenings, when the weather gets warmer and Protestants are thirsty, they'll be pulling London down,—and I never heerd that Bloody Mary went as far as that."

Gashford had vanished long ago, and these remarks had been bestowed on empty air. Not at all discomposed by the discovery, John Grueby fixed his hat on, wrong side foremost, that he might be unconscious of the shadow of the obnoxious cockade, and withdrew to bed; shaking his head in a very gloomy and prophetic manner until he reached his chamber.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SIXTH.

Gashford, with a smiling face, but still with looks of profound deference and humility, betook himself towards his master's room, smoothing his hair down as he went, and humming a psalm tune. As he approached Lord George's door, he cleared his throat and hummed more vigorously.

There was a remarkable contrast between this man's occupation at the moment, and the expression of his countenance, which was singularly repulsive and malicious. His beetling brow almost obscured his eyes; his lip was curled contemptuously; his very shoulders seemed to sneer in stealthy whisperings with his great flapped ears.

"Hush!" he muttered softly, as he peeped in at the chamber-door. "He seems to be asleep. Pray Heaven, he is! Too much watching, too much care, too much thought—ah! Lord preserve him for a martyr! He is a saint, if ever saint drew breath on this bad earth."

Placing his light upon a table, he walked on tiptoe to the fire, and sitting in a chair before it with his back towards the bed, went on communing with himself like one who thought aloud:

"The saviour of his country and his country's religion, the friend of his poor countrymen, the enemy of the proud and harsh; beloved of the rejected and oppressed, adored by forty thousand bold and loyal English hearts—what happy slumbers his should be!" And here he sighed, and warmed his hands, and shook his head as men do when their hearts are full, and heaved another sigh, and warmed his hands again.

"Why, Gashford!" said Lord George, who was lying broad awake, upon his side, and had been staring at him from his entrance.

"My—my lord," said Gashford, starting and looking round as though in great surprise. "I have disturbed you!"

"I have not been sleeping."

"Not sleeping!" he repeated, with assumed confusion. "What can I say for having in your presence given utterance to thoughts—but they were sincere—they were sincere!" exclaimed the secretary, drawing his sleeve in a hasty way across his eyes; "and why should I regret your having heard them?"

"Gashford," said the poor lord, stretching out his hand with manifest emotion. "Do not regret it. You love me well, I know—too well. I don't deserve such homage."

Gashford made no reply, but grasped the hand and pressed it to his lips. Then rising, and taking from the trunk a little desk, he placed it on a table near the fire, unlocked it with a key he carried in his pocket, sat down before it, took out a pen, and before dipping it in the inkstand, sucked it—to compose the fashion of his mouth perhaps, on which a smile was hovering yet.

"How do our numbers stand since last enrolling-night?" inquired Lord George. "Are we really forty thousand strong, or do we still speak in round numbers when we take the Association at that amount?"

"Our total now exceeds that number by a score and three," Gashford replied, casting his eyes upon his papers.

"The funds?"

"Not very improving; but there is some manna in the wilderness, my lord. Hem! On Friday night the widows' mites dropped in. 'Forty scavengers, three and fourpence. An aged pew-opener of St. Martin's parish, sixpence. A bell-ringer of the established church, sixpence. A Protestant infant, newly born, one half-penny. The United Link Boys, three shillings—one bad. The anti-popish prisoners in Newgate, five and fourpence. A friend in Bedlam, half-a-crown. Dennis the hangman, one shilling.'"

"That Dennis," said his lordship, "is an earnest man. I marked him in the crowd in Welbeck Street, last Friday."

"A good man," rejoined the secretary; "a staunch, sincere, and truly zealous man."

"He should be encouraged," said Lord George. "Make a note of Dennis. I'll talk with him."

Gashford obeyed, and went on reading from his list:

"'The Friends of Reason, half-a-guinea. The Friends of Liberty, half-a-guinea. The Friends of Peace, half-a-guinea. The Friends of Charity, half-a-guinea. The Friends of Mercy, half-a-guinea. The Associated Rememberers of Bloody Mary, half-a-guinea. The United Bull-Dogs, half-a-guinea.'"

"The United Bull-Dogs," said Lord George, biting his nails most horribly, "are a new society, are they not?"

"Formerly the 'Prentice Knights, my lord. The indentures of the old members expiring by degrees, they changed their name, it seems, though they still have 'prentices among them, as well as workmen."

"What is their president's name?" enquired Lord George.

"President," said Gashford, reading, "Mr. Simon Tappert[illegible]"

"I remember him. The little man, who sometimes brings an elderly sister to our meetings, and sometimes another female too, who is conscientious, I have no doubt, but not well-favoured?"

"The very same, my lord."

"Tappertit is an earnest man," said Lord George, thoughtfully. "Eh, Gashford?"

"One of the foremost among them all, my lord. He snuffs the battle from afar, like the war-horse. He throws his hat up in the street as if he were inspired, and makes most stirring speeches from the shoulders of his friends."

"Make a note of Tappertit," said Lord George Gordon. "We may advance him to a place of trust."

"That," rejoined the secretary, doing as he was told, "is all—except Mrs. Varden's box (fourteenth time of opening), seven shillings and sixpence in silver and copper, and half-a-guinea in gold; and Miggs (being the saving of a quarter's wages), one-and-threepence."

"Miggs," said Lord George. "Is that a man?"

"The name is entered on the list as a woman," replied the secretary. "I think she is the tall spare female of whom you spoke just now, my lord, as not being well-favoured, who sometimes comes to hear the speeches—along with Tappertit and Mrs. Varden."

"Mrs. Varden is the elderly lady then, is she!"

The secretary nodded, and rubbed the bridge of his nose with the feather of his pen.

"She is a zealous sister," said Lord George "Her collection goes on prosperously, and is pursued with fervour. Has her husband joined?"

"A malignant," returned the secretary, folding up his papers. "Unworthy such a wife. He remains in outer darkness, and steadily refuses."

"The consequences be upon his own head!—Gashford!"

"My lord!"

"You don't think," he turned restlessly in his bed as he spoke, "these people will desert me, when the hour arrives? I have spoken boldly for them, ventured much, suppressed nothing. They'll not fall off, will they?"

"No fear of that, my lord," said Gashford, with a meaning look, which was rather the involuntary expression of his own thoughts than intended as any confirmation of his words, for the other's face was turned away. "Be sure there is no fear of that."

"Nor," he said with a more restless motion than before, "of their—but they can sustain no harm from leaguing for this purpose. Right is on our side, though Might may be against us. You feel as sure of that as I—honestly, you do?"

The secretary was beginning with "You do not doubt," when the other interrupted him, and impatiently rejoined:

"Doubt! No. Who says I doubt? If I doubted, should I cast away relatives, friends, every thing, for this unhappy country's sake; this unhappy country," he cried, springing up in bed, after repeating the phrase "unhappy country's sake" to himself, at least a dozen times, "forsaken of God and man, delivered over to a dangerous confederacy of Popish powers; the prey of corruption, idolatry, and despotism! Who says I doubt? Am I called, and chosen, and faithful? Tell me. Am I, or am I not."

"To God, the country, and yourself," cried Gashford.

"I am. I will be. I say again, I will be: to the block. Who says as much? Do you? Does any man alive?"

The secretary drooped his head with an expression of perfect acquiescence in any thing that had been said or might be; and Lord George gradually sinking down upon his pillow, fell asleep.

Although there was something very ludicrous in his vehement manner, taken in conjunction with his meager aspect and ungraceful presence, it would scarcely have provoked a smile in any man of kindly feeling; or even if it had, he would have felt sorry and almost angry with himself next moment, for yielding to the impulse. This lord was sincere in his violence and in his wavering. A nature prone to false enthusiasm, and the vanity of being a leader, were the worst qualities apparent in his composition. All the rest was weakness—sheer weakness; and it is the unhappy lot of thoroughly weak men, that their very sympathies, affections, confidences—all the qualities which in better constituted minds are virtues—dwindle into foibles, or turn into downright vices.

Gashford, with many a sly look towards the bed, sat chuckling at his master's folly, until his deep and heavy breathing warned him that he might retire. Locking his desk, and replacing it within the trunk (but not before he had taken from a secret lining two printed handbills) he cautiously withdrew; looking back, as he went, at the pale face of the slumbering man, above whose head the dusty plumes that crowned the Maypole couch, waved drearily and sadly as though it were a bier.

Stopping on the staircase to listen that all was quiet, and to take off his shoes lest his footsteps should alarm any light sleeper who might be near at hand, he descended to the ground floor, and thrust one of his bills beneath the great door of the house. That done, he crept softly back to his own chamber, and from the window let another fall—carefully rapped round a stone to save it from the wind—into the yard below.

They were addressed on the back "To every Protestant into whose hands this shall come," and bore within, what follows:

"Men and Brethren. Whoever shall find this letter, will take it as a warning to join, without delay, the friends of Lord George Gordon. There are great events at hand; and the times are dangerous and troubled. Read this carefully, keep it clean, and then drop it somewhere else. For King and Country. Union."

"More seed, more seed," said Gashford as he closed the window. "When will the harvest come!"

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-SEVENTH.

To surround any thing, however monstrous or ridiculous, with an air of mystery, is to invest it with a secret charm and power of attraction which to the crowd is irresistible. False priests, false prophets, false doctors, false patriots, false prodigies of every kind, veiling their proceedings in mystery, have always addressed themselves at an immense advantage to the popular credulity, and have been, perhaps, more indebted to that resource in gaining and keeping for a time the upper hand of truth and common sense, than to any half-dozen items in the whole catalogue of imposture. Curiosity is, and has been from the creation of the world, a master passion. To awaken it, to gratify it by slight degrees, and yet leave something always in suspense, is to establish the surest hold that can be had, in wrong, on the unthinking portion of mankind.

If a man had stood on London bridge, calling till he was hoarse, upon the passers by, to join with Lord George Gordon, although for an object which no man understood, and which in that very incident had a charm of its own,—the probability is, that he might have influenced a score of people in a month. If all zealous Protestants had been publicly urged to join an association for the avowed purpose of singing a hymn or two occasionally, and hearing some indifferent speeches made, and ultimately of petitioning Parliament not to pass an act for abolishing the penal laws against the Roman Catholic priests, the penalty of perpetual imprisonment denounced against those who educated children in that persuasion, and the disqualification of all members of the Romish church to inherit real property in the United Kingdom by right of purchase or descent,—matters so far removed from the business and bosoms of the mass, might perhaps have called together a hundred people. But when vague rumours got abroad, that in this Protestant association a secret power was mustering against the government for undefined and mighty purposes; when the air was filled with whispers of a confederacy among the Popish powers to degrade and enslave England, establish an inquisition in London, and turn the pens in Smithfield market into stakes and cauldrons; when terrors and alarms which no man understood were perpetually broached, both in and out of Parliament, by one enthusiast who did not understand himself, and by-gone bugbears which had lain quietly in their graves for centuries, were raised again to haunt the ignorant and credulous; when all this was done, as it were, in the dark, and secret invitations to join the Great Protestant Association in defence of religion, life, and liberty, were dropped in the public ways, thrust under the house-doors, tossed in at windows, and pressed into the hands of those who trod the streets by night; when they glared from every wall, and shone on every post and pillar, so that stocks and stones appeared infected with the common fear, urging all men to join together blindfold in resistance of they knew not what, they knew not why;—then the mania spread indeed, and the body, still increasing every day, grew forty thousand strong.

So said, at least, in this month of March, 1780, Lord George Gordon, the association's president. Whether it was the fact or otherwise, few men knew, or cared to ascertain. It had never made any public demonstration; had scarcely ever been heard of, save through him; had never been seen; and was supposed by many to be the mere creature of his disordered brain. He was accustomed to talk largely about numbers of men—stimulated, as it was inferred, by certain successful disturbances, arising out of the same subject, which had occurred in Scotland in the previous year; was looked upon as a crack-brained member of the lower house, who attacked all parties and sided with none, and was very little regarded. It was known that there was discontent abroad—there always is; he had been accustomed to address the people by placard, speech, and pamphlet, upon other questions; nothing had come, in England, of his past exertions, and nothing was apprehended from his present. Just as he has come upon the reader, he had come, from time to time, upon the public, and been forgotten in a day; as suddenly as he appears in these pages, after a blank of five long years, did he and his proceedings begin to force themselves, about this period, upon the notice of thousands of people, who had mingled in active life during the whole interval, and who, without being deaf or blind to passing events, had scarcely ever thought of him before.

"My lord," said Gashford in his ear, as he drew the curtain of his bed betimes, "my lord."

"Yes—who's that? What is it?"

"The clock has struck nine," returned the secretary, with meekly folded hands. "You have slept well? I hope you have slept well? If my prayers are heard, you are refreshed indeed."

"To say the truth, I have slept so soundly," said Lord George, rubbing his eyes and looking round the room, "that I don't remember quite—what place is this?"

"My lord!" cried Gashford, with a smile.

"O!" returned his superior. "Yes. You're not a Jew then?"

"A Jew!" exclaimed the pious secretary, recoiling.

"I dreamed that we were Jews, Gashford. You and I—both of us—Jews with long beards."

"Heaven forbid, my lord! We might as well be Papists."

"I suppose we might," returned the other, very quickly. "Eh? You really think so, Gashford?"

"Surely I do," the secretary cried, with looks of great surprise.

"Humph!" he muttered. "Yes, that seems reasonable."

"I hope my lord—" the secretary began.

"Hope!" he echoed, interrupting him. "Why do you say, you hope? There's no harm in thinking of such things."

"Not in dreams," returned the secretary.

—"'Called, and chosen, and faithful,'" said Gashford, taking up Lord George's watch, which lay upon a chair, and seemed to read the inscription on the seal, abstractedly.

It was the slightest action possible, not obtruded on his notice, and apparently the result of a moment's absence of mind, not worth remark. But as the words were uttered, Lord George, who had been going on impetuously, stopped short, reddened, and was silent. Apparently quite unconscious of this change in his demeanour, the wily secretary stepped a little apart, under pretence of pulling up the window blind, and returning, when the other had had time to recover, said:

"The holy cause goes bravely on, my lord. I was not idle, even last night. I dropped two of the handbills before I went to bed, and both are gone this morning. Nobody in the house has mentioned the circumstance of finding them, though I have been down stairs full half-an-hour. One or two recruits will be their first fruit, I predict; and who shall say how many more, with Heaven's blessing on your inspired exertions!"

"It was a famous device in the beginning," replied Lord George; "an excellent device, and did good service in Scotland. It was quite worthy of you. You remind me not to be a sluggard, Gashford, when the vineyard is menaced with destruction, and may be trodden down by papist feet. Let the horses be saddled in half-an-hour. We must be up and doing!"

He said this with a heightened colour, and in a tone of such enthusiasm, that the secretary deemed all further prompting needless, and withdrew.

—"Dreamed he was a Jew," he said, thoughtfully, as he closed the bedroom door. "He may come to that before he dies. It's like enough. Well! After a time, and provided I lost nothing by it, I don't see why that religion shouldn't suit me as well as any other. There are rich men among the Jews; shaving is very troublesome;—yes, it would suit me well enough. For the present, though, we must be Christian to the core. Our prophetic motto will suit all creeds in their turn, that's a comfort." Reflecting on this source of consolation, he reached the sitting-room, and rang the bell for breakfast.

Lord George was quickly dressed (for his plain toilet was easily made,) and as he was no less frugal in his repasts than in his Puritan attire, his share of the meal was soon despatched. The secretary, however, more devoted to good things of this world, or more intent on sustaining his strength and spirits for the sake of the Protestant cause, ate and drank to the last minute, and required indeed some three or four reminders from John Grueby, before he could resolve to tear himself away from Willet's plentiful providing.

At length he came down stairs, wiping his greasy mouth, and having paid John Willet's bill, climbed into his saddle. Lord George, who had been walking up and down before the house, talking to himself with earnest gestures, mounted his horse; and returning old John Willet's stately bow, as well as the parting salutation of a dozen idlers whom the rumour of a live lord being about to leave the Maypole had gathered round the porch, they rode away, with stout John Grueby in the rear.

If Lord George Gordon had appeared in the eyes of Mr. Willet over night, a nobleman of somewhat quaint and odd exterior, the impression was confirmed this morning, and increased a hundred fold. Sitting bolt upright upon his bony steed, with his long, straight hair, dangling about his face and fluttering in the wind; his limbs all angular and rigid, his elbows stuck out on either side ungracefully, and his whole frame jogged and shaken at every motion of his horse's feet; a more grotesque or more ungainly figure can hardly be conceived. In lieu of whip, he carried in his hand a great gold-headed cane, as large as any footman carries in these days; and his various modes of holding this unwieldy weapon—now upright before his face like the sabre of a horse soldier, now over his shoulder like a musket, now between his finger and thumb, but always in some uncouth and awkward fashion—contributed in no small degree to the absurdity of his appearance. Stiff, lank, and solemn, dressed in an unusual manner, and ostentatiously exhibiting—whether by design or accident—all his peculiarities of carriage, gesture, and conduct; all the qualities, natural and artificial, in which he differed from other men; he might have moved the sternest looker-on to laughter, and provoked the smiles and whispered jests which greeted his departure from the Maypole inn.

Quite unconscious, however, of the effect he produced, he trotted on beside his secretary, talking to himself nearly all the way, until they came within a mile or two of London, when now and then some passenger went by who knew him by sight, and pointed him out to some one else, and perhaps stood looking after him, or cried in jest or earnest as it might be, "Hurrah, Geordie! No Popery!" At which he would gravely pull off his hat, and bow. When they reached the town and rode along the streets, these notices became more frequent; some laughed, some hissed, some turned their heads and smiled, some wondered who he was, some ran along the pavement by his side and cheered. When this happened in a crush of carts and chairs and coaches, he would make a dead stop, and pulling off his hat cry "Gentlemen, No Popery!" to which the gentlemen would respond with lusty voices, and with three times three; and then, on he would go again with a score or so of the raggedest following at his horse's heels, and shouting till their throats were parched.

The old ladies too—there were a great many old ladies in the streets, and these all knew him. Some of them—not those of the highest rank, but such as sold fruit from baskets and carried burdens—clapped their shrivelled hands, and raised a weazen, piping, shrill "Hurrah, my Lord." Others waved their hands, or handkerchiefs, or shook their fans or parasols, or threw up windows and called in haste to those within, to come and see. All these marks of popular esteem, he received with profound gravity and respect; bowing very low, and so frequently that his hat was more off his head than on; and looking up at the houses as he passed along, with the air of one who was making a public entry, and yet was not puffed-up or proud.

So they rode (to the deep and unspeakable disgust of John Grueby) the whole length of Whitechapel, Leadenhall-street, and Cheapside, and into Saint Paul's churchyard. Arriving close to the cathedral, he halted; spoke to Gashford, and looking upward at its lofty dome, shook his head as though he said "The Church in Danger!" Then to be sure, the bystanders stretched their throats indeed; and he went on again with mighty acclamations from the mob, and lower bows than ever.

So along the Strand, up Swallow street, into Oxford road, and thence to his house in Welbeck street, near Cavendish-square, whither he was attended by a few dozen idlers; of whom he took leave on the steps with this brief parting, "Gentlemen, No Popery. Good day. God bless you." This being rather a shorter address than they expected, was received with some displeasure, and cries of "A speech! a speech!" which might have been complied with, but that John Grueby, making a mad charge upon them with all three horses, on his way to the stables, caused them to disperse into the adjoining fields, where they presently fell to pitch and toss, chuck-farthing, odd or even, dog-fighting, and other Protestant recreations.

In the afternoon Lord George came forth again, dressed in a black velvet coat, and trousers and waistcoat of the Gordon plaid, all of the same Quaker cut; and in this costume, which made him look a dozen times more strange and singular than before, went down on foot to Westminster. Gashford, meanwhile, bestirred himself in business matters; with which he was still engaged, when, shortly after dusk, John Grueby entered and announced a visiter.

"Let him come in," said Gashford.

"Here! come in!" growled John to somebody without; "You're a Protestant, an't you!"

"I should think so," replied a deep, gruff voice.

"You've the looks of it," said John Grueby. "I'd have known you for one, any where." With which remark he gave the visiter admission, retired, and shut the door.

The man who now confronted Gashford was a squat, thickset personage, with a low retreating forehead, a coarse shock head of hair, and eyes so small and near together, that his broken nose alone seemed to prevent their meeting and fusing into one of the usual size. A dingy handkerchief twisted like a cord about his neck, left his great veins exposed to view, and they were swoln and starting, as though with gulping down strong passions, malice, and ill-will. His dress was of threadbare velveteen—a faded, rusty, whitened black, like the ashes of a pipe or a coal fire after a day's extinction; discoloured with the soils of many a stale debauch, and reeking yet with pot-house odours. In lieu of buckles at his knees, he wore unequal loops of packthread; and in his grimy hands he held a knotted stick, the knob of which was carved into a rough likeness of his own vile face. Such was the visiter who doffed his three cornered hat in Gashford's presence, and waited, leering, for his notice.

"Ah! Dennis!" cried the secretary. "Sit down."

"I see my lord down yonder"—cried the man, with the jerk of his thumb towards the quarter that he spoke of, "and he says to me, says my lord, 'If you've nothing do, Dennis, go up to my house and talk with Muster Gashford.' Of course I'd nothing to do, you know. These an't my working hours. Ha, ha! I was a taking the air when I see my lord, that's what I was doing. I takes the air by night, as the howls does, Muster Gashford."

"And sometimes in the day time, eh?" said the secretary—"when you go out in state, you know."

"Ha, ha!" roared the fellow, smiting his leg; "for a gentleman as 'ull say a pleasant thing in a pleasant way, give me Muster Gashford agin' all London and Westminster! My lord an't a bad 'un at that, but he's a fool to you. Ah to be sure—when I go out in state."

"And have your carriage," said the secretary; "and your chaplain, eh? and all the rest of it?"

"You'll be the death of me," cried Dennis with another roar, "you will. But what's in the wind now, Muster Gashford," he asked hoarsely, "Eh! Are we to be under orders to pull down one of them Popish chapels—or what?"

"Hush! said the secretary, suffering the faintest smile to play upon his face. "Hush! God bless me, Dennis! We associate, you know, for strictly peaceable and lawful purposes."

"I know, bless you," returned the man, thrusting his tongue into his cheek; "I entered a' purpose, didn't I!"

"No doubt," said Gashford, smiling as before. And when he said so, Dennis roared again, and smote his leg still harder, and falling into fits of laughter, wiped his eyes with the corner of his neckerchief, and cried "Muster Gashford again all England—hollow!"

"Lord George and I were talking of you last night," said Gashford, after a pause. "He says you are a very earnest fellow."

"So I am," returned the hangman.

"And that you truly hate the Papists."

"So I do," and he confirmed it with a good round oath. "Lookye here, Muster Gashford," said the fellow, laying his hat and stick upon the floor, and slowly beating the palm of one hand with the fingers of the other; "Observe. I'm a constitutional officer that works for my living, and does my work creditable. Do I, or do I not?"

"Unquestionably."

"Very good. Stop a minute. My work is sound, Protestant, constitutional, English work. Is it, or is it not?"

"No man alive can doubt it."

"Nor dead neither. Parliament says this here—says Parliament 'If any man, woman, or child, does any thing which goes again a certain number of our acts'—how many hanging laws may there be at this present time, Muster Gashford? Fifty?"

"I don't exactly know how many," replied Gashford, leaning back in his chair and yawning; "a great number though."

"Well; say fifty. Parliament says, 'If any man, woman, or child, does any thing again any one of them fifty acts, that man, woman, or child, shall be worked off by Dennis.' George the Third steps in when they number very strong at the end of a sessions, and says, 'these are too many for Dennis. I'll have half for myself and Dennis shall have half for himself;' and sometimes he throws me in one over that I don't expect, as he did three years ago, when I got Mary Jones, a young woman of nineteen who come up to Tyburn with a infant at her breast, and was worked off for taking a piece of cloth off the counter of a shop in Ludgate-hill, and putting it down again when the shopman see her; and who had never done any harm before, and only tried to do that, in consequence of her husband having been pressed three weeks previous, and she being left to beg, with two young children—as was proved upon the trial. Ha ha!—Well! That being the law and the practice of England, is the glory of England, an't it Muster Gashford?"

"Certainly," said the secretary.

"And in times to come," pursued the hangman, "if our grandsons should think of their grandfathers' times, and find these things altered, they'll say, 'Those were days indeed, and we've been going down hill ever since.'—Won't they, Muster Gashford?"

"I have no doubt they will," said the secretary.

"Well then, look here," said the hangman. "If these papists get into power, and begins to boil and roast instead of hang, what becomes of my work! If they touch my work that's a part of so many laws, what becomes of the laws in general, what becomes of the religion, what becomes of the country?—Did you ever go to church, Muster Gashford?"

"Ever, repeated the secretary with some indignation; "of course."

"Well," said the ruffian, "I've been once—twice, counting the time I was christened—and when I heard the Parliament prayed for, and thought how many new hanging laws they made every sessions, I considered that I was prayed for. Now mind, Muster Gashford," said the fellow, taking up his stick and shaking it with a ferocious air, "I mustn't have my Protestant work touched, nor this here Protestant state of things altered in no degree, if I can help it; I mustn't have no Papists interfere with me, unless they come to me to be worked off in course of law; I mustn't have no biling, no roasting, no frying—nothing but hanging. My lord may well call me an earnest fellow. In support of the great Protestant principle of having plenty of that, I'll," and here he beat his club upon the ground, "burn, fight, kill—do any thing you bid me, so that it's bold and devilish—though the end of it was that I got hung myself.—There, Muster Gashford!"

He had appropriately followed up his frequent prostitution of a noble word to the vilest purposes, by pouring out in a kind of ecstacy, at least a score of most tremendous oaths; then wiped his heated face upon his neckerchief, and cried, "No Popery! I'm a religious man, by G—!"

Gashford had leant back in his chair, regarding him with eyes so sunken, and so shadowed by his heavy brows, that for aught the hangman saw of them, he might have been stone blind. He remained smiling in silence for a short time longer, and then said, slowly and distinctly:

"You are indeed an earnest fellow, Dennis—a most valuable fellow—the staunchest man I know of in our ranks. But you must calm yourself; you must be peaceful, lawful, mild as any lamb. I am sure you will be though."

"Ay, ay, we shall see, Muster Gashford, we shall see. You won't have to complain of me," returned the other, shaking his head.

"I am sure I shall not," said the secretary in the same mild tone, and with the same emphasis. "We shall have, we think, about next month, or May, when this Papist relief bill comes before the house, to convene our whole body for the first time. My lord has thoughts of our walking in procession through the streets—just as an innocent display of strength—and accompanying our petition down to the door of the House of Commons."

"The sooner, the better," said Dennis, with another oath.

"We shall have to draw up in divisions, our numbers being so large; and, I may venture to say," resumed Gashford, affecting not to hear the interruption, "though I have no direct instructions to that effect—That Lord George has thought of you as an excellent leader for one of these parties. I have no doubt you would be an admirable one."

"Try me," said the fellow with an ugly wink.

"You would be cool, I know," pursued the secretary, still smiling, and still managing his eyes so that he could watch him closely, and really not to be seen in turn, "obedient to orders, and perfectly temperate. You would lead your party into no danger, I am certain."

"I'd lead them, Muster Gashford"—the hangman was beginning in a reckless way, when Gashford started forward, laid his finger on his lips, and feigned to write, just as the door was opened by John Grueby.

"Oh!" said John, looking in; "here's another Protestant."

"Some other room, John," cried Gashford in his blandest voice. "I'm engaged just now."

But John had brought this new visiter to the door, and he walked in unbidden, as the words were uttered; giving to view the form and features, rough attire, and reckless air, of Hugh.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-EIGHTH.

The secretary put his hand before his eyes to shade them from the glare of the lamp, and for some moments looked at Hugh with a frowning brow, as if he remembered to have seen him lately, but could not call to mind where, or on what occasion. His uncertainty was very brief, for before Hugh had spoken a word, he said, as his countenance cleared up:

"Ay, ay, I recollect. It's quite right, John, you needn't wait. Don't go, Dennis."

"Your servant, master," said Hugh, as Grueby disappeared.

"Your's friend," returned the secretary in his smoothest manner. "What brings you here? We left nothing behind us, I hope!"

Hugh gave a short laugh, and thrusting his hand into his breast, produced one of the handbills, soiled and dirty from lying out of doors all night, which he laid upon the secretary's desk after flattening it upon his knee, and smoothing out the wrinkles with his heavy palm.

"Nothing but that, master. It fell into good hands, you see."

"What is this!" said Gashford, turning it over with an air of perfectly natural surprise. "Where did you get it from, my good fellow; what does it mean? I don't understand this at all."

A little disconcerted by his reception, Hugh looked from the secretary to Dennis, who had risen and was standing at the table, too, observing the stranger by stealth, and seeming to derive the utmost satisfaction from his manners and appearance. Considering himself silently appealed to by this action, Mr. Dennis shook his head thrice, as if to say of Gashford, "No. He don't know any thing at all about it. I know he don't. I'll take my oath he don't;" and hiding his profile from Hugh with one long end of his frowzy neckerchief, nodded and chuckled behind this screen in extreme approval of the secretary's proceedings.

"It tells the man that finds it, to come here, don't it?" asked Hugh. "I'm no scholar, myself, but I showed it to a friend, and he said it did."

"It certainly does," said Gashford, opening his eyes to their utmost width; "really this is the most remarkable circumstance I have ever known. How did you come by this piece of paper, my good friend?"

"Muster Gashford," wheezed the hangman under his breath, "agin all Newgate!"

Whether Hugh heard him, or saw by his manner that he was being played upon, or perceived the secretary's drift of himself, he came in his blunt way to the point at once.

"Here!" he said, stretching out his hand and taking it back; "never mind the bill, or what it says, or what it don't say. You don't know any thing about it, master,—no more do I,—no more does he," glancing at Dennis. "None of us know what it means, or where it comes from: there's an end of that. Now, I want to make one against the Catholics, I'm a No-Popery man, and ready to be sworn in. That's what I've come here for."

"Put him down on the roll, Muster Gashford," said Dennis, approvingly. "That's the way to go to work—right to the end at once, and no palaver."

"What's the use of shooting wide of the mark, eh, old boy!" cried Hugh.

"My sentiments all over!" rejoined the hangman. "This is the sort of chap for my division, Muster Gashford. Down with him, sir. Put him on the roll. I'd stand godfather to him, if he was to be christened in a bonfire, made of the ruins of the Bank of England."

With these and other expressions of confidence of the like flattering kind, and Mr. Dennis gave him a hearty slap on the back, which Hugh was not slow to return.

"No Popery, brother!" cried the hangman.

"No Property, brother!" responded Hugh.

"Popery, Popery," said the secretary, with his usual mildness.

"It's all the same!" cried Dennis, "It's all right. Down with him, Muster Gashford. Down with every body, down with every thing! Hurrah for the Protestant religion! That's the time of day, Muster Gashford!"

The secretary regarded them both with a very favourable expression of countenance, while they gave loose to these and other demonstrations of their patriotic purpose; and was about to make some remark aloud, when Dennis, stepping up to him, and shading his mouth with his hand, said, in a hoarse whisper, as he nudged him with his elbow:

"Don't split upon a constitutional officer's profession, Muster Gashford. There are popular prejudices, you know, and he mightn't like it. Wait till he comes to be more intimate with me. He's a fine built chap, an't he!"

"A powerful fellow, indeed!"

"Did you ever, Muster Gashford," whispered

Dennis, with a horrible kind of admiration, such as that with which a cannibal might regard his intimate friend, when hungry,—"did you ever"—and here he drew still closer to his ear, and fenced his mouth with both his open hands—"see such a throat as his? Do but cast your eye upon it. There's a neck for stretching, Muster Gashford!"

The secretary assented to this proposition with the best grace he could assume—it is difficult to feign a true professional relish: which is eccentric sometimes—and after asking the candidate a few unimportant questions, proceeded to enrol him a member of the Great Protestant Association of England. If any thing could have exceeded Mr. Dennis's joy on the happy conclusion of this ceremony, it would have been the rapture with which he received the announcement that the new member could neither read nor write: those two arts being (as Mr. Dennis swore) the greatest possible curse a civilised community could know, and militating more against the professional emoluments and usefulness of the great constitutional office he had the honour to hold, than any adverse circumstances that could present themselves to his imagination.

The enrolment being completed, and Hugh having been informed by Gashford, in his peculiar manner, of the peaceful and strictly lawful objects contemplated by the body to which he now belonged—during which recital Mr. Dennis nudged him very much with his elbow, and made divers remarkable faces—the secretary gave them both to understand that he desired to be alone. Therefore they took their leaves without delay, and came out of the house together.

"Are you walking, brother!" said Dennis.

"Ay!" returned Hugh. "Where you will."

"That's social," said his new friend. "Which way shall we take? Shall we go and have a look at doors that we shall make a pretty good clattering at, before long—eh, brother!"

Hugh answering in the affirmative, they went slowly down to Westminster, where both houses of Parliament were then sitting. Mingling in the crowd of carriages, horses, servants, chairmen, linkboys, porters, and idlers of all kinds, they lounged about; while Hugh's new friend pointed out to him significantly the weak parts of the building, how easy it was to get into the lobby, and so to the very door of the House of Commons; and how plainly, when they marched down there in grand array, their roars and shouts would be heard by the members inside; with a great deal more to the same purpose, all of which Hugh received with manifest delight.

He told him, too, who some of the Lords and Commons were, by name, as they came in and out; whether they were friendly to the Papists or otherwise; and bade him take notice of their liveries and equipages, that he might be sure of them, in case of need. Sometimes he drew him close to the windows of a passing carriage, that he might see its master's face by the light of the lamps; and, both in respect of people and localities, he showed so much acquaintance with every thing around, that it was plain he had often studied there before; as indeed, when they grew a little more confidential, he confessed he had.

Perhaps the most striking part of all this was, the number of people—never in groups of more than two or three together—who seemed to be skulking about the crowd for the same purpose. To the greater part of these, a slight nod or a look from Hugh's companion was sufficient greeting; but now and then, some man would come and stand beside him in the throng, and without turning his head or appearing to communicate with him, would say a word or two in a low voice, which he would answer in the same cautious manner. Then they would part, like strangers. Some of these men often reappeared again unexpectedly in the crowd close to Hugh, and as they passed by, pressed his hand, or looked him sternly in the face; but they never spoke to him, nor he to them; no, not a word.

It was remarkable, too, that whenever they happened to stand where there was any press of people, and Hugh chanced to be looking downward, he was sure to see an arm stretched out—under his own perhaps, or perhaps across him—which thrust some paper into the hand or pocket of a bystander, and was so suddenly withdrawn that it was impossible to tell from whom it came; nor could he see in any face, on glancing quickly round, the least confusion or surprise. They often trod upon a paper like the one he carried in his breast, but his companion whispered him not to touch it or to take it up,—not even to look towards it,—so they let them lie, and passed on.

When they had paraded the street and all the avenues of the building in this manner for near two hours, they turned away, and his friend asked him what he thought of what he had seen, and whether he was prepared for a good hot piece of work if it should come to that. "The hotter the better," said Hugh, "I'm prepared for any thing"—"So am I," said his friend, "and so are many of us;" and they shook hands upon it with a great oath, and with many terrible imprecations on the Papists.

As they were thirsty by this time, Dennis proposed that they should repair together to the Boot, where there was good company and strong liquor.—Hugh yielding a ready assent, they bent their steps that way with no loss of time.

This Boot was a lone house of public entertainment, situated in the fields at the back of the Foundling Hospital; a very solitary spot at that period, and quite deserted after dark. The tavern stood at some distance from any high road, and was approachable only by a dark and narrow lane; so that Hugh was much surprised to find several people drinking there, and great merriment going on. He was still more surprised to find among them almost every face that had caught his attention in the crowd; but his companion having whispered him outside the door, that it was not considered good manners at the Boot to appear at all curious about the company, he kept his own counsel, and made no show of recognition.

Before putting his lips to the liquor which was brought for them, Dennis drank in a loud voice the health of Lord George Gordon, President of the Great Protestant Association; which toast Hugh pledged likewise, with corresponding enthusiasm.—A fiddler who was present, and who appeared to act as the appointed minstrel of the company, forthwith struck up a Scotch reel; and that in tones so invigorating, that Hugh and his friend (who had both been drinking before) rose from their seats as by previous concert, and, to the great admiration of the assembled guests, performed an extemporaneous No-Popery Dance.

CHAPTER THE THIRTY-NINTH.

The applause which the performance of Hugh and his new friend elicited from the company at The Boot, had not yet subsided, and the two dancers were still panting from their exertions, which had been of a rather extreme and violent character, when the party was reinforced by the arrival of some more guests, who, being a detachment of United Bull-Dogs, were received with very flattering marks of distinction and respect.

The leader of this small party—for, including himself, they were but three in number—was our old acquaintance, Mr. Tappertit, who seemed, physically speaking, to have grown smaller with years (particularly as to his legs, which were stupendously little), but who, in a moral point of view, in personal dignity and self-esteem, had swelled into a giant. Nor was it by any means difficult for the most unobservant person to detect this state of feeling in the quondam 'Prentice, for it not only proclaimed itself impressively and beyond mistake in his majestic walk and kindling eye, but found a striking means of revelation in his turned-up nose, which scouted all things of earth with deep disdain, and sought communion with its kindred skies.

Mr. Tappertit, as chief or captain of the Bull-Dogs, was attended by his two lieutenants; one, the tall comrade of his younger life; the other, a 'Prentice Knight in days of yore—Mark Gilbert, bound in the olden time to Thomas Curzon of the Golden Fleece. These gentlemen, like himself, were now emancipated from their 'Prentice thraldom, and served as journeymen; but they were, in humble emulation of his great example, bold and daring spirits, and aspired to a distinguished state in great political events. Hence their connexion with the Protestant Association of England, sanctioned by the name of Lord George Gordon; and hence their present visit to The Boot.

"Gentlemen!" said Mr. Tappertit, taking off his hat as a great General might in addressing his troops. "Well met. My lord does me and you the honour to send his compliments per self."

"You've seen my Lord, too, have you?" said Dennis. "I see him this afternoon."

"My duty called me to the Lobby when our shop shut up; and I saw him there, sir," Mr. Tappertit replied, as he and his lieutenants took their seats.

"How do you do?"

"Lively, master, lively," said the fellow. "Here's a new brother, regularly put down in black and white by Muster Gashford; a credit to the cause; one of the stick-at-nothing sort; one arter my own heart. D'ye see him? Has he got the looks of a man that'll do, do you think?" he cried, as he slapped Hugh on the back.

"Looks or no looks," said Hugh, with a drunken flourish of his arm, "I'm the man you want. I hate the Papists, every one of 'em. They hate me, and I hate them. They do me all the harm they can, and I'll do them all the harm I can. Hurrah!"

"Was there ever," said Dennis, looking round the room when the echo of his boisterous voice had died away; "was there ever such a game boy! Why, I mean to say, brothers, that if Muster Gashford had gone a hundred mile and got together fifty men of the common run, they wouldn't have been worth this one."

The greater part of the company implicitly subscribed to this opinion, and testified their faith in Hugh, by nods and looks of great significance. Mr. Tappertit sat and contemplated him for a long time in silence, as if he suspended his judgment; then drew a little nearer to him, and eyed him over more carefully; then went close up to him, and took him apart into a dark corner.

"I say," he began, with a thoughtful brow, "haven't I seen you before?"

"It's like you may," said Hugh, in his careless way. "I don't know; shouldn't wonder."

"No, but it's very easily settled," returned Sim "Look at me. Did you ever see me before? You wouldn't be likely to forget it, you know, if you ever did. Look at me. Don't be afraid; I won't do you any harm. Take a good look—steady now."

The encouraging way in which Mr. Tappertit made this request, and coupled it with an assurance that he needn't be frightened, amused Hugh mightily—so much indeed, that he saw nothing at all of the small man before him, through closing his eyes in a fit of hearty laughter, which shook his great broad sides until they ached again.

"Come!" said Mr. Tappertit, growing a little impatient under this disrespectful treatment. "Do you know me, feller?"

"Not I," cried Hugh. "Ha, ha, ha! Not I! But I should like to."

"And yet I'd have wagered a seven shilling piece," said Mr. Tappertit, folding his arms, and confronting him with his legs wide apart, and firmly planted on the ground, "that you once were hostler at the Maypole.

Hugh opened his eyes on hearing this, and looked at him in great surprise.

"—And so you were, too," said Mr. Tappertit, pushing him away, with a condescending playfulness. "When did my eyes ever deceive — unless it was a young woman! Don't you know me now?"

"Why it a'n't—" Hugh faltered.

"A'n't it," said Mr. Tappertit. Are you sure of that? You remember G. Varden, don't you?"

Certainly Hugh did, and he remembered D. Varden, too; but that he didn't tell him.

"You remember coming down there, before I was out of my time, to ask after a vagabond that had bolted off, and left his disconsolate father a prey to the bitterest emotions, and all the rest of it—don't you?" said Mr. Tappertit.

"Of course I do!" cried Hugh. "And I saw you there."

"Saw me there!" said Mr. Tappertit. "Yes, I should think you did see me there. The place would be troubled to go on without me. Don't you remember my thinking you liked the vagabond, and on that account going to quarrel with you; and then finding you detested him worse than poison, going to drink with you! Don't you remember that?"

"To be sure!" cried Hugh.

"Well! and are you in the same mind now?" said Mr. Tappertit.

"Yes!" roared Hugh.

"You speak like a man," said Mr. Tappertit, "and I'll shake hands with you."—With these conciliatory expressions, he suited the action to the word; and Hugh meeting his advances readily, they performed the ceremony with a show of great heartiness.

"I find," said Mr. Tappertit, looking round on the assembled guests, "that brother What's-his-name and I are old acquaintance.—"You never heard any thing more of that rascal, I suppose, eh?"

"Not a syllable," replied Hugh. "I never want to. I don't believe I ever shall. He's dead long ago, I hope."

"It's to be hoped, for the sake of mankind in general and the happiness of society, that he is," said Mr. Tappertit, rubbing his palm upon his legs, and looking at it between whiles. "Is your other hand at all cleaner? Much the same. Well, I'll owe you another shake. We'll suppose it done, if you've no objection."

Hugh laughed again, and with such thorough abandonment to his mad humour, that his limbs seemed dislocated, and his whole frame in danger of tumbling to pieces; but Mr. Tappertit, so far from receiving this extreme merriment with any irritation, was pleased to regard it with the utmost favour, and even to join in it, so far as one of his gravity and station could, with any regard to that decency and decorum which men in high places are expected to maintain.

Mr. Tappertit did not stop here, as many public characters might have done, but, calling up his brace of lieutenants, introduced Hugh to them with high commendation; declaring him to be a man who, at such times as those in which they lived, could not be too much cherished. Further, he did him the honour to remark, that he would be an acquisition of which even the United Bull-Dogs might be proud; and finding, upon sounding him, that he was quite ready and willing to enter the society (for he was not at all particular, and would have leagued himself that night with any thing, or any body, for any purpose whatsoever), caused the necessary preliminaries to be gone into upon the spot. This tribute to his great merit delighted no man more than Mr. Dennis, as he himself proclaimed with several rare and surprising oaths; and indeed it gave unmingled satisfaction to the whole assembly.

"Make any thing you like of me!" cried Hugh, flourishing the can he had emptied more than once. "Put me on any duty you please. I'm your man. I'll do it. Here's my captain—here's my leader. Ha, ha, ha! Let him give me the word of command, and I'll fight the whole Parliament House single-handed, or set a lighted torch to the King's Throne itself!" With that he smote Mr. Tappertit on the back, with such violence that his little body seemed to shrink into a mere nothing; and roared again until the very foundlings near at hand were startled in their beds.

In fact a sense of something whimsical in their companionship seem to have taken entire possession of his rude brain. The bare fact of being patronised by a great man whom he could have crushed with one hand, appeared in his eyes so eccentric and humorous, that a kind of ferocious merriment gained the mastery over him, and quite subdued his brutal nature. He roared and roared again; toasted Mr. Tappertit a hundred times; declared himself a Bull-Dog to the core; and vowed to be faithful to him to the last drop of blood in his veins.

All these compliments Mr. Tappertit received as matters of course—flattering enough in their way, but entirely attributable to his vast superiority. His dignified self-possession only delighted Hugh the more; and in a word, this giant and dwarf struck up a friendship which bade fair to be of long continuance, as the one held it to be his right to command, and the other considered it an exquisite pleasantry to obey. Nor was Hugh by any means a passive follower, who scrupled to act without precise and definite orders; for when Mr. Tappertit mounted on an empty cask which stood by way of rostrum in the room, and volunteered a speech upon the alarming crisis then at hand, he placed himself beside the orator, and though he grinned from ear to ear at every word he said, threw out such expressive hints to scoffers in the management of his cudgel, that those who were at first the most disposed to interrupt, became remarkably attentive, and were the loudest in their approbation.

It was not all noise and jest, however, at The Boot, nor were the whole party listeners to the speech. There were some men at the other end of the room (which was a long, low-roofed chamber) in earnest conversation all the time; and when any of this group went out, fresh people were sure to come in soon afterwards and sit down in their places, as though the others had relieved them on some watch or duty; which it was pretty clear they did, for these changes took place by the clock, at intervals of half an hour. These persons whispered very much among themselves, and kept aloof, and often looked round, as jealous of their speech being overheard; some two or three among them entered in books what seemed to be reports from the others; when they were not thus employed, one of them would turn to the newspapers which were strewn upon the table, and from the Saint James's Chronicle, the Herald, Chronicle, or Public Advertiser, would read to the rest in a low voice some passage having reference to the topic in which they were all so deeply interested. But the great attraction was a pamphlet called The Thunderer, which espoused their own opinions, and was supposed at that time to emanate directly from the Association. This was always in request; and whether read aloud, to an eager knot of listeners, or by some solitary man, was certain to be followed by stormy talking and excited looks.

In the midst of all his merriment, and admiration of his captain, Hugh was made sensible by these and other tokens, of the presence of an air of mystery, akin to that which had so much impressed him out of doors. It was impossible to discard a sense that something serious was going on, and that under the noisy revel of the public house, there lurked unseen and dangerous matter. Little affected by this, however, he was perfectly satisfied with his quarters and would have remained there till morning, but that his conductor rose soon after midnight, to go home; Mr. Tappertit following his example, left him no excuse to stay. So they all three left the house together—roaring a No-Popery song until the fields resounded with the dismal noise.

"Cheer up, captain!" cried Hugh, when they had roared themselves out of breath. "Another stave!"

Mr. Tappertit, nothing loath, began again; and so the three went staggering on, arm-in-arm, shouting like madmen, and defying the watch with great valour. Indeed this did not require any unusual bravery or boldness, as the watchmen of that time, being selected for the office on account of excessive age and extraordinary infirmity, had a custom of shutting themselves up tight in their boxes on the first symptoms of disturbance, and remaining there until they disappeared. In these proceedings, Mr. Dennis, who had a gruff voice and lungs of considerable power, distinguished himself very much, and acquired great credit with his two companions.

"What a queer fellow you are!" said Mr. Tappertit. "You're so precious sly and close. Why don't you ever tell what trade you're of?"

"Answer the captain instantly," cried Hugh, beating his hat down on his head; "why don't you ever tell what trade you're of?"

"I'm of as gen-teel a calling, brother, as any man in England—as light a business as any gentleman could desire."

"Was you 'prenticed to it?" asked Mr. Tappertit.

"No. Natural genius," said Mr. Dennis. "No 'prenticing. It came by natur'. Muster Gashford knows my calling. Look at that hand of mine.—Many and many a job that hand has done, with a neatness and dexterity never known afore. When I look at that hand," said Mr. Dennis, shaking it in the air, "and remember the helegant bits of work it has turned off, I feel quite mollancholy to think it should ever grow old and feeble. But such is life!"

He heaved a deep sigh, as he indulged in these reflections; and putting his fingers with an absent air on Hugh's throat, and particularly under his left ear, as if he were studying the anatomical development of that part of his frame, shook his head in a despondent manner and actually shed tears.

"You're a kind of artist, I suppose—eh?" said Mr. Tappertit.

"Yes," rejoined Dennis; "yes—I may call myself a artist—a fancy workman—art improves natur'—that's my motto."

"And what do you call this?" said Mr. Tappertit, taking his stick out of his hand.

"That's my portrait atop," Dennis replied; "d'ye think it's like?"

"Why—it's a little too handsome," said Mr. Tappertit. "Who did it? You?"

"I!" repeated Dennis, gazing fondly on his image. "I wish I had the talent. That was carved by a friend of mine, as is now no more. The very day afore he died, he cut that with his pocket-knife, from memory! I'll die game, says my friend, and my last moments shall be dewoted to making Dennis's pictur'. That's it."

"That was a queer fancy, wasn't it?" said Mr. Tappertit.

"It was a queer fancy," rejoined the other, breathing on his fictitious nose, and polishing it with the cuff of his coat, "but he was a queer subject altogether—a kind of gipsy—one of the finest, stand-up-men, you ever see. Ah! he told me some things that would startle you a bit, did that friend of mine, on the morning when he died."

"You were with him at the time, were you?" said Mr. Tappertit.

"Yes," he answered, with a curious look. "I was there. Oh! yes, certainly, I was there. He wouldn't have gone off half as comfortable without me. I had been with three or four of his family under the same circumstances. They were all fine fellows."

"They must have been fond of you," remarked Mr. Tappertit, looking at him sideways.

"I don't know that they was exactly fond of me," said Dennis, with a little hesitation, "but they all had me near 'em when they departed. I come in for their wardrobes, too. This very hankercher that you see round my neck, belonged to him that I've been speaking of—him as did that likeness."

Mr. Tappertit glanced at the article referred to, and appeared to think that the deceased's ideas of dress were of a peculiar and by no means an expensive kind. He made no remark upon the point, however, and suffered his mysterious companion to proceed without interruption.

"These smalls," said Dennis, rubbing his legs; "these very smalls—they belonged to a friend of mine that's left off such incumbrances for ever: this coat, too—I've often walked behind this coat, in the streets, and wondered whether it would ever come to me: this pair of shoes have danced a hornpipe for another man, afore my eyes, full half-a-dozen times at least: and as to my hat," he said, taking it off, and twirling it round upon his fist—"Lord! I've seen this hat go up Holborn on the box of a hackney-coach—ah, many and many a day!"

"You don't mean to say their old wearers are all dead, I hope?" said Mr. Tappertit, falling a little distance from him, as he spoke.

"Every one of 'em," replied Dennis. "Every man, Jack!"

There was something so very ghastly in this circumstance, and it appeared to account, in such a very strange and dismal manner, for his faded dress—which, in this new aspect, seemed discoloured by the earth from graves—that Mr. Tappertit abruptly found he was going another way, and stopping short, bade him good night with the utmost heartiness.—As they happened to be near the Old Bailey, and Mr. Dennis knew there were turnkeys in the lodge with whom he could pass the night, and discuss professional subjects of common interest among them before a rousing fire, and over a social glass, he separated from his companions without any great regret, and warmly shaking hands with Hugh, and making an early appointment for their meeting at The Boot, left them to pursue their road.

"That's a strange sort of man," said Mr. Tappertit, watching the hackney-coachman's hat as it went bobbing down the street. "I don't know what to make of him. Why can't he have his smalls made to order, or wear live clothes at any rate?"

"He's a lucky man, captain," cried Hugh. "I should like to have such friends as his."

"I hope he don't get 'em to make their wills and then knock 'em on the head," said Mr. Tappertit, musing. "But come. The United B.'s expect me. Oh!—What's the matter?"

"I quite forgot," said Hugh, who had started at the striking of a neighbouring clock. "I have somebody to see to-night—I must turn back directly. The drinking and singing put it out of my head.—It's well I remembered it!"

Mr. Tappertit looked at him as though he were about to give utterance to some very majestic sentiments in reference to this act of desertion; but as it was clear, from Hugh's hasty manner, that the engagement was one of a pressing nature, he graciously forbore, and gave him his permission to depart immediately,—which Hugh acknowledged with a roar of laughter.

"Good night, captain!" he cried. "I am yours to the death, remember!"

"Farewell!" said Mr. Tappertit, waving his hand. "Be bold and vigilant!"

"No Popery, captain!" roared Hugh.

"England in blood first!" cried his desperate leader. Whereat Hugh cheered and laughed, and ran off like a greyhound.

"That man will prove a credit to my corps," said Simon, turning thoughtfully upon his heel. "And let me see. In an altered state of society—which must ensue if we break out and are victorious—when the locksmith's child is mine, Miggs must be got rid of somehow, or she'll poison the tea-kettle one evening when I'm out. He might marry Miggs, if he was drunk enough. It shall be done. I'll make a note of it."

CHAPTER THE FORTIETH.

Little thinking of the plan for his happy settlement in life which had suggested itself to the teeming brain of his provident commander, Hugh made no pause until Saint Dunstan's giants struck the hour above him, when he worked the handle of a pump which stood hard by, with great vigour, and thrusting his head under the spout, let the water gush upon him until a little stream ran down from every uncombed hair, and he was wet to the waist. Considerably refreshed by this ablution, both in mind and body, and almost sobered for the time, he dried himself as he best could; then crossed the road, and plied the knocker of the Middle Temple gate.

The night-porter looked through a small grating in the portal with a surly eye, and cried "Halloa?" which greeting Hugh returned in kind, and bade him open quickly.

"We don't sell beer here," cried the man; "what else do you want?"

"To come in," Hugh replied, with a kick at the door.

"Where to go to?"

"Paper-Buildings."

"Whose chambers?"

"Sir John Chester's." Each of which answers, he emphasised with another kick.

After a little growling on the other side, the gate was opened, and he passed in: undergoing a close inspection from the porter as he did so.

"You wanting Sir John, at this time of night!" said the man.

"Ay!" said Hugh. "I! What of that?"

"Why, I must go with you and see that you do, for I don't believe it."

"Come along then."

Eyeing him with suspicious looks, the man, with key and lantern, walked on at his side, and attended him to Sir John Chester's door, at which Hugh gave one knock, that echoed through the dark staircase like a ghostly summons, and made the dull light tremble in the drowsy lamp.

"Do you think he wants me now?" said Hugh.

Before the man had time to answer, a footstep was heard within, a light appeared, and Sir John, in his dressing-gown and slippers, opened the door.

"I ask your pardon, Sir John," said the porter, pulling off his hat. "Here's a young man says he wants to speak to you. It's late for strangers. I thought it best to see that all was right."

"Aha?" cried Sir John, raising his eyebrows. "It's you, messenger, is it? Go in. Quite right, friend. I commend your prudence highly. Thank you. God bless you. Good night."

To be commended, thanked, God-blessed, and bade good night by one who carried "Sir" before his name, and wrote himself M. P. to boot, was something for a porter. He withdrew with much humility and reverence. Sir John followed his late visiter into the dressing-room, and sitting in his easy chair before the fire, and moving it so that he could see him as he stood, hat in hand, beside the door, looked at him from head to foot.

The old face, calm and pleasant as ever; the complexion, quite juvenile in its bloom and clearness; the same smile; the wonted precision and elegance of dress; the white, well-ordered teeth; the delicate hands; the composed and quiet manner; every thing as it used to be: no marks of age or passion, envy, hate, or discontent: all unruffled and serene, and quite delightful to behold.

He wrote himself M. P.—but how? Why, thus. It was a proud family—more proud, indeed, than wealthy. He had stood in danger of arrest; of bailiffs, and a jail—a vulgar jail, to which the common people with the small incomes went. Gentlemen of ancient houses have no privilege of exemption from such cruel laws—unless they are of one great house, and then they have. A proud man of his stock and kindred had the means of sending him there. He offered—not indeed to pay his debts, but to let him sit for a close borough until his own son came of age, which, if he lived, would come to pass in twenty years. It was quite as good as an Insolvent Act, and infinitely more genteel. So Sir John Chester was a member of Parliament.

But how Sir John? Nothing so simple, or so easy. One touch with a sword of state, and the transformation is effected. John Chester, Esquire, M. P. attended court—went up with an address—headed a deputation. Such elegance of manner, so many graces of deportment, such powers of conversation, could never pass unnoticed. Mr. was too common for such merit. A man so gentlemanly should have been—but Fortune is capricious—born a duke: just as some dukes should have been born labourers. He caught the fancy of the king, knelt down a grub, and rose a butterfly. John Chester, Esquire, was knighted and became Sir John.

"I thought when you left me this evening, my esteemed acquaintance," said Sir John, after a pretty long silence, "that you intended to return with all despatch?"

"So I did, master."

"And so you have?" he retorted, glancing at his watch. "Is that what you would say?"

Instead of replying, Hugh changed the leg on which he leant, shuffled his cap from one hand to the other, looked at the ground, the wall, the ceiling, and finally at Sir John himself; before whose pleasant face he lowered his eyes again, and fixed them on the floor.

"And how have you been employing yourself in the mean while?" quoth Sir John, lazily crossing his legs. "Where have you been? what harm have you been doing?"

"No harm at all, master," growled Hugh, with humility. "I have only done as you ordered."

"As I what?" returned Sir John.

"Well, then," said Hugh, easily, "as you advised, or said I ought, or said I might, or said that you would do, if you was me. Don't be so hard upon me, master."

Something like an expression of triumph in the perfect control he had established over this rough instrument, appeared in the knight's face for an instant; but it vanished directly, as he said—paring his nails while speaking:

"When you say I ordered you, my good fellow, you imply that I directed you to do something for me—something I wanted done—something for my own ends and purposes—you see? Now I am sure I needn't enlarge upon the extreme absurdity of such an idea, however unintentional; so please"—and here he turned his eyes upon him—"to be more guarded. Will you?"

"I meant to give you no offence," said Hugh. "I don't know what to say. You catch me up so very short."

"You will be caught up much shorter, my good friend—infinitely shorter—one of these days, depend upon it," replied his patron, calmly. "By-the-bye, instead of wondering why you have been so long, my wonder should be why you came at all. Why did you?"

"You know, master," said Hugh, "that I couldn't read the bill I found, and that supposing it to be something particular from the way that it was wrapped up, I brought it here."

"And could you ask no one else to read it, Bruin?" said Sir John.

"No one that I could trust with secrets, master. Since Barnaby Rudge was lost sight of for good and all—and that's five years ago—I haven't talked with any one but you."

"You have done me honour, I am sure."

"I have come to and fro, master, all through that time, when there was any thing to tell, because I knew that you'd be angry with me if I stayed away," said Hugh, blurting the words out, after an embarrassed silence; "and because I wished to please you if I could, and not to have you go against me. There. That's the true reason why I came to-night. You know that, master, I am sure."

"You are a specious fellow," returned Sir John, fixing his eyes upon him, "and carry two faces under your hood, as well as the best. Didn't you give me in this room this evening, any other reason; no dislike of any body who has slighted you, lately, on all occasions, abused you, treated you with rudeness; acted towards you, more as if you were a mongrel dog than a man like himself?"

"To be sure I did!" cried Hugh, his passion rising, as the other meant it should; "and I say it all over now, again. I'd do any thing to have some revenge on him—any thing. And when you told me that he and all the Catholics would suffer from those who joined together under that hand-bill, I said I'd make one of 'em, if their master was the devil himself. I am one of 'em. See whether I am as good as my word and turn out to be among the foremost, or no. I mayn't have much head, master, but I've head enough to remember those that use me ill. You shall see, and so shall he, and so shall hundreds more, how my spirit backs me when the time comes. My bark is nothing to my bite. Some that I know, had better have a wild lion among 'em, than me, when I am fairly loose—they had!"

The knight looked at him with a smile of far deeper meaning than ordinary; and pointing to the old cupboard, followed him with his eyes while he filled and drank a glass of liquor; and smiled when his back was turned, with deeper meaning yet.

"You are in a blustering mood, my friend," he said, when Hugh confronted him again.

"Not I, master!" cried Hugh. "I don't say half I mean. I can't. I haven't got the gift. There are talkers enough among us; I'll be one of the doers."

"Oh! you have joined those fellows then?" said Sir John, with an air of most profound indifference.

"Yes. I went up to the house you told me of, and got put down upon the muster. There was another man there, named Dennis—"

"Dennis, eh!" cried Sir John, laughing. "Ay, ay! a pleasant fellow, I believe?"

"A roaring dog, master—one after my own heart—hot upon the matter too—red hot."

"So I have heard," replied Sir John carelessly. "You don't happen to know his trade, do you?"

"He wouldn't say," cried Hugh. "He keeps it secret."

"Ha, ha!" laughed Sir John. "A strange fancy—a weakness with some persons—you'll know it one day, I dare swear."

"We're intimate already," said Hugh.

"Quite natural! And have been drinking together, eh?" pursued Sir John. "Did you say what place you went to in company, when you left Lord George's?"

Hugh had not said or thought of saying, but he told him; and this inquiry being followed by a long train of questions, he related all that had passed both in and out of doors, the kind of people he had seen, their numbers, state of feeling, mode of conversation, apparent expectations and intentions. His questioning was so artfully contrived, that he seemed even in his own eyes to volunteer all this information rather than to have it wrested from him; and he was brought to this state of feeling so naturally, that when Mr. Chester yawned at length and declared himself quite wearied out, he made a rough kind of excuse for having talked so much.

"There—get you gone," said Sir John, holding the door open in his hand. "You have made a pretty evening's work. I told you not to do this. You may get into trouble. You'll have an opportunity of revenging yourself on your proud friend Haredale, though, and for that, you'd hazard any thing I suppose?"

"I would," retorted Hugh, stopping in his passage out, and looking back; "but what do I risk? What do I stand a chance of losing, master? Friends, home? A fig for 'em all; I have none; they are nothing to me. Give me a good scuffle; let me pay off old scores in a bold riot where there are men to stand by me; and then use me as you like—it don't matter much to me what the end is!"

"What have you done with that paper?" said Sir John.

"I have it here, master."

"Drop it again as you go along; it's as well not to keep such things about you."

Hugh nodded, and touching his cap with an air of as much respect as he could summon up, departed.

Sir John, fastening the doors behind him, went back to his dressing-room, and sat down again before the fire, at which he gazed for a long time, in earnest meditation.

"This happens fortunately," he said, breaking into a smile, "and promises well. Let me see. My relative and I, who are the most Protestant fellows in the world, give our worst wishes to the Roman Catholic cause; and to Saville, who introduces their bill, I have a personal objection besides; but as each of us has himself for the first article in his creed, we cannot commit ourselves by joining with a very extravagant madman, such as this Gordon most undoubtedly is. Now really, to foment his disturbances in secret, through the medium of such a very apt instrument as my savage friend here, may further our real ends; and to express at all becoming seasons, in moderate and polite terms, a disapprobation of his proceedings, though we agree with him in principle, will certainly be to gain a character for honesty and uprightness of purpose, which cannot fail to do us infinite service, and to raise us into some importance. Good! So much for public grounds. As to private considerations, I confess that if these vagabonds would make some riotous demonstration (which does not appear impossible,) and would inflict some little chastisement on Haredale as a not inactive man among his sect, it would be extremely agreeable to my feelings, and would amuse me beyond measure. Good again! Perhaps better!"

When he came to this point, he took a pinch of snuff; then beginning slowly to undress, he resumed his meditations, by saying with a smile:

"I fear, I do fear exceedingly, that my friend is following fast in the footsteps of his mother. His intimacy with Mr. Dennis is very ominous. But I have no doubt he must have come to that end any way. If I lend him a helping hand, the only difference is, that he may, upon the whole, drink a few gallons, or puncheons, or hogsheads, less in this life than he otherwise would. It's no business of mine. It's a matter of very small importance!"

So he took another pinch of snuff, and went to bed.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-FIRST.

From the workshop of the Golden Key there issued forth a tinkling sound, so merry and good-humoured, that it suggested the idea of some one working blithely, and made quite pleasant music. No man who hammered on at a dull monotonous duty, could have brought such cheerful notes from steel and iron; none but a chirping, healthy, honest-hearted fellow, who made the best of every thing, and felt kindly towards every body, could have done it for an instant. He might have been a coppersmith, and still been musical. If he had sat in a jolting wagon, full of rods of iron, it seemed as if he would have brought some harmony out of it.

Tink, tink, tink—clear as a silver bell, and audible at every pause in the streets' harsher noises, as though it said, "I don't care; nothing puts me out; I am resolved to be happy." Women scolded, children squalled, heavy carts went rumbling by, horrible cries proceeded from the lungs of hawkers; still it struck in again, no higher, no lower, no louder, no softer, not thrusting itself on people's notice a bit the more for having been outdone by louder sounds—tink, tink, tink, tink, tink.

It was a perfect embodiment of the still small voice, free from all cold, hoarseness, huskiness, or unhealthiness of any kind; foot passengers slackened their pace, and were disposed to linger near it; neighbours who had got up splenetic that morning, felt good humour stealing on them as they heard it, and by degrees became quite sprightly; mothers danced their babies to its ringing; still the same magical tink, tink, tink, came gaily from the workshop of the Golden Key.

Who but the locksmith could have made such music! A gleam of sun shining through the unsashed window, and chequering the dark workshop with a broad patch of light, fell full upon him, as though attracted by his sunny heart. There he stood working at his anvil, his face all radiant with exercise and gladness, his sleeves turned up, his wig pushed off his shining forehead—the easiest, freest, happiest man in all the world. Beside him sat a sleek cat, purring and winking in the light, and falling every now and then into an idle doze, as from excess of comfort. Toby looked on from a tall bench hard by; one beaming smile, from his broad nut-brown face down to his slack-baked buckles in his shoes. The very locks that hung around had something jovial in their rust, and seemed like gouty gentlemen of hearty natures, disposed to joke on their infirmities. There was nothing surly or severe in the whole scene. It seemed impossible that any one of the innumerable keys could fit a churlish strong box or prison door. Cellars of beer and wine, rooms where there were fires, books, gossip, and cheering laughter—these were their proper sphere of action. Places of distrust, and cruelty, and restraint, they would have left quadruple-locked for ever.

Tink, tink, tink. The locksmith paused at last, and wiped his brow. The silence roused the cat, who, jumping softly down, crept to the door, and watched with tiger eyes a bird cage in an opposite window. Gabriel lifted Toby to his mouth and took a hearty draught.

Then, as he stood upright, with his head flung back, and his portly chest thrown out, you would have seen that Gabriel's lower man was clothed in military gear. Glancing at the wall beyond, there might have been espied, hanging on their several pegs, a cap and feather, broad-sword, sash, and coat of scarlet; which any man learned in such matters would have known from their make and pattern to be the uniform of a serjeant in the Royal East London Volunteers.

As the locksmith put his mug down, empty, on the bench whence it had smiled on him before, he glanced at these articles with a laughing eye, and looking at them with his head a little on one side, as though he would get them all into a focus, said, leaning on his hammer:

"Time was, now, I remember, when I was like to run mad with the desire to wear a coat of that colour. If any one (except my father) had called me a fool for my pains, how I should have fired and fumed! But what a fool I must have been, surely!"

"Ah!" sighed Mrs. Varden, who had entered unobserved. "A fool indeed. A man at your time of life, Varden, should know better now."

"Why, what a ridiculous woman you are, Martha," said the locksmith, turning round with a smile.

"Certainly," replied Mrs. V. with great demureness. "Of course I am. I know that, Varden. Thank you."

"I mean—" began the locksmith.

"Yes," said his wife, "I know what you mean. You speak quite plain enough to be understood, Varden. It's very kind of you to adapt yourself to my capacity, I am sure."

"Tut, tut, Martha," rejoined the locksmith; "don't take offence at nothing. I mean, how strange it is of you to run down volunteering, when it's done to defend you and all other women, and our own fireside and every body's else in case of need."

"It's unchristian," cried Mrs. Varden, shaking her head.

"Unchristian!" said the locksmith. "Why, what the devil—"

Mrs. Varden looked at the ceiling, as in expectation that the consequence of this profanity would be the immediate descent of the four post bedstead on the second floor, together with the best sitting-room on the first; but no visible judgment occurring, she heaved a deep sigh, and begged her husband, in a tone of resignation, to go on, and by all means to blaspheme as much as possible, because he knew she liked it.

The locksmith did for a moment seem disposed to gratify her, but he gave a great gulp, and mildly rejoined:

"I was going to say, what on earth do you call it unchristian for? Which would be most unchristian, Martha—to sit quietly down and let our houses be sacked by a foreign army, or to turn out like men and drive 'em off? Shouldn't I be a nice sort of a christian, if I crept into a corner of my own chimney and looked on while a parcel of whiskered savages bore off Dolly—or you—?"

When he said "or you," Mrs. Varden, despite herself, relaxed into a smile. There was something complimentary in the idea. "In such a state of things as that, indeed—" she simpered.

"As that!" repeated the locksmith. "Well, that would be the state of things directly. Even Miggs would go. Some black tambourine-player, with a great turban on, would be bearing her off, and, unless the tambourine-player was proof against kicking and scratching, it's my belief he'd have the worst of it. Ha, ha, ha! I'd forgive the tambourine-player. I wouldn't have him interfered with on any account, poor fellow." And here the locksmith laughed again so heartily, that tears came into his eyes—much to Mrs. Varden's indignation, who thought the capture of so sound a Protestant and estimable a private character as Miggs by a pagan negro, a circumstance too shocking and awful for contemplation.

The picture Gabriel had drawn, indeed, threatened serious consequences, and would indubitably have led to them, but luckily at that moment a light footstep crossed the threshold, and Dolly, running in, threw her arms round her old father's neck and hugged him tight.

"Here she is at last!" cried Gabriel. "And how well you look, Doll, and how late you are my darling!"

How well she looked! Well! Why, if he had exhausted every laudatory adjective in the dictionary, it wouldn't have been praise enough. When and where was there ever such a plump, roguish, comely, bright-eyed, enticing, bewitching, captivating, maddening little puss in all this world as Dolly! What was the Dolly of five years ago, to the Dolly of that day! How many coachmakers, saddlers, cabinetmakers, and professors of other useful arts, had deserted their fathers, mothers, sisters, brothers, and, most of all, their cousins, for the love of her! How many unknown gentlemen—supposed to be of mighty fortunes, if not titles—had waited round the corner after dark, and tempted Miggs the incorruptible, with golden guineas, to deliver offers of marriage folded up in love letters! How many disconsolate fathers and substantial tradesmen had waited on the locksmith for the same purpose, with dismal tales of how their sons had lost their appetites, and taken to shut themselves up in dark bed-rooms, and wandering in desolate suburbs with pale faces, and all because of Dolly Varden's loveliness and cruelty! How many young men, in all previous times of unprecedented steadiness, had turned suddenly wild and wicked for the same reason, and in an ecstacy of unrequited love, taken to wrench off door-knockers, and invert the boxes of rheumatic watchmen! How had she recruited the kings's service, both by sea and land, through rendering desperate his loving subjects between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five! How many young ladies had publicly professed, with tears in their eyes, that for their tastes she was much too short, too tall, too bold, too cold, too stout, too thin, too fair, too dark—too any thing but handsome!—How many old ladies, taking counsel together, had thanked Heaven their daughters were not like her, and had hoped she might come to no harm, and had thought she would come to no good, and had wondered what people saw in her, and had arrived at the conclusion that she was "going off" in her looks, or had never come on in them, and that she was a thorough imposition and a popular mistake!

And yet here was this same Dolly Varden, so whimsical and hard to please that she was Dolly Varden still, all smiles and dimples and pleasant looks, and caring no more for the fifty or sixty young fellows who at that very moment were breaking their hearts to marry her, than if so many oysters had been crossed in love and opened afterwards.

Dolly hugged her father as has been already stated, and having hugged her mother also, accompanied both into the little parlour were the cloth was already laid for dinner, and where Miss Miggs—a trifle more rigid and bony than of yore—received her with a sort of hysterical gasp, intended for a smile. Into the hands of that young virgin, she delivered her bonnet and walking dress (all of a dreadful, artful, and designing kind,) and then said with a laugh, which rivalled the locksmith's music, "How glad I am to be at home again!"

"And how glad we always are, Doll," said her father, putting back the dark hair from her sparkling eyes, "to have you at home! Give me a kiss."

If there had been any body of the male kind there to see her do it—but there was not—it was a mercy.

"I don't like your being at the Warren," said the locksmith, "I can't bear to have you out of my sight. And what is the news over yonder, Doll?"

"What news there is, I think you know already," replied his daughter. "I am sure you do though."

"Ay?" cried the locksmith. "What's that?"

"Come, come," said Dolly, "you know very well. I want you to tell me why Mr. Haredale—oh how gruff he is again, to be sure!—has been away from home for some days past, and why he is travelling about (we know he is travelling because of his letters) without telling his own niece why or wherefore."

"Miss Emma doesn't want to know, I'll swear," returned the locksmith.

"I don't know that," said Dolly; "but I do, at any rate. Do tell me. Why is he so secret, and what is this ghost story, which nobody is to tell Miss Emma, and which seems to be mixed up with his going away? Now I see you know, by your colouring so."

"What the story means, or is, or has to do with it, I know no more than you, my dear," returned the locksmith, "except that it's some foolish fear of little Solomon's—which has, indeed, no meaning in it, I suppose. As to Mr. Haredale's journey, he goes, as I believe—"

"Yes," said Dolly.

"As I believe," resumed the locksmith, pinching her cheek, "on business, Doll. What it may be, is quite another matter. Read Blue Beard, and don't be too curious, pet; it's no business of your's or mine, depend upon that, and here's dinner, which is much more to the purpose."

Dolly might have remonstrated against this summary dismissal of the subject, notwithstanding the appearance of dinner, but at the mention of Blue Beard Mrs. Varden interposed, protesting she could not find it in her conscience to sit tamely by, and hear her child recommended to peruse the adventures of a Turk and Musselman—far less of a fabulous Turk, which she considered that Potentate to be. She held that, in such stirring and tremendous times as those in which they lived, it would be much more to the purpose if Dolly became a regular subscriber to the Thunderer, where she would have an opportunity of reading Lord George Gordon's speeches word for word, which would be a greater comfort and solace to her, than a hundred and fifty Blue Beards ever could impart. She appealed in support of this proposition to Miss Miggs, then in waiting, who said that indeed the peace of mind she had derived from the perusal of that paper generally, but especially from one article of the very last week as ever was, entitled "Great Britain drenched in gore," exceeded all belief; the same composition, she added, had also wrought such a comforting effect on the mind of a married sister of hers, then resident at Golden Lion Court, number twenty-siven, second bell-handle on the right-hand door-post, that, being in a delicate state of health, and in fact expecting an addition to her family, she had been seized with fits, directly after its perusal, and had raved of the Inquisition ever since; to the great improvement of her husband and friends. Miss Miggs went on to say that she would recommend all those whose hearts were hardened to hear Lord George themselves, whom she commended first, in respect of his steady Protestantism, then of his oratory, then of his eyes, then of his nose, then of his legs, and lastly of his figure generally, which she looked upon as fit for any statue, prince or angel; to which sentiment Mrs. Varden fully subscribed.

Mrs. Varden having cut in, looked at a box upon the mantel-shelf, painted in imitation of a very red brick dwelling house, with a yellow roof; having at top a real chimney, down which voluntary subscribers dropped their silver, gold, or pence, into the parlour; and on the door the counterfeit presentment of a brass plate, whereon was legibly inscribed "Protestant Association:"—and looking at it, said, that it was to her a source of poignant misery to think that Varden never had, of all his substance, dropped any thing into that temple, save once in secret—as she afterwards discovered—two fragments of tobacco pipe, which she hoped would not be put down to his last account. That Dolly, she was grieved to say, was no less backward in her contributions, better loving, as it seemed, to purchase ribbons and such gauds, than to encourage the great cause, then in such heavy tribulation; and that she did entreat her (her father she much feared could not be moved) not to despise, but imitate the bright example of Miss Miggs, who flung her wages, as it were, into the very countenance of the Pope, and bruised his features with her quarter's money.

"Oh, mim," said Miggs, "don't relude to that. I had no intentions, mim, that nobody should know. Such sacrifices as I can make are quite a widder's mite. It's all I have," cried Miggs with a great burst of tears—for with her they never came on by degrees—"but it's made up to me in other ways; it's well made up."

This was quite true, though not perhaps in the sense that Miss Miggs intended. As she never failed to keep her self denial full in Mrs. Varden's view, it drew forth so many gifts of caps and gowns and other articles of dress, that upon the whole the red brick house was perhaps the best investment for her small capital she could possibly have hit upon; returning her interest, at the rate of seven or eight per cent. in money, and fifty at least in personal repute and credit.

"You needn't cry, Miggs," said Mrs. Varden, herself in tears; "you needn't be ashamed of it, though your poor mistress is on the same side."

Miggs howled at this remark, in a peculiar dismal way, and said she knowed that master hated her.—That it was a dreadful thing to live in families and have dislikes, and not give satisfactions. That to make divisions was a thing she could not abear to think of, neither could her feelings let her do it. That if it was master's wishes as she and him should part, and she hoped he might be the happier for it, and always wishes him well, and that he might find somebody as would meet his dispositions. It would be a hard trial, she said, to part from such a missis, but she could meet any suffering when her conscience told her she was in the rights, and therefore she was willing even to go that lengths. She did not think, she added, that she could long survive the separations, but, as she was hated and looked upon unpleasant, perhaps her dying as soon as possible would be the best endings for all parties. With this affecting conclusion, Miss Miggs shed more tears, and sobbed abundantly.

"Can you bear this, Varden?" said his wife in a solemn voice, laying down her knife and fork.

"Why, not very well, my dear," rejoined the locksmith, "but I try to keep my temper."

"Don't let there be words on my account, mim," sobbed Miggs. "It's much the best that we should part. I wouldn't stay—oh, gracious me!—and make dissensions, not for an annual gold mine, and found in tea and sugar."

Lest the reader should be at any loss to discover the cause of Miss Migg's deep emotion, it may be whispered apart that, happening to be listening, as her custom sometimes was, when Gabriel and his wife conversed together, she had heard the locksmith's joke relative to the foreign black who played the tambourine, and bursting with the spiteful feelings which the taunt awoke in her fair breast, exploded in the manner we have witnessed. Matters having now arrived at a crisis, the locksmith as usual, and for the sake of peace and quietness, gave in.

"What are you crying for, girl?" he said. "What's the matter with you? What are you talking about hatred for? I don't hate you, I don't hate any body. Dry your eyes and make yourself agreeable, in Heaven's name, and let us all be happy while we can."

The allied powers deeming it good generalship to consider this a sufficient apology on the part of the enemy, and confession of having been in the wrong, did dry their eyes and take it in good part. Miss Miggs observed that she bore no malice, no not to her greatest foe, whom she rather loved the more indeed, the greater persecution she sustained. Mrs. Varden approved of this meek and forgiving spirit in high terms, and incidentally declared as a closing article of agreement, that Dolly should accompany her to the Clerkenwell branch of the association that very night. This was an extraordinary instance of her great prudence and policy; having had this end in view from the first, and entertaining a secret misgiving that the locksmith (who was bold when Dolly was in question) would object, she had backed Miss Miggs up to this point in order that she might have him at a disadvantage. The manœuvre succeeded so well that Gabriel only made a wry face, and with the warning he had just had, fresh in his mind, did not dare to say one word.

The difference ended, therefore, in Miggs being presented with a gown by Mrs. Varden and a half-a-crown by Dolly, as if she had eminently distinguished herself in the paths of morality and goodness. Mrs. V., according to custom, expressed her hope that Varden would take a lesson from what had passed and learn more generous conduct for the time to come; and the dinner being now cold and nobody's appetite very much improved by what had passed, they went on with it, as Mrs. Varden said, "like Christians."

As there was to be a grand parade of the Royal East London Volunteers that afternoon, the locksmith did no more work; but sat down comfortably with his pipe in his mouth, and his arm round his pretty daughter's waist, looking lovingly on Mrs. V. from time to time, and exhibiting from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot, one smiling surface of good humour. And to be sure, when it was time to dress him in his regimentals, and Dolly, hanging about him in all kinds of graceful winning ways, helped to button and buckle and brush him up and get him into one of the tightest coats that ever was made by mortal tailor, he was the proudest father in all England.

"What a handy jade it is!" said the locksmith to Mrs. Varden, who stood by with folded hands—rather proud of her husband too—while Miggs held his cap and sword at arm's length, as if mistrusting that the latter might run some one through the body of its own accord; "but never marry a soldier, Doll, my dear."

Dolly didn't ask why not, or say a word indeed, but stooped her head down very low to tie his sash.

"I never wear this dress," said honest Gabriel, "but I think of poor Joe Willet. I loved Joe; he was always a favourite of mine. Poor Joe!—Dear heart, my girl, don't tie me in so tight."

Dolly laughed—not like herself at all—the strangest little laugh that could be—and held her head down lower still.

"Poor Joe!" resumed the locksmith, muttering to himself; "I always wish he had come to me. I might have made it up between them, if he had. Ah! old John made a great mistake in his way of acting by that lad—a great mistake.—Have you nearly tied that sash, my dear?"

What an ill-made sash it was! There it was, loose again and trailing on the ground. Dolly was obliged to kneel down, and recommence at the beginning.

"Never mind young Willet, Varden," said his wife frowning; "you might find some one more deserving to talk about, I think."

Miss Miggs gave a great sniff to the same effect.

"Nay, Martha," cried the locksmith, "don't let us bear too hard upon him. If the lad is dead indeed, we'll deal kindly by his memory."

"A runaway and a vagabond!" said Mrs. Varden.

Miss Miggs expressed her concurrence as before.

"A runaway, my dear, but not a vagabond," returned the locksmith in a gentle tone. "He behaved himself well, did Joe—always—and was a handsome manly fellow. Don't call him a vagabond, Martha."

Mrs. Varden coughed—and so did Miggs.

"He tried hard to gain your good opinion, Martha, I can tell you," said the locksmith smiling, and stroking his chin. "Ah! that he did. It seems but yesterday that he followed me out to the Maypole door one night, and begged me not to say how like a boy they used him—say here, at home, he meant, though at the time, I recollect, I didn't understand. 'And how's Miss Dolly, sir?' says Joe," pursued the locksmith, musing sorrowfully, "Ah! poor Joe!"

"Well, I declare," cried Miggs. "Oh! Goodness gracious me!"

"What's the matter now?" said Gabriel, turning sharply to her.

"Why, if here an't Miss Dolly," said the handmaid, stooping down to look into her face, "a giving way to floods of tears. Oh, mim! oh, sir. Raly it's give me such a turn," cried the susceptible damsel, pressing her hand upon her side to quell the palpitation of her heart, "that you might knock me down with a feather."

The locksmith, after glancing at Miss Miggs as if he could have wished to have a feather brought straightway, looked on with a broad stare while Dolly hurried away, followed by that sympathising young woman: then turning to his wife, stammered out, "Is Dolly ill? Have I done any thing? Is it my fault?"

"Your fault!" cried Mrs. V. reproachfully. "There—You had better make haste out."

"What have I done?" said poor Gabriel. "It was agreed that Mr. Edward's name was never to be mentioned, and I have not spoken of him, have I?"

Mrs. Varden merely replied that she had no patience with him, and bounced off after the other two. The unfortunate locksmith wound his sash about him, girded on his sword, put on his cap, and walked out.

"I am not much of a dab at my exercise," he said, under his breath, "but I shall get into fewer scrapes at that work than at this. Every man came into the world for something; my department seems to be to make every woman cry without meaning it. It's rather hard!"

But he forgot it before he reached the end of the street, and went on with a shining face, nodding to the neighbours, and showering about his friendly greetings like mild spring rain.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-SECOND.

The Royal East London Volunteers made a brilliant sight that day: formed into lines, squares, circles, triangles, and what not, to the beating of drums and the streaming of flags; and performed a vast number of complex evolutions, in all of which Serjeant Varden bore a conspicuous share. Having displayed their military prowess to the utmost in these warlike shows, they marched in glittering order to the Chelsea Bun-house, and regaled in the adjacent taverns until dark. Then at sound of drum they fell in again, and returned amidst the shoutings of His Majesty's lieges to the place from whence they came.

The homeward march being somewhat tardy,—owing to the un-soldierlike behaviour of certain corporals, who, being gentleman of sedentary pursuits in private life and excitable out of doors, broke several windows with their bayonets, and rendered it imperative on the commanding officer to deliver them over to a strong guard, with whom they fought at intervals as they came along,—it was nine o'clock when the locksmith reached home. A hackney-coach was waiting near his door; and as he passed it, Mr. Haredale looked from the window and called him by his name.

"The sight of you is good for sore eyes, sir," said the locksmith, stepping up to him. "I wish you had walked in though, rather than waited here."

"There is nobody at home, I find," Mr. Haredale answered; "besides, I desired to be as private as I could."

"Humph!" muttered the locksmith, looking round at his house. "Gone with Simon Tappertit to that precious Branch, no doubt."

Mr. Haredale invited him to come into the coach, and, if he were not tired or anxious to go home, to ride with him a little way that they might have some talk together. Gabriel cheerfully complied, and the coachman mounting his box drove off.

"Varden," said Mr. Haredale after a minute's pause, "you will be amazed to hear what errand I am on; it will seem a very strange one."

"I have no doubt it's a reasonable one, sir, and has a meaning in it," replied the locksmith; or it would not be yours at all. Have you just come back to town, sir?"

"But half an hour ago."

"Bringing no news of Barnaby, or his mother?" said the locksmith dubiously. "Ah! you needn't shake your head, sir. It was a wild-goose chase. I feared that, from the first. You exhausted all reasonable means of discovery when they went away. To begin again after so long a time has passed is hopeless, sir—quite hopeless."

"Why, where are they?" he returned impatiently, "Where can they be? Above ground?"

"God knows," rejoined the locksmith, "many that I knew above it five years ago, have their beds under the grass now. And the world is a wide place. It's a hopeless attempt, sir, believe me. We must leave the discovery of this mystery, like all others, to time, and accident, and Heaven's pleasure."

"Varden, my good fellow," said Mr. Haredale, "I have a deeper meaning in my present anxiety to find them out, than you can fathom. It is not a mere whim; it is not the casual revival of my old wishes and desires; but an earnest, solemn purpose. My thoughts and dreams all tend to it, and fix it in my mind. I have no rest by day or night; I have no peace or quiet; I am haunted."

His voice was so altered from its usual tones, and his manner bespoke so much emotion, that Gabriel, in his wonder, could only sit and look towards him in the darkness, and fancy the expression of his face.

"Do not ask me," continued Mr. Haredale, "to explain myself. If I were to do so, you would think me the victim of some hideous fancy. It is enough that this is so, and that I cannot—no, I can not—lie quietly in my bed, without doing what will seem to you incomprehensible."

"Since when, sir," said the locksmith, after a pause, "has this uneasy feeling been upon you?"

Mr. Haredale hesitated for some moments, and then replied: "Since the night of the storm. In short, since the last nineteenth of March."

As though he feared that Varden might express surprise, or reason with him, he hastily went on:

"You will think, I know, I labour under some delusion. Perhaps I do. But it is not a morbid one; it is a wholesome action of the mind, reasoning on actual occurrences. You know the furniture remains in Mrs Rudge's house, and that it has been shut up, by my orders, since she went away, save once a-week or so, when an old neighbour visits it to scare away the rats. I am on my way there now."

"For what purpose?" asked the locksmith.

"To pass the night there," he replied; "and not to-night alone, but many nights. This is a secret which I trust to you in case of any unexpected emergency. You will not come, unless in case of strong necessity, to me; from dusk to broad day, I shall be there. Emma, your daughter, and the rest, suppose me out of London, as I have been until within this hour. Do not undeceive them. This is the errand I am bound upon. I know I may confide it to you, and I rely upon your questioning me no further at this time."

With that, as if to change the theme, he led the astounded locksmith back to the night of the Maypole highwayman, to the robbery of Edward Chester, to the reappearance of the man at Mrs. Rudge's house, and to all the strange circumstances which afterwards occurred. He even asked him carelessly about the man's height, his face, his figure, whether he was like any one he had ever seen—like Hugh, for instance, or any man he had known at any time—and put many questions of that sort, which the locksmith, considering them as mere devices to engage his attention and prevent his expressing the astonishment he felt, answered pretty much at random.

At length they arrived at the corner of the street in which the house stood, where Mr. Haredale, alighting, dismissed the coach. "If you desire to see me safely lodged," he said, turning to the locksmith with a gloomy smile, "you can."

Gabriel, to whom all former marvels had been nothing in comparison with this, followed him along the narrow pavement in silence. When they reached the door, Mr. Haredale softly opened it with a key he had about him, and closing it when Varden entered, they were left in thorough darkness.

They groped their way into the ground-floor room. Here Mr. Haredale struck a light, and kindled a pocket-taper he had brought with him for the purpose. It was then, when the flame was full upon him, that the locksmith saw for the first time how haggard, pale, and changed he looked; how worn and thin he was; how perfectly his whole appearance coincided with all that he had said so strangely as they rode along. It was not an unnatural impulse in Gabriel, after what he had heard, to note curiously the expression of his eyes. It was perfectly collected and rational;—so much so, indeed, that he felt ashamed of his momentary suspicion, and drooped his own when Mr. Haredale looked towards him, as if he feared they would betray his thoughts.

"Will you walk through the house?" said Mr. Haredale, with a glance towards the window, the crazy shutters of which were closed and fastened. "Speak low."

There was a kind of awe about the place, which would have rendered it difficult to speak in any other manner. Gabriel whispered "Yes," and followed him up stairs.

Every thing was just as they had seen it last. There was a sense of closeness from the exclusion of fresh air, and a gloom and heaviness around, as though long imprisonment had made the very silence sad. The homely hangings of the beds and windows had begun to droop; the dust lay thick upon their dwindling folds; and damps had made their way through ceiling, wall, and floor. The boards creaked beneath their tread as if resenting the unaccustomed intrusion; nimble spiders, paralysed by the taper's glare, checked the motion of their hundred legs upon the wall, or dropped like lifeless things upon the ground; the death-watch ticked aloud; and the scampering feet of rats and mice rattled behind the wainscot.

As they looked about them on the decaying furniture, it was strange to find how vividly it presented those to whom it had belonged, and with whom it was once familiar. Grip seemed to perch again upon his high-backed chair; Barnaby to crouch in his old favourite corner by the fire; the mother to resume her usual seat, and watch him as of old. Even when they could separate these objects from the phantoms of the mind which they invoked, the latter only glided out of sight, but lingered near them still; for then they seemed to lurk in closets and behind the doors, ready to start out and suddenly accost them in their well-remembered tones.

They went down stairs, and again into the room they had just now left. Mr. Haredale unbuckled his sword and laid it on the table, with a pair of pocket-pistols; then told the locksmith he would light him to the door.

"But this is a dull place, sir," said Gabriel, lingering; "may no one share your watch?"

He shook his head, and so plainly evinced his wish to be alone, that Gabriel could say no more. In another moment the locksmith was standing in the street, whence he could see that the light once more travelled up stairs, and soon returning to the room below, shone brightly through the chinks in the shutters.

If ever man were sorely puzzled and perplexed, the locksmith was, that night. Even when snugly seated by his own fire-side, with Mrs. Varden opposite in a night-cap and night-jacket, and Dolly beside him (in a most distracting dishabille) curling her hair, and smiling as if she had never cried in all her life and never could—even then, with Toby at his elbow and his pipe in his mouth, and Miggs (but that perhaps was not much) falling asleep in the back-ground, he could not quite discard his wonder and uneasiness. So, in his dreams—still there was Mr. Haredale, haggard and care-worn, listening in the solitary house to every sound that stirred, with the taper shining through the chinks until the day should turn it pale and end his lonely watching.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-THIRD.

Next morning brought no satisfaction to the locksmith's thoughts, nor next day, nor the next, nor many others.—Often after nightfall he entered the street, and turned his eyes towards the well-known house; and as surely as he did so, there was the solitary light, still gleaming through the crevices of the window-shutter, while all within was motionless, noiseless, cheerless, as a grave. Unwilling to hazard Mr. Haredale's favour by disobeying his strict injunction, he never ventured to knock at the door or to make his presence known in any way. But whenever strong interest and curiosity attracted him to the spot—which was not seldom—the light was always there.

If he could have known what passed within, the knowledge would have yielded him no clue to this mysterious vigil. At twilight, Mr. Haredale shut himself up, and at daybreak he came forth. He never missed a night, always came and went alone, and never varied his proceedings in the least degree.

The manner of his watch was this. At dusk, he entered the house in the same way as when the locksmith bore him company, kindled a light, went through the rooms, and narrowly examined them. That done, he returned to the chamber on the ground-floor, and laying his sword and pistols on the table, sat by it until morning.

He usually had a book with him, and often tried to read, but never fixed his eyes or thoughts upon it for five minutes together. The slightest noise without doors, caught his ear; a step upon the pavement seemed to make his heart leap.

He was not without some refreshment during the long lonely hours; generally carrying in his pocket a sandwich of bread and meat, and a small flask of wine. The latter, diluted with large quantities of water, he drank in a heated, feverish way, as though his throat were dried up; but he scarcely ever broke his fast, by so much as a crumb of bread.

If this voluntary sacrifice of sleep and comfort had its origin, as the locksmith on consideration was disposed to think, in any superstitious expectation of the fulfilment of a dream or vision connected with the event on which he had brooded for so many years, and if he waited for some ghostly visiter who walked abroad when men lay sleeping in their beds, he showed no trace of fear or wavering. His stern features expressed the most inflexible resolution; his brows were puckered, and his lips compressed, with deep and settled purpose; and when he started at a noise and listened, it was not with the start of fear but hope, and catching up his sword as though the hour had come at last, he would clutch it in his tight-clenched hand, and listen, with sparkling eyes and eager looks, until it died away.

These disappointments were numerous, for they ensued on almost every sound, but his constancy was not shaken. Still, every night he was at his post, the same stern, sleepless, sentinel; and still night passed and morning dawned, and he must watch again.

This went on for weeks; he had taken a lodging at Vauxhall in which to pass the day and rest himself; and from this place, when the tide served, he usually came to London Bridge from Westminster by water, in order that he might avoid the busy streets.

One evening, shortly before twilight, he came his accustomed road upon the river's bank, intending to pass through Westminster Hall into Palace Yard, and there take boat to London Bridge as usual. There was a pretty large concourse of people assembled round the Houses of Parliament, looking at the members as they entered and departed, and giving vent to rather noisy demonstrations of approval or dislike, according to their known opinions. As he made his way among the throng, he heard once or twice the No-Popery cry, which was then becoming pretty familiar to the ears of most men; but holding it in very slight regard, and observing that the idlers were of the lowest grade, he neither thought nor cared about it, but made his way along, with perfect indifference.

There were many little knots and groups of persons in Westminster Hall: some few looking upward at its noble ceiling, and at the rays of evening light, tinted by the setting sun, which streamed in aslant through its small windows, and growing dimmer by degrees, were quenched in the gathering gloom below; some noisy passengers, mechanics going home from work, and otherwise, who hurried quickly through, waking the echoes with their voices, and soon darkening the small door in the distance, as they passed into the street beyond; some, in busy conference together on political or private matters, pacing slowly up and down with eyes that sought the ground, and seeming, by their attitudes, to listen earnestly from head to foot. Here, a dozen squabbling urchins made a very Babel in the air; there, a solitary man, half clerk, half mendicant, paced up and down with hungry dejection in his look and gait; at his elbow passed an errand lad, swinging his basket round and round, and with his shrill whistle riving the very timbers of the roof; while a more observant schoolboy, halfway through, pocketed his ball, and eyed the distant beadle as he came looking on. It was that time of evening when, if you shut your eyes and open them again, the darkness of an hour appears to have gathered in a second. The smooth-worn pavement, dusty with footsteps, still called upon the lofty walls to reiterate the shuffle and the tread of feet unceasingly, save when the closing of some heavy door resounded through the building like a clap of thunder, and drowned all other noises in its rolling sound.

Mr. Haredale, glancing only at such of these groups as he passed nearest to, and then in a manner betokening that his thoughts were elsewhere, had nearly traversed the Hall, when two persons before him caught his attention. One of these, a gentleman in elegant attire, carried in his hand a cane, which he twirled in a jaunty manner as he loitered on; the other, an obsequious, crouching, fawning figure, listened to what he said—at times throwing in an humble word himself—and, with his shoulders shrugged up to his ears, rubbed his hands submissively, or answered at intervals by an inclination of the head, half-way between a nod of acquiescence, and a bow of most profound respect.

In the abstract there was nothing very remarkable in this pair, for servility, waiting on a handsome suit of clothes and a cane—not to speak of gold and silver sticks, or wands of office—is common enough. But there was that about the well-dressed man, yes, and about the other likewise, which struck Mr. Haredale with no pleasant feeling. He hesitated, stopped, and would have stepped aside and turned out of his path, but at the moment, the other two faced about quickly, and stumbled upon him before he could avoid them.

The gentleman with the cane lifted his hat and had begun to tender an apology, which Mr. Haredale had begun as hastily to acknowledge and walk away, when he stopped short and cried, "Haredale! God bless me, this is strange indeed!"

"It is," he returned impatiently; "yes—a—"

"My dear friend," cried the other, detaining him, "why such great speed! One minute, Haredale, for the sake of old acquaintance."

"I am in haste," he said. "Neither of us has sought this meeting. Let it be a brief one. Good night!"

"Fie, fie!" replied Sir John (for it was he), "how very churlish! We were speaking of you. Your name was on my lips—perhaps you heard me mention it? No? I am sorry for that. I am really sorry. You know our friend here, Haredale? This is really a most remarkable meeting!"

The friend, plainly very ill at ease, had made bold to press Sir John's arm, and to give him other significant hints that he was desirous of avoiding this introduction. As it did not suit Sir John's purpose, however, that it should be evaded, he appeared quite unconscious of these silent remonstrances, and inclined his hand towards him as he spoke, to call attention to him more particularly.

The friend, therefore, had nothing for it, but to muster up the pleasantest smile he could, and to make a conciliatory bow, as Mr. Haredale turned his eyes upon him. Seeing that he was recognised, he put out his hand in an awkward and embarrassed manner, which was not mended by its contemptuous rejection.

"Mr. Gashford!" said Haredale, coldly. "It is as I have heard then. You have left the darkness for the light, sir, and hate those whose opinions you formerly held, with all the bitterness of a renegade. You are an honour, sir, to any cause. I wish the one you espouse at present, much joy of the acquisition it has made."

The secretary rubbed his hands and bowed, as though he would disarm his adversary by humbling himself before him. Sir John Chester again exclaimed, with an air of great gayety, "Now, really, this is a most remarkable meeting!" and took a pinch of snuff with his usual self-possession.

"Mr. Haredale," said Gashford, stealthily raising his eyes, and letting them drop again when they met the other's steady gaze, "is too conscientious, too honourable, too manly, I am sure, to attach unworthy motives to an honest change of opinion, even though it implies a doubt of those he holds himself. Mr. Haredale is too just, too generous, too clear-sighted in his moral vision, to—"

"Yes, sir;" he rejoined with a sarcastic smile, finding that the secretary stopped. "You were saying"—

Gashford meekly shrugged his shoulders, and looking on the ground again, was silent.

"No, but let us really," interposed Sir John at this juncture, "let us really, for a moment, contemplate the very remarkable character of this meeting. Haredale, my dear friend, pardon me if I think you are not sufficiently impressed with its singularity. Here we stand, by no previous appointment or arrangement, three old schoolfellows, in Westminster Hall: three old boarders in a remarkably dull and shady seminary at Saint Omer's, where you, being Catholics and of necessity educated out of England, were brought up; and where I, being a promising young protestant at that time, was sent to learn the French tongue from a native of Paris!"

"Add to the singularity, Sir John," said Mr. Haredale, "that some of you protestants of promise are at this moment leagued in yonder building, to prevent our having the surpassing and unheard-of privilege of teaching our children to read and write—here—in this land, where thousands of us enter your service every year, and to preserve the freedom of which we die in bloody battles abroad, in heaps: and that others of you, to the number of some thousands as I learn, are led on to look on all men of my creed as wolves and beasts of prey, by this man Gashford. Add to it, besides, the bare fact that this man lives in society, walks the streets in broad day—I was about to say holds up his head, but that he does not—and it will be strange, and very strange, I grant you."

"Oh! you are hard upon your friend," replied Sir John, with an engaging smile. "You are really very hard upon our friend!"

"Let him go on, Sir John," said Gashford, fumbling with his gloves. "Let him go on. I can make allowances, Sir John. I am honoured with your good opinion, and I can dispense with Mr. Haredale's. Mr. Haredale is a sufferer from the penal laws, and I can't expect his favour."

"You have so much of my favour, sir," retorted Mr. Haredale, with a bitter glance at the third party in their conversation, "that I am glad to see you in such good company. You are the essence of your great association, in yourselves."

"Now, there you mistake," said Sir John, in his most benignant way. "There—which is a most remarkable circumstance for a man of your punctuality and exactness, my dear Haredale—you fall into an error. I don't belong to the body; I have an immense respect for its members, but I don't belong to it: although I am, it is certainly true, the conscientious opponent of your being relieved. I feel it my duty to be so; it is a most unfortunate necessity; and cost me a bitter struggle. Will you try this box? If you don't object to a trifling infusion of a very chaste scent, you'll find its flavour exquisite."

"I ask your pardon, Sir John," said Mr. Haredale, declining the proffer with a motion of his hand, "for having ranked you among the humble instruments who are obvious in all men's sight. I should have done more justice to your genius. Men of your capacity plot in secresy and safety, and leave exposed posts to the duller wits."

"Don't apologise, for the world," replied Sir John sweetly; "old friends like you and I may be allowed some freedoms, or the deuce is in it."

Gashford, who had been very restless all this time but had not once looked up, now turned to Sir John, and ventured to mutter something to the effect that he must go, or my Lord would perhaps be waiting.

"Don't distress yourself, good sir," said Mr. Haredale, "I'll take my leave, and put you at your ease —" which he was about to do without further ceremony, when he was stayed by a buzz and murmur at the upper end of the hall, and looking in that direction, saw Lord George Gordon coming on, with a crowd of people round him.

There was a lurking look of triumph, though very differently expressed, in the faces of his two companions, which made it a natural impulse on Mr. Haredale's part not to give way before this leader, but to stand there while he passed.—He drew himself up to his full height, and, clasping his hands behind him, looked on him with a proud and scornful aspect, while Lord George slowly advanced (for the press was great about him) towards the spot where they were standing.

He had left the House of Commons but that moment, and had come straight down into the Hall, bringing with him, as his custom was, intelligence of what had been said that night in reference to the Papists, and what petitions had been presented in their favour, and who had supported them, and when the bill was to be brought in, and when it would be advisable to present their own Great Protestant petition. All this he told the persons about him in a loud voice, and with great abundance of ungainly gesture. Those who were nearest him made comments to each other, and vented threats and murmurings: those who were outside the crowd cried "Silence," and "Stand back," or closed in upon the rest, endeavouring to make a forcible exchange of places: and so they came driving on in a very disorderly and irregular way, as it is the manner of a crowd to do.

When they were very near to where the Secretary, Sir John, and Mr. Haredale stood, Lord George turned round, and, making a few remarks of a sufficiently violent and incoherent kind, concluded with the usual sentiment, and called for three cheers to back it. While these were in the act of being given with great energy, he extricated himself from the press, and stepped up to Gashford's side.—Both he and Sir John being well known to the populace, they fell back a little, and left the four standing together.

"Mr. Haredale, Lord George," said Sir John Chester, seeing that the nobleman regarded him with an inquisitive look. "A Catholic gentleman unfortunately—most unhappily a Catholic—but an esteemed acquaintance of mine, and once of Mr. Gashford's. My dear Haredale, this is Lord George Gordon."

"I should have known that, had I been ignorant of his lordship's person," said Mr. Haredale. "I hope there is but one gentleman in England who, addressing an ignorant and excited throng, would speak of a large body of his fellow-subjects in such injurious language as I heard this moment. For shame, my lord, for shame!"

"I cannot talk to you, sir," replied Lord George in a loud voice, and waving his hand in a disturbed and agitated manner; "we have nothing in common."

"We have much in common—many things—all that the Almighty gave us," said Mr. Haredale; "and common charity, my lord, not to say common sense and common decency, should teach you to refrain from these proceedings. If every one of these men had arms in their hands at this moment, as they have them in their heads, I would not leave this place without telling you that you disgrace your station."

"I don't hear you, sir," he replied in the same manner as before; "I can't hear you. It is indifferent to me what you say. Don't retort, Gashford," for the secretary had made a show of wishing to do so; "I can hold no communion with the worshippers of idols."

As he said this, he glanced at Sir John, who lifted his hands and eyebrows, as if deploring the intemperate conduct of Mr. Haredale, and smiled in admiration of the crowd, and of their leader.

"He retort!" cried Haredale. "Look you here, my Lord. Do you know this man?"

Lord George replied by laying his hand upon the shoulder of his cringing secretary, and viewing him with a smile of confidence.

"This man," said Mr. Haredale, eyeing him from top to toe, "who in his boyhood was a thief, and has been from that time to this, a servile, false, and truckling knave; this man, who has crawled and crept through life, wounding the hands he licked, and biting those he fawned upon; this sycophant, who never knew what honour, truth, or courage meant; who robbed his benefactor's daughter of her virtue, and married her to break her heart, and did it with stripes and cruelty; this creature, who has whined at kitchen windows for the broken food, and begged for halfpence at our chapel doors; this apostle of the faith, whose tender conscience cannot bear the altars where his vicious life was publicly denounced.—Do you know this man, my Lord?"

"Oh, really—you are very, very hard upon our friend!" exclaimed Sir John.

"Let Mr. Haredale go on," said Gashford, upon whose unwholesome face the perspiration had broken out during this speech, in blotches of wet; "I don't mind him, Sir John; it's quite as indifferent to me what he says, as it is to my Lord; if he reviles my Lord, as you have heard, Sir John, how can I hope to escape?"

"Is it not enough, my Lord," Mr. Haredale continued, "that I, as good a gentleman as you, must hold my property, such as it is, by a trick at which the state connives because of these hard laws; and that we may not teach our youth in schools the common principles of right and wrong; but must we be denounced and ridden by such men as this! Here is a man to head your No-Popery cry, my Lord. For shame. For shame!"

The infatuated nobleman had glanced more than once at Sir John Chester, as if to enquire whether there was any truth in these statements concerning Gashford, and Sir John had as often plainly answered by a shrug or look, "Oh, dear me! no." He now said, in the same loud key, and in the same strange manner as before:

"I have nothing to say, sir, in reply, and no desire to hear any thing more. I beg you won't obtrude your conversation, or these personal attacks, upon me any further. I shall not be deterred from doing my duty to my countrymen, by any such attempts, whether they proceed from emissaries of the Pope or not, I assure you.—Come, Gashford!"

They had walked on a few paces while speaking, and were now at the Hall-door, through which they passed together. Mr. Haredale, without any leave-taking, turned away to the river-stairs, which were close at hand, and hailed the only boatman who remained there.

But the throng of people—the foremost of whom had heard every word that Lord George Gordon said, and among all of whom the rumour had been rapidly dispersed that the stranger was a Papist who was bearding him for his advocacy of the popular cause—came pouring out pell-mell, and, forcing the nobleman, his secretary, and Sir John Chester on before them, so that they appeared to be at their head, crowded to the top of the stairs where Mr. Haredale waited until the boat was ready, and there stood still, leaving him on a little clear space by himself.

They were not silent, however, though inactive. At first some indistinct mutterings arose among them, which were followed by a hiss or two, and these swelled by degrees into a perfect storm. Then one voice said, "Down with the Papists!" and there was a pretty general cheer, but nothing more. After a lull of a few moments, one man cried out, "Stone him;" another, "Duck him;" another, in a stentorian voice, "No Popery!" This favourite cry the rest re-echoed, and the mob, which might have been two hundred strong, joined in a general shout.

Mr. Haredale had stood calmly on the brink of the steps, until they made this demonstration, when he looked round contemptuously, and walked at a slow pace down the stairs. He was pretty near the boat, when Gashford, as if without intention, turned about, and directly afterwards a great stone was thrown by some hand in the crowd, which struck him on the head, and made him stagger like a drunken man.

The blood sprung freely from the wound, and trickled down his coat. He turned directly, and rushing up the steps with a boldness and a passion which made them all fall back, demanded:

"Who did that? Show me the man who hit me."

Not a soul moved; except some in the rear who slunk off, and, escaping to the other side of the way, looked on like indifferent spectators.

"Who did that?" he repeated. "Show me the man who did it. Dog, was it you? It was your deed, if not your hand—I know you."

He threw himself on Gashford as he said the words, and hurled him to the ground. There was a sudden motion in the crowd, and some laid hands upon him, but his sword was out, and they fell off again.

"My Lord—Sir John"—he cried, draw one of you—you are responsible for this outrage, and I look to you. Draw, if you are gentlemen." With that he struck Sir John upon the breast with the flat of his weapon, and with a burning face and flashing eyes stood upon his guard; alone, before them all.

For an instant, for the briefest space of time the mind can readily conceive, there was a change in Sir John's smooth face, such as no man ever saw there. The next moment he stepped forward, and laid one hand on Mr. Haredale's arm, while with the other he endeavoured to appease the crowd.

"My dear friend, my good Haredale, you are blinded with passion—it's very natural, extremely natural—but you don't know friends from foes."

"I know them all, sir, I can distinguish well"—he retorted, almost mad with rage. "Sir John, my Lord—do you hear me? Are you cowards?"

"Never mind, sir," said a man, forcing his way between and pushing him towards the stairs with friendly violence, "never mind asking that. For God's sake, get away. What CAN you do against this number? And there are as many more in the next street, who'll be round directly"—indeed they began to pour in as he said the words—"you'd be giddy from that cut in the first heat of the scuffle.—Now do retire, sir, or take my word for it you'll be worse used than you would be if every man in the crowd was a woman, and that woman Bloody Mary. Come sir, make haste, as quick as you can."

Mr. Haredale, who began to turn faint and sick, felt how sensible this advice was, and descended the steps with his unknown friend's assistance. John Grueby (for John it was) helped him into the boat, and giving her a shove off which sent her thirty feet into the tide, bade the waterman pull away like a Briton; and walked up again as composedly as if he had just landed.

There was at first a slight disposition on the part of the mob to resent this interference; but John looking particularly strong and cool, and wearing besides Lord George's livery, they thought better of it, and contented themselves with sending a shower of small missiles after the boat, which plashed harmlessly in the water, for she had by this time cleared the bridge, and was darting swiftly down the stream.

From this amusement they proceeded to giving Protestant knocks at the doors of private houses, breaking a few lamps, and assaulting some stray constables. But it being whispered that a detachment of Life Guards had been sent for, they took to their heels with great expedition, and left the street quite clear.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-FOURTH.

WHEN the concourse separated, and, dividing into chance clusters, drew off in various directions, there still remained upon the scene of the late disturbance, one man. This man was Gashford, who, bruised by the late fall, and hurt in a much greater degree by the indignity he had undergone, and the exposure of which he had been the victim, limped up and down, breathing curses and threats of vengeance.

It was not the secretary's nature to waste his wrath in words. While he vented the froth of his malevolence in these effusions he kept a steady eye on two men, who, having disappeared with the rest when the alarm was spread, had since returned, and were now visible in the moonlight, at no great distance, as they walked to and fro, and talked together.

He made no move towards them, but waited patiently on the dark side of the street, until they were tired of strolling backwards and forwards and walked away in company. Then he followed, but at some distance: keeping them in view, without appearing to have that object, or being seen by them.

They went up Parliament street, past Saint Martin's church, and away by Saint Giles's to Tottenham Court Road, at the back of which, upon the western side, was then a place called the Green Lanes. This was a retired spot, not of the choicest kind, leading into the fields. Great heaps of ashes; stagnant pools, overgrown with rank grass and duckweed; broken turnstiles, and the upright posts of palings long since carried off for firewood, which menaced all heedless walkers with their jagged and rusty nails, were the leading features of the landscape: while here and there a donkey, or a ragged horse, tethered to a stake, and cropping off a wretched meal from the coarse stunted turf, were quite in keeping with the scene, and would have suggested (if the houses had not done so sufficiently of themselves) how very poor the people who lived in the crazy huts adjacent, and how fool-hardy it might prove for one who carried money, or wore decent clothes, to walk that way alone, unless by daylight.

Poverty has its whims and shows of taste, as wealth has. Some of these cabins were turretted, some had false windows painted on their rotten walls; one had a mimic clock, upon a crazy tower of four feet high, which screened the chimney; each in its little patch of ground had a rude seat or arbour. The population dealt in bones, in rags, in broken glass, in old wheels, in birds, and dogs. These, in their several ways of stowage, filled the gardens; and shedding a perfume, not of the most delicious nature, in the air, filled it besides with yelps, and screams, and howling.

Into this retreat, the secretary followed the two men whom he had held in sight; and here he saw them safely lodged, in one of the meanest houses, which was but a room, and that of small dimensions. He waited without, until the sound of their voices, joined in a discordant song, assured him they were making merry; and then approaching the door, by means of a tottering plank which crossed the ditch in front, knocked at it with his hand.

"Muster Gashford!" said the man who opened it, taking his pipe from his mouth, in evident surprise. "Why, who'd have thought of this here honour! Walk in, Muster Gashford—walk in, sir."

Gashford required no second invitation, and entered with a gracious air. There was a fire in the rusty grate (for though the spring was pretty far advanced the nights were cold,) and on a stool beside it Hugh sat smoking. Dennis placed a chair, his only one, for the secretary, in front of the hearth; and took his seat again upon the stool he had left, when he rose to give the visiter admission.

"What's in the wind now, Muster Gashford?" he said, as he resumed his pipe, and looked at him askew. "Any orders from head-quarters? Are we going to begin? What is it, Muster Gashford?"

"Oh, nothing, nothing," rejoined the secretary, with a friendly nod to Hugh. "We have broken the ice, though. We had a little spurt to-day—eh, Dennis?"

"A very little one," growled the hangman. "Not half enough for me."

"Nor me either!" cried Hugh. "Give us something to do with life in it—with life in it, Master. Ha, ha!"

"Why, you wouldn't," said the secretary, with his worst expression of face, and in his mildest tones, "have any thing to do with—with death in it?"

"I don't know that," replied Hugh. "I'm open to orders. I don't care; not I."

"Nor I!" vociferated Dennis.

"Brave fellows!" said the secretary, in as pastor-like a voice as if he were commending them for some uncommon act of valour and generosity. "By-the-bye"—and here he stopped and warmed his hands: then suddenly looked up—"who threw that stone to-day?"

Mr. Dennis coughed and shook his head, as who should say, "A mystery indeed!" Hugh sat and smoked in silence.

"It was well done!" said the secretary, warming his hands again. "I should like to know that man."

"Would you?" said Dennis, after looking at his face to assure himself that he was serious. "Would you like to know that man, Muster Gashford?"

"I should indeed," replied the secretary.

"Why then, Lord love you," said the hangman, in his hoarsest chuckle, as he pointed with his pipe to Hugh, "there he sits. That's the man. My stars and halters, Muster Gashford," he added in a whisper, as he drew his stool close to him and jogged him with his elbow, "what a interesting blade he is! He wants as much holding in as a thorough-bred bull dog. If it hadn't been for me to-day, he'd have had that 'ere Roman down, and made a riot of it in another minute."

"And why not?" cried Hugh in a surly voice, as he overheard this last remark. "Where's the good of putting things off? Strike while the iron's hot; that's what I say."

"Ah!" retorted Dennis, shaking his head, with a kind of pity for his friend's ingenuous youth: but suppose the iron an't hot, brother? You must get people's blood up afore you strike, and have 'em in the humour. There wasn't quite enough to provoke 'em to-day, I tell you. If you'd had your way, you'd have spoilt the fun to come, and ruined us."

"Dennis is quite right," said Gashford, smoothly. "He is perfectly correct. Dennis has great knowledge of the world."

"I ought to have, Muster Gashford, seeing what a many people I've helped out of it, eh?" grinned the hangman, whispering the words behind his hand.

The secretary laughed at this jest as much as Dennis could desire, and when he had done, said, turning to Hugh:

"Dennis's policy was mine, as you may have observed. You saw, for instance, how I fell when I was set upon. I made no resistance. I did nothing to provoke an outbreak. Oh dear no!"

"No, by the Lord Harry!" cried Dennis with a noisy laugh, "you went down very quiet, Muster Gashford—and very flat besides. I thinks to myself at the time 'it's all up with Muster Gashford!' I never see a man lay flatter nor more still—with the life in him—than you did to-day. He's a rough 'un to play with, is that 'ere Papist, and that's the fact."

The secretary's face, as Dennis roared with laughter, and turned his wrinkled eyes on Hugh, who did the like, might have furnished a study for the devil's picture. He sat quite silent until they were serious again, and then said, looking round:

"We are very pleasant here; so very pleasant, Dennis, that but for my Lord's particular desire that I should sup with him, and the time being very near at hand, I should be inclined to stop, until it would be hardly safe to go homeward. I come upon a little business—yes, I do—as you supposed. It's very flattering to you, being this. If we ever should be obliged—and we can't tell, you know—this is a very uncertain world"—

"I believe you, Muster Gashford," interposed the hangman with a grave nod. "The uncertainties as I've seen in reference to this here state of existence, the unexpected contingencies as have come about!—Oh my eye!" And feeling the subject much too vast for expression, he puffed at his pipe again, and looked the rest.

"I say, resumed the secretary, in a slow, impressive way; "we can't tell what may come to pass; and if we should be obliged, against our wills, to have recourse to violence, my Lord (who has suffered terribly to-day, as far as words can go) consigns to you two—bearing in mind my recommendation of you both, as good staunch men, beyond all doubt and suspicion—the pleasant task of punishing this Haredale. You may do as you please with him, or his; provided that you show no mercy, and no quarter, and leave no two beams of his house standing where the builder placed them. You may sack it, burn it, do with it as you like, but it must come down; it must be razed to the ground, and he, and all belonging to him, left as shelterless as newborn infants whom their mothers have exposed. Do you nnderstand me?" said Gashford, pausing and pressing his hands together gently.

"Understand you, master!" cried Hugh. "You speak plain now. Why, this is hearty!"

"I knew you would like it," said Gashford, shaking him by the hand; "I thought you would. Good night! Don't rise, Dennis. I would rather find my way alone. I may have to make other visits here, and it's pleasant to come and go without disturbing you. I can find my way perfectly well.—Good night!"

He was gone, and had shut the door behind him. They looked at each other, and nodded approvingly. Dennis stirred up the fire.

"This looks a little more like business!" he said.

"Ay, indeed!" cried Hugh; "this suits me!"

"I've heerd it said of Muster Gashford," said the hangman, thoughtfully, "that he'd a surprising memory and wonderful firmness—that he never forgot, and never forgave. Let's drink his health!"

Hugh readily complied; pouring no liquor on the floor when he drank this toast; and they pledged the secretary as a man after their own hearts, in a bumper.

THE ORCHIS PYRAMIDALIS.

From the Ruins of Thurnham Castle, Kent.

BY DOUGLASS ALLPORT.

A FLOW'R is not a flow'r alone,
  A thousand sanctities invest it;
And as they form a radiant zone,
Around its simple beauty thrown,
Their magic tints become its own,
  As if their spirit had possessed it.

The sprightly morning's "breezy call,"
  And cool gray light around it streaming;
The holy calm of even-fall,
The majesty of night, and all
The glories of its starry pall Above it eloquently beaming.

"The precious things of heav'n—the dew"
  That on the turf beneath it trembled;
The distant landscape's tender blue,
The twilight of the woods that threw
Their solemn shadows where it grew,
  Are at its potent call assembled.

And while that simple plant, for me
  Brings all these varied charms together,
I hear the murmurs of the bee,
The splendour of the skies I see,
And breathe those airs that wander free
  O'er banks of thyme and blooming heather.

Thus, when within my sunless room,
  Heart-sick and mocked by mammon's leaven,
Thy pyramids of purple bloom,
Blush through its loneliness and gloom,
The spirit bursts its living tomb,
  And basks beneath the open heaven.

There, as on some green knoll reclined,
  The summer landscape round me glowing,
While gentle ardours fill the mind,
I leave th' unquiet world behind,
And hear a voice in every wind
  Around my fervid temples blowing.

The self-same voice, how calm and still!
  That rends the rock, and wakes in thunder,
Proclaiming from the tinkling rill,
The vocal copse, and breezy hill,
As meekly as the dews distil
  Its ceaseless ministries of wonder.

"Th' Eternal Power and Godhead" then,
  Is seen and loved in all around us;
Seen in the deep and dewy glen,
And loved to agonizing, when
We know ourselves to be but men,
  And feel this tabernacle bound us.

Thus through this wood-side plant, the mind
  Sweeps the vast range of things created,
And longs, and pants, and fails to find,
In earth, air, ocean, sky combined,
Those joys unfading and refined,
  By which its famine may be sated.

Its very cravings wean it hence,
  It anchors where its rest remaineth;
And who has pow'r to drive it thence?
Its helper is Omnipotence,
The Rock of Ages its defence,
  And sinlessness the prize it gaineth.

Part. XX.

While Mr. Pounce and Mr. Quod, after their own quaint fashion, are doing decisive battle with each other, as it were, in a remote corner of the field of action; while—to change the figure—Mr. Titmouse's pedigree is being subjected to the gloomy, silent, and mysterious inquisition of the ecclesiastical court, let us turn for a moment to contemplate a pitiable figure, a victim of the infernal machinations of Mr. Gammon—I mean the poor old Earl of Dreddlington. He was yet—a month after the death of his unhappy daughter, Lady Cecilia—staggering under the awful shock which he had experienced. Before he had been in any degree restored to consciousness, she had been buried for nearly three weeks; and the earliest notification to him of the melancholy occurrence, was the deep mourning habiliments of Miss Macspleuchan, who scarcely ever quitted his bedside. When, in a feeble and tremulous voice, he enquired as to the cause of her death, he could get no other account of it—either from Miss Macspleuchan, his physicians, or the Duke of Tantallan—than that it was occasioned by the shock of suddenly seeing his lordship brought home seriously ill, she being, moreover, in a very critical state of health. When, at length, he pressed Miss Macspeulchan upon the matter, and challenged her as to the real cause of what had happened—viz. the blighting discovery of Mr. Titmouse's illegitimacy—she resolutely maintained that he was labouring altogether under a delusion—indeed a double delusion; first, as to his imaginary conversation with Mr. Gammon, and secondly, as to his supposed communication of it to Lady Cecilia. Her heart was smitten, however, by the steadfast look of mournful incredulity with which the Earl regarded her from time to time; and, when alone, she reproached herself in tears with the fraud she was practising upon the desolate and broken-hearted old man. The duke, however, seconded by the physician, was peremptory on the point, believing that otherwise the earl's recovery was impossible; and as his grace invariably joined Miss Macspleuchan in scouting the mere mention of the matter as but the figment of a disordered brain, the earl was at length silenced if not convinced. He peremptorily prohibited Mr. Titmouse, however, from entering his house—much more from appearing in his presence; and there was little difficulty in causing him to appear satisfied that the sole cause of his exclusion was his cruelty and profligacy towards the late Lady Cecilia:—whereas, with a sickening inward shudder, he was apprised of the real reason by Mr. Gammon. Very shortly after the earl's illness, the Duke of Tantallan had sent for Mr. Titmouse to interrogate him upon the subject of his lordship's representations; but Mr. Gammon had been beforehand with the duke, and thoroughly tutored Titmouse—dull and weak though he was—in the part he was to play, and which Mr. Gammon made as easy to him as possible. He started with well-feigned astonishment, indignation, and disgust, as soon as the duke had mentioned the matter, and said very little (such were Gammon's peremptory injunctions)—and that little only in expression of amazement—that any one could attach the slightest importance to the mere wanderings of a disordered brain. 'Twas certainly a ticklish matter, the duke felt, to press too far, or to think of entrusting it to third parties. His grace very naturally concluded, that what his own superior tact and activity had failed in eliciting could be detected by no one else. He frequently pressed Mr. Gammon, however, upon the subject; but that gentleman maintained the same calm front he had exhibited when first challenged upon the subject; giving the same account of all he knew of Titmouse's pedigree—and clenching the matter by sending to his grace a copy of the brief, and of the short-hand writer's notes of the trial—challenging, at the same time, the most rigorous investigation into the matter. It was very natural for the duke, under these circumstances, to yield at length, and feel satisfied that the whole affair rested on no other basis than the distempered brain of his suffering kinsman. Nothing shook him more, however, than the sight of Titmouse: for he looked, verily, one whom it was exceedingly difficult to suppose possessed of one drop of aristocratic blood!—Miss Macspleuchan, a woman of superior acuteness, was infinitely more difficult to satisfy upon the subject than the duke; and though she said little, her manner showed that she was satisfied of the existence of some dreadful mystery or other, connected with Mr. Titmouse, of which Mr. Gammon was master—and the premature discovery of which had produced the deplorable effects upon the earl under which he was at that moment suffering. The earl, when alone with her, and unconscious of her presence, talked to himself constantly in the same strain; and when conversing with her, in his intervals of consciousness, repeated over and over again, without the slightest variation, facts which seemed as it were to have been burnt in upon his brain. Miss Macspleuchan had—to conceal nothing from the reader—begun to cherish very warm feelings of personal attachment to Mr. Gammon; whose striking person, fascinating conversation, and flattering attention to herself—a thing quite unusual on the part of any of the earl's visiters—were well calculated to conduce to such a result. But from the moment of Lord Dreddlington's having made the statements which had been attended by such dreadful consequences, her feelings towards Mr. Gammon had been completely chilled and alienated. Her demeanour, on the few occasions of their meeting, was constrained and distant; her countenance clouded with suspicion, her manners frozen with reserve and hauteur.

Mr. Gammon's first interview with the earl, after his illness and bereavement, had become a matter of absolute necessity—and was at his lordship's instance; his wishes being conveyed through the Duke of Tantallan, who had intimated to him that it was indeed indispensable, if only to settle some matters of business, of pressing exigency, connected with the failure of the Artificial Rain Company. The duke was with his noble kinsman at the time of Mr. Gammon's calling—having intended to be present at the interview. They awaited his arrival in the earl's library. It is very difficult to describe the feelings with which Mr. Gammon anticipated and prepared for the appointed interview with the man on whom he had inflicted such frightful evil, towards whom he felt that he had acted the part of a fiend. How had he dealt with the absolute and unrestrained confidence which the earl had reposed in him! The main prop and pillar of the earl's existence—family pride—he, Gammon, had snapped asunder beneath him; and as for fortune—Gammon knew that the earl was absolutely ruined. Not, however, that Gammon really felt any commiseration for his victim: his anxiety was only as to how he should extricate himself from liability in respect of it. And had he not cause for shuddering in approaching the earl on that occasion, to be interrogated concerning Titmouse—to look the earl in the face and deny what had passed between them;—and that, too, when the rigid investigation was pending which might within a few short weeks convict and expose him to the scorn—the indignation—of society, as a monster of fraud and falsehood?

The earl sat in his library, dressed in deep black, which hung upon his shrunk attenuated figure, as upon an old skeleton. He looked twenty years older than he appeared two short months ago. His hair, white as snow, his pallid emaciated cheek, his weak and wandering eye, and a slight tremulous motion about his head and shoulders—all showed the mere wreck of a man that he had become, and would have shocked and subdued the feelings of any beholder. What a contrast he presented to the portly and commanding figure of the Duke of Tantallan, who sat beside him, with a brow clouded by anxiety and apprehension! At length—"Mr. Gammon, my lord," said the servant, in a low tone, after gently opening the door.

"Show him in," said the duke, rather nervously, adding to the earl, in a hurried whisper, "now be calm, my dear Dreddlington—be calm—it will be over in a few minutes' time." The earl's lips quivered a little, his thin white hands trembled, and his eyes were directed to the door with a look of most mournful apprehension, as the fiend entered. Mr. Gammon was pale, and evidently nervous and excited; but his habitual self-command would have concealed it from any but a practised observer. What a glance was that with which he first saw the earl!—"It gives me deep concern, my lord," said he, in a low tone, slowly advancing with an air of profound deference and sympathy, "to see that you have been so great a sufferer!"

"Will you take a chair, sir?" said the duke, pointing to one which the servant had brought for him, and in which Gammon sat down, with a courteous inclination towards the duke, and observing that Lord Dreddlington's face had become suddenly flushed, while his lips moved as if he were speaking, "You see," said his grace, "that my Lord Dreddlington is but slowly recovering!"—Gammon sighed, and gazed at the earl with an expression of infinite concern.

"Is it true, sir?" enquired the earl, after a moment's interval of silence,—evidently with a desperate effort. Gammon felt both his companions eyeing him intently, as he answered calmly—"Alas!—your lordship of course alludes to that unhappy company"—

"Is it true, sir?" repeated the earl, altogether disregarding Gammon's attempt at evasion.

"You cannot but be aware, Mr. Gammon, of the subject to which my Lord Dreddlington is alluding," said the duke, in a low tone.

"Oh!" exclaimed Gammon, with a slight shrug of his shoulders, and a sigh—"I understand that your lordship is alluding to some conversation which you suppose has passed between us concerning Mr Titmouse."

"Sir—sir—yes! yes"—gasped the earl, gazing at him intently.

"Well, my lord, I have heard that you suppose I told your lordship that he was illegitimate."

"Ay," said the earl, with tremulous eagerness.

"Oh, my lord, you are really labouring under as complete a delusion as ever"—commenced Gammon, with a melancholy smile.

"Sir—Mr. Gammon—do you believe that there is NO GOD?—that HE does not know the—the"—interrupted the earl, but ceased, apparently overpowered by his emotions. Gammon looked in appealing silence at the Duke.

"What makes you imagine, sir, that I am bereft of reason and memory?" presently enquired the earl, with a strength of voice and manner which alarmed Gammon.

"I cannot account, my lord, for the extraordinary hallucination which seems"—

"And I suppose, sir, I am also in a delusion concerning the rent-charge for two thousand a year, which you have got on the Yatton pro—"

"Oh, pardon—pardon me, my lord! All pure—absolute delusion!" interrupted Gammon, with a confident smile, a look, and a tone of voice, that would have staggered the most incredulous.

The earl raised his thin, white, trembling hand, and pressed it against his forehead for a moment; and then said, turning to the duke—"He would deny that he is now in our presence!"

"My dear Dreddlington—don't, for God's sake, excite yourself," said the duke, anxiously; adding, after a pause, "I am as persuaded, as I am of my existence, that you're under a complete delusion! Recollect your serious illness—every one is subject to delusions of some sort or other when he's been so ill as you have!"

"Oh, Tantallan! Tantallan!" replied the earl, mournfully shaking his head—"I take God to witness how this man is lying!" The duke glanced hastily at Gammon as these words were uttered, and observed that he had grown suddenly pale, and was in the act of rising from his chair.

"Pray Mr. Gammon"—commenced the duke, imploringly.

"I can make very great allowance, I assure your grace, for his lordship's situation—but there are bounds which I allow no man living to overstep with impunity," said Gammon, calmly but resolutely—overjoyed at obtaining such a pretext for abruptly terminating the embarrassing interview—"and unless his lordship chooses instantly to retract what he has said, and apologise for it, I will never enter his presence again!"

"Oh—he had better go!" said the earl feebly, addressing the duke, evidently averting his face from Gammon with disgust and horror.

"Mr. Gammon, pray resume your seat," said the duke significantly—"I will undertake to warrant you in regarding the words as not having been spoken."

"I thank your grace," replied Gammon determinately—"I require an explicit retractation. I entertain a deep deference towards your grace, but am also aware of what is due to myself. My lord," he added, as if at a sudden impulse addressing the earl, "do permit me to request your lordship to withdraw and apologise for" ——— But the earl turned his face aside, and extended his hand towards Gammon, feebly motioning him away; on which, with a low bow to the Duke of Tantallan, Gammon took his hat and moved towards the door.

"Sir—Mr. Gammon—you must not go," said the duke earnestly—"you are here on business of pressing importance—all this must pass away and be forgotten."

"Your grace I shall be most happy to attend at any time, and any where; but this room I quit instantly."

"Then, sir, have the goodness to walk into the next room," said the duke somewhat imperiously, "and I will come to you presently." Mr. Gammon bowed, and withdrew.

"Oh God! how atrocious is the conduct of that man!" said the earl, when they were left alone.

"Really, Dreddlington, you must get rid of these —these—absurd notions."

"Let me never see his face again!" replied the earl feebly. "I have but a short time to live, and that time the sight of him, I feel, makes still shorter!" the duke looked both vexed and embarrassed.

"Come, come—now he's here, and on a very important errand—let us have done with him. Let us have him back, and I'll tell him you withdraw"——

"Withdraw! He is withdrawn," said the earl, confusedly.

"What d'ye mean, my dear Dreddlington? I say —let me tell him"——

"I mean, it was at his chambers, in Holborn—I pledge my honour, I recollect it as if it were yesterday"——

"Pho, pho!" cried the duke, rather impatiently—"it must be done! He's come on matters of the very last importance—the thing's been put off to the very latest moment on your account—that cursed company!" The earl looked up at his companion, and a faint smile flitted over his wasted features.

"Ah—I'm now satisfied," said he, shaking his head—"that they must dig a very great depth indeed before they come to the copper." The duke looked puzzled, but said, hastily, "That's right!—I'll have him back, and you'll allow me to say it's all a mistake?"

"Certainly—I am satisfied of it."

"That will do, my dear Dreddlington, that's the way such nonsense should be put an end to," said the duke, and, ringing the bell, ordered the servant to request Mr. Gammon to return. After a brief interval, that gentleman re-entered the library, but with some sternness and reluctance of manner.

"Mr. Gammon," replied the duke a little quickly, "my Lord Dreddlington owns he was mistaken—he, of course, withdraws the expression—so we had better at once to business"——

"Ay—certainly! certainly! Have you the papers with you, Mr. Gammon?" enquired the earl, while his trembling fingers were on his gold spectacles. Mr. Gammon bowed rather haughtily, and, resuming the chair he had quitted, drew it to the table, and opened a little packet of papers.

"It was a ridiculous affair, I am afraid, sir," said the earl, addressing Mr. Gammon, who felt a little surprised at the altered look and tone of the earl.

"I fear it was extremely unfortunate, my lord, in its issue," he replied gravely, arranging his papers.

"The thing did not look so absurd at first, Tantallan, I assure you!" said the earl, addressing the duke, who was eyeing Mr. Gammon's movements with much anxiety; for he had come prepared to state the final result of long negotiations between the creditors and the directors and shareholders of the Artificial Rain Company.

"These things never do—at first," his grace replied, with a sort of sigh.

"Just show us, Mr. Gammon, if you please, the diagrams and the sections of the strata"——

"The what?" enquired the duke, turning surprisedly to the earl—so did Mr. Gammon, and for a moment ceased arranging his papers. Both the duke and he turned pale, and gazed in silent dismay at their companion. Gammon felt momentarily sick at heart. It was evident that Lord Dreddlington's mind had gently given away. There was a smile of indescribable weakness flickering about the mouth; the eyes were unsteady; all sternness had vanished from his brow; and his manner was calm, with even an approach towards cheerfulness. Gammon glanced with horror at the duke, who, without removing his eyes from Lord Dreddlington, unconsciously exclaimed, "Oh my God!"

"Is it your lordship's pleasure"——faltered Gammon, his hands trembling visibly.

"You are right, Tantallan," said Lord Dreddlington, as if suddenly struck by the peculiar look with which the duke continued to regard him. "You shall hear all; but we must be alone. Sir, you may retire, and be in attendance another day," he added, abruptly addressing Gammon with all his former stateliness of manner, but with a feeble voice. Mr. Gammon, very greatly agitated, hastily put together the documents he had partially arranged on the table, and with a profound bow withdrew.

"At nine this evening—in Portman Square, sir, if you please," said the duke in an agitated manner.

"I will attend your grace," said Gammon, and with not a little trepidation closed the door after him; on which the earl proceeded, in a very anxious manner, to intimate the existence of a conspiracy on the part of the Earl of Fitzclaret and others, to prevent his—Lord Dreddlington's—obtaining a marquisate, on the ground that he had been connected with Sir Sharper Bubble in a swindling company; and his lordship had good grounds for believing that Mr. Gammon was secretly lending his assistance to the undertaking, and his coming there that morning with the papers relating to the intended purchase of the Isle of Dogs, was in furtherance of his treacherous objects! The duke listened in silent dismay to this rambling account of the imaginary conspiracy, and had just determined upon quietly sending for Miss Macspleuchan, when the earl abruptly paused, and after a confused stare at his companion, pressed his hand to his forehead, and said with hesitation and embarrassment—"Pray, Tantallan, don't think any thing more about what I have been saying! I—I—feel that I have been talking nonsense—incoherently. Surely it must have struck you so? Eh, Tantallan?"

There was something so imbecile and miserable in the look with which the earl regarded his companion, that the duke for a moment could not reply to him. At length, "My dear Dreddlington," said he, gently grasping his hand, "you are, at present, only a little excited—you will soon recover yourself. Let us ask Miss Macspleuchan to join us, as she is sitting all alone up stairs."

"Not just now, Tantallan—I feel I have wandered a little, but all is now right again. He is gone, is he?" The duke nodded. "The sight of that man was at first too much for me; I felt oppressed and confused, but I thought it right to struggle against it!—He denied it all!—Is not that enough to drive a man out of his senses?"

"My dear Dreddlington, we shall get wrong again—let us quit the subject," said the duke, anxiously.

"No," replied the earl, languidly, "do not fear me; I feel quite myself again! I can only repeat to you, that that man's conversation with me about—about"—he shuddered—"as certainly happened as the heavens are above us!" The earl had really, at all events for the present, recovered from the temporary confusion into which his thoughts had fallen; and proceeded, with as much energy as his shattered condition would admit of, to give the duke, as he had often done before, a distinct and consistent account of all that had taken place at Mr. Gammon's chambers:—and as he went on, it all of a sudden occurred to his grace, for the first time—how improbable is it that Lord Dreddlington should have invented a scene, which he has uniformly described in almost the same words? What but truth and reality could enable him to preserve such a consistency in a scene described with such a minute circumstantiality? Having once looked at the matter in this new light, every succeeding moment saw him more and more satisfied that such was the true view of it; and before he had quitted his unfortunate kinsman, he had pretty nearly convinced himself of three things; first, that Mr. Titmouse was a hideous, little base-born miscreant and impostor; secondly, that Mr. Gammon must be the profoundest scoundrel living; and lastly, that it was very singular that he—the duke—had been so long in arriving at such a conclusion. But then, it subsequently occurred to the sagacious duke—how was he to act? What position was he to assume with Mr. Gammon, when he came in the evening, in obedience to his grace's own appointment? What reasons could he assign for his sudden change of opinion? Nothing new had occurred: and he felt a little embarrassed, seeing that all he should be able to say, would be, that he had at length taken a different view of the facts! At all events he determined to put the brief of Mr. Titmouse's case, used at the trials, and which Mr. Gammon had some time before forwarded to his grace's house, into the hands of some eminent lawyer, for a candid and confidential opinion.

Mr. Gammon, on quitting Lord Dreddlington's house, quickly recovered from the momentary shock which he had suffered in the Earl's presence; and—shall I record the fact?—all other feelings were merged in one of delight and exultation at the awful calamity which had befallen Lord Dreddlington: no one, Mr. Gammon considered, would thenceforth think of attaching the least importance to any thing the Earl might say, or had said, which was doubtless the mere creation of a disordered brain. Then all that would be necessary, would be the silencing Titmouse—no difficult matter, since even he could comprehend that secrecy was to him a matter of salvation or destruction! But then, again, like a criminal's chance glance at the hideous guillotine in the distance—a recollection of the ecclesiastical enquiry at that instant in vigorous action, blanched the cheek of Mr. Gammon, and dashed all his new hopes to the ground. If those infernal inquisitors should discover all, and thereby demonstrate Titmouse's illegitimacy, how perfectly frightful would be the position of Mr. Gammon? What would then avail him the insanity of Lord Dreddlington? Would it not, on the contrary, be then attributed to the right cause—the atrocious cruelty and villany which had been practised upon him? How irretrievably was Gammon committed by his repeated and solemn asseverations to Miss Macspleuchan and the Earl of Dreddlington? The evidence which sufficed to entitle Mr. Aubrey to administer to Lady Stratton, would also suffice to entitle him to an immediate restoration to the Yatton property! And would the matter rest there? Would no steps be taken, in such an event, to fix him—Gammon—as a partner, or a prime mover, in the fraud and conspiracy by which alone, it would then be alleged, Titmouse had been enabled to recover the property? Absorbed by these pleasant contemplations, he was so lost to all around him, that he was within an ace of being crushed to death under the wheels of an enormous coal-wagon, which he had not seen approaching, as he crossed the street. It might, perhaps, have been well—it would certainly have saved him from a "sea of troubles," on which he may be tossed for the remainder of his life.

The chief object of Mr. Gammon's interview with the Earl of Dreddlington, had been to communicate to his lordship information concerning the very alarming position in which he stood with reference to the defunct Artificial Rain Company. The very prominent and active part which his lordship had been seduced into taking, in the patronage and management of that company, had very reasonably marked him out as the fittest object of attack to the creditors. The company held no Act of Parliament, nor charter, nor deed of settlement; it was simply a huge unwieldly partnership, consisting of all such persons as could be shown to be interested, or to have held themselves out as interested, in it; and consequently, whether individually known or not, liable to the public, who had dealt with the company, and given credit to it, on the very obvious principle of equity, that all who would seek to share the profits of the speculation must be responsible for its liabilities. In the present instance, had it not been for the circumstance of there being a considerable number of weak, inexperienced, but responsible adventurers, who, by entering into the speculation, had become liable to share Lord Dreddlington's burden of liability, his lordship must have been totally ruined to all intents and purposes. As soon as Sir Sharper Bubble's absconding had opened the eyes of the public, and of the shareholders, it became necessary to take instant measures for ascertaining the exact state of affairs,—and the liabilities which had been contracted on behalf of the company Heavens! what a frightful array of creditors now made their appearance against the Artificial Rain Company! It was inconceivable how so many, and to so immense an amount, could have arisen during the short period of the company's being in existence; but the fact is, that there are always thousands of persons who, as soon as they once see individuals of undoubted responsibility fairly committed to a company of this sort, will give almost unlimited credit, and supply any thing that may be ordered on behalf or for the purposes of the company. This company had originated in a supposed grand discovery of Doctor Diabolus Gander, that there were certain modes of operating upon the atmosphere, by means of electrical agency, which would ensure an abundant supply of rain in seasons of the greatest drought. Now, first and foremost among the creditors of the company, was that distinguished philosopher himself; who, to constitute himself effectually a creditor, had declined to take any shares in the concern. He now claimed £1700 for a series of "preliminary experiments," independently of compensation for his time and services in conducting the aforesaid experiments;—and, in order to put the question of liability beyond all doubt, the doctor had taken care, from time to time, to invite the more distinguished and wealthy of the shareholders to come and witness his experiments—always carefully noting down their names, and the names also of those witnesses who could prove their attendance—the interest they took in the experiments—their observations as to the success of the company, &c. &c., and their repeated acknowledgments of the uniform courtesy of the worthy doctor, who thought no pains too great to explain the nature of his surprising operations. Then, again, he had entered into an agreement, signed by Lord Dreddlington, and one or two others on behalf of the company, by which he was appointed "permanent scientific director" for a period of ten years, at a salary of £1000 a-year, over and above the sums agreed to be paid him for "collateral and supplementary services." This latter clause, however, the doctor very generously offered to compromise, in consideration of the exhalation of the company, on payment of four thousand pounds down. Then came a demand amounting to little short of £25,000 for an inconceivable quantity of copper wire, which had been purchased for the purpose of being used in all the cities and towns which chose to avail themselves of the services of the company, in the following way—viz. a complete circle of electric communication was to be obtained, by attaching wires to the summits of all the church steeples, and it was necessary that the wires should be of considerable strength and thickness, to prevent their being broken by birds flying against, and perching upon them: (But, Dr. Gander declared that he had discovered a mode of charging the wires, which would cause any bird which came into contact with them immediately to fall down dead.) Then there were fearful charges for at least nine miles' length of leaden pipes and hose, and for steam-engines, and electrical machines, and so forth; particularly an item of eight thousand pounds for the expenses of trying the experiment in a village in the extremity of Cornwall, and which was very nearly completed, when the unfortunate event occurred which occasioned the sudden break-up of the company. This will suffice to give the uninitiated reader a glimpse of the real nature of the liabilities incurred by those who had become partners in this splendid undertaking. Dr. Gander had two actions commenced the very day after the departure of Sir Sharper Bubble, against six of the principal shareholders, in respect of his "preliminary experiments," and his agreement for ten years' service; and writs came fluttering in almost daily; all which rendered it necessary to take measures for coming to an amicable compromise. After very great exertions, and attending many meetings, Mr. Gammon succeeded in provisionally extricating Lord Dreddlington, on his paying down, within twelve months, the sum of £18,000; the Duke of Tantallan was in for some £3000, the Marquis of Marmalade for £6000: and those two peers made the most solemn vows never to have any thing to do again with joint stock companies: though it must be owned, that they had been, as the phrase is, "let off easily." But I must not disguise from the reader that the Artificial Rain Company was not the only one with which these distinguished individuals, together with Lord Dreddlington, had become connected—there was the Gunpowder and Fresh Water Company, of which Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, were the solicitors—but sufficient for the day is the evil thereof; and let it suffice, for the present, to say, that some short time afterwards the Duke of Tantallan, on the part of the Earl of Dreddlington, paid down the sum of £10,000 on account of the above-mentioned sum of £18,000, the remainder of which was to be called for in six months' time. Mr. Gammon, however, could not think of the possibility of the Gunpowder Company's explosion without a shudder, on account of the dreadful extent to which Lord Dreddlington was implicated, and from which Gammon feared that there really was no means of extricating him. What would he have given never to have seduced the Earl into embarking into any such speculations? Nay, what would he not have given, never to have set eyes upon either the Earl of Dreddlington or the Lady Cecilia? What advantage had he ever gained, after all, by his desperate grasp after aristocratic connexion? If, however, the Earl should prove really and permanently insane, what a god-send would such an event be, in every point of view, to Gammon—silencing for ever the chief sufferer—and saving Gammon from all the endless vexations and anxieties arising out of personal explanations and collisions with the man whom he had drawn into the vortex of pecuniary ruin—from, in short, a world of reproaches and execrations.

As for Mr. Titmouse, the fortunate (!) possessor of ten thousand a year—as thousands, with a sigh of envy, regarded him—those of the public who had an opportunity of watching his public motions, gave him credit for feeling very deeply the melancholy bereavement which he has sustained in the loss of the Lady Cecilia; but those more intimately acquainted with his family circumstances, could not help remarking one little ingredient of pleasure in his recent cup of bitterness: viz. that as Lady Cecilia had left no offspring—no dear pledge of affection—Mr. Titmouse was not only saved a vast deal of anxiety as to the bringing up of the child, but had become himself heir-apparent to the barony of Drelingcourt on the death of the Earl of Dreddlington; who, whatever might be the effect of his whispered misfortunes in his pecuniary speculations, had not the power, being merely tenant for life under the entail, of injuring the fortune annexed to the title. Though Mr. Gammon loathed the very sight, the very thought, of Titmouse, he was yet the centre of prodigious anxiety to Gammon, who felt that he had, at all events at present, a deep stake in the upholding to the world Mr. Titmouse's position and credit. He had been frightened by Gammon into a state of the most abject submission to all his requirements—one of which was, the preservation of that external decorum, when in public, which had produced the very favourable impression already adverted to. The other was—a vast contraction of his expenditure. M. Gammon insisted upon his disposing of his house in Park Lane—which had, indeed, been for months almost destitute of furniture, that having fallen a prey to divers of his execution creditors—but engaged for him a suit of handsome furnished apartments in Chapel Street, May Fair, allowing him the attendance of a valet, as usual; and also hiring for him a cab, tiger, groom, and a couple of saddle-horses, with which Mr. Titmouse contrived to make an appearance, before so much of the world as was left in London during the autumn, suitable to his station. Some of the more clamorous of his creditors, Mr. Gammon had contrived to pacify by considerable payments on account, and a solemn assurance that every one of Mr. Titmouse's debts was in train for rapid liquidation. Could his creditors, indeed,—Gammon asked—fail to see and judge for themselves, what an altered man, in his person and habits, Mr. Titmouse had become, since the shock he had received on the death of Lady Cecilia! Had, indeed, Mr. Titmouse felt never so disposed to re-enter the scenes of gay and expensive profligacy—in which he had revelled so madly during the first eighteen months after his extraordinary exaltation—there was a serious obstacle to his doing so, in his having neglected to pay divers heavy "debts of honour," as they are strangely called; for which delinquencies he had twice had his nose pulled in public, and once been horsewhipped. The gates of the sporting world were thus finally closed against him, and thus one source of profligate expenditure shut out. Though, however, he was free to ride or drive whithersoever he chose—and that, too, as became a man of fashion, in respect of appearance and equipment—he felt but a prisoner at large, and dependent entirely upon the will and pleasure of Mr. Gammon for his very means of subsistence. Most of his evenings were spent in such of the theatres as were open, while his nights were often passed amidst scenes which were very strange ones indeed for a young widower to be seen in! Though he was a frequent visiter at Brookes's, I must nevertheless do that respectable club the justice of saying, that its members were not very anxious for the presence or company of Mr. Titmouse. In fact, but for the continued countenance afforded to him, for reasons best known to that gentleman, by Mr. O'Gibbet, my friend would have been some time ago unceremoniously expelled from the club, where he had made, certainly, one or two exceedingly disagreeable exhibitions. Liquor was made for fools to get drunk with, and to shorten their encumbering existence upon the earth; and as for Titmouse, I really do not think he ever went to bed completely sober; and he avowed, that "whenever he was alone, he felt so miserable;" and there was only one way, he said, which he knew of to "drive dull care away." Though aware of it in point of fact, Titmouse had neither sense nor sensibility enough to appreciate the fearful frailty of that tenure by which he held his present advantages of station—never reflecting that he was liable at any moment to be precipitated down from his present elevation, far deeper into obscurity and poverty than he had ever emerged from! He had no power of enhancing his enjoyment of the present, either by vivid contrast with the past, or with the possible reverses of the future. A wealthy and profligate fool is by no means the enviable person he may appear to silly lookers-on; but what must he be when placed in the circumstances of Titmouse; He found town, at a dull season—the fall of the year—to be sure, become daily duller, the sphere of his enjoyments having become so miserably contracted. Mr. Gammon was becoming more and more stern and gloomy; in fact, Titmouse always dreaded to go near him, and enjoined on him, whenever they met, a circumspection which was new and intolerable. He was refused admission at Lord Dreddlington's; the Duke of Tantallan's he dared not go near. When, in the park, he met the Earl's chariot—a dismal object indeed to him—driving slowly along—all in deep mourning—the place of Lady Cecilia occupied now by Miss Macspleuchan, and the shattered old white-haired man beside her, taking evidently no notice of any thing about him; if Titmouse caught Miss Macspleuchan's eye, it was instantly removed, as from a disagreeable object. He never met the carriage without a shudder, and a violent one, at thought of the frightful fraud of which he had been at first the unconscious instrument, but to which he was now a consenting party. He had earnestly besought Mr. Gammon to allow him to spend a few months on the Continent, and provide him with funds to do so; but on due consideration, Mr. Gammon refused, in the very critical conjuncture of existing circumstances—at all events till he should have been furnished with some clue to the course which the pending investigation was taking. But Mr. Gammon consented to his going down to Yatton; so down he went, but to encounter only sullen faces; servants whose wages were in arrear; tenants whom his exactions were ruining; the friends of Mudflint and Bloodsuck indignant at his not coming forward to rescue them from impending destruction; and his constituency furious at the number of bills remaining unpaid; at his total disregard of their interests in Parliament; and his contemptible and ridiculous conduct and appearance there. As for any of the nobility or gentry of the neighbourhood, of course their notice of him was quite out of the question. From good little Dr. Tatham, even, he could get nothing more than a cold and guarded civility; in fact, Mr. Titmouse was fifty times more miserable at Yatton than he had been in London; and, moreover, the old hall had been completely stripped of the handsome furniture that had been put into it on his coming into possession, by his voracious execution-creditors; and all he could do here to enjoy existence, was to smoke, and drink brandy and water. He felt an imposter; that he had no right to be there; no claim to the respect or attention of any one. Through the noble grounds of Yatton, amidst the soft melancholy sunshine of October, he walked, frightened and alone; a falling leaf alighting on him would make him start with apprehension, and almost drop his segar. While such was the dreary aspect of things at Yatton, what was the condition of Mr. Gammon in London?

It is not possible that any one who betakes himself to tortuous modes of effecting his purposes, and securing the objects which a keen ambition may have proposed to him, can be happy. The perpetual dread of detection and failure, causes him to lie, as it were, ever writhing upon a bed of torture. To feel one's-self failing, in spite of deeply-laid, desperate, and dishonourable schemes for securing success, is sickening and miserable indeed! Such a one feels that the bitterness of disappointment will not be mitigated or assuaged by a consciousness of the sympathy and respect of those who have witnessed the unsuccessful attempts—a thought which is deadening to the soul; and Gammon felt himself among the most miserable of mankind. All other anxieties were, however, at present absorbed in one—that concerning the issue of the enquiry then pending; and which, as it were, darkened his spirit within him, and hung round his neck like a mill-stone. If the issue of that enquiry should be adverse—he had absolutely nothing for it but instant flight from universal scorn and execration. Of what avail would then be all his prodigious anxieties, sacrifices, and exertions, his deep-laid and complicated plans and purposes! He would have irretrievably damned himself, for what! To allow the wretch Titmouse to revel, for a season, in unbounded luxury and profligacy! What single personal advantage had Mr. Gammon hitherto obtained for himself, taxed to the utmost as had been his powerful energies for the last three years! First of all, as to Miss Aubrey, the lovely object of his intense desires—what advance had he made towards the accomplishment of his objects, after all his profound and cruel treachery against her brother! Not a hair's breadth. Nay, on the contrary, the slight footing of intimacy which he had contrived, in the first instance, to secure, he had now lost for ever. Could they have failed to perceive, in spite of all his devices, his hand in the recent persecution of Mr. Aubrey! The stern deportment of Mr. Runnington, who had expressly prohibited, on the part of Mr. Aubrey, all communication with that gentleman on the part of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, except through himself—the aforesaid Mr. Runnington—spoke volumes. Moreover, Mr. Gammon had chanced to be prowling about Vivian Street on the very evening on which Lord de la Zouch made his unexpected appearance with Mr. Aubrey, as already described; and Mr. Gammon had seen Mr. Aubrey, Mrs. Aubrey, and Miss Aubrey, followed by his lordship, enter his carriage, in dinner costume; and he thought with a violent pang of one Mr. Delamere! He had also ascertained how suddenly his lordship had come over from Paris—just at that crisis in the circumstances of the Aubreys; and how probable was it, that his lordship's potent interference had originated the formidable proceedings of the Ecclesiastical court! And suppose the result of these proceedings should be, to detect the imposition by means of which Titmouse had been enabled to oust Mr. Aubrey from Yatton—what must she—what must they all—think of Mr. Gammon, after his avowal to Miss Aubrey! Inevitably, that he had either originally contrived, or was now conniving at the imposture! And what if she really were now all the while engaged to the future Lord de la Zouch! And if the present Lord de la Zouch, with his immense revenues were resolved to bear Mr. Aubrey through all his difficulties and troubles with a high hand! Had not Gammon already felt the heavy hand of Lord de la Zouch in the late accursed bribery actions! And suppose him stimulated to set on foot the pending proceedings, by the communication of Miss Aubrey concerning Mr. Gammon's own admissions to her—was his lordship likely to falter in his purposes!

Look again at the financial difficulties which were thickening around him. Between sixty and seventy thousand pounds had been already raised on mortgage of the Yatton estates!—and not a shilling more could now be raised without additional and collateral security, which Gammon could not procure. Then there was the interest payable half yearly on these mortgages, which alone swallowed up some £3500 annually. In addition to this, Titmouse was over head and ears in debt; and he must be supported all the while in a manner suitable to his station; and an establishment must be kept up at Yatton. How, with all this, was Mr. Gammon's own dearly-bought rent-charge to be realised! The already over-burdened property was totally unequal to bear this additional pressure. Again, if his motion which was to be made in the ensuing term for a new trial in the case of Wigley v. Gammon should fail, there he was left at the mercy of the plaintiff for a sum very nearly amounting to £4000, (including the heavy costs,) and capable of being immediately enforced by incarceration of his person, or seizure of his goods! Mr. Gammon, moreover, had been unfortunate in some gambling speculations in the funds, by which means the money he had so quickly made, had been as quickly lost. It was true, there were the probable proceeds of the two promissory notes now put in suit against Mr. Aubrey, and also the bond of Lord de la Zouch himself, in all amounting to twenty thousand pounds with interest: but months must necessarily elapse before, even in the ordinary course, the actions for the recovery of these sums could be brought to a successful issue—to say nothing of any disastrous occurrence which Gammon could just conceive the possibility of, and which might have the effect of fatally impugning the right of action of Mr. Titmouse. Gammon had repeatedly turned in his mind the propriety of raising money by assignment of the bond of Lord de la Zouch, but for several reasons he had deemed it inexpedient to venture upon such a step. For instance, the bond would be due within a month or two; and who would advance any serious sum on so large a security, without rigorous enquiries into the validity of the bond in point of exaction, and the right of the obligee to put it in suit? Supposing the issue of the ecclesiastical enquiry to be adverse, and Titmouse's title to the Yatton property to be destroyed; would not that at once invalidate his claims upon the bond, and also upon the two promissory notes? Lastly, his hopes of political advancement, to which he clung with incredible tenacity, full blooming though they had been till the moment of his being sued for the bribery penalties, were all in danger of being blighted for ever, unless he could succeed in defeating the verdict during the ensuing term, of which he entertained scarce any hope at all. But even supposing him successful there—what was to become of him if the issue of the pending ecclesiastical proceedings should brand him as abetting imposture of the most gross and glaring description—nay, as being, in fact, its originator?

Thus, success or failure in the ecclesiastical suit, was in fact the pivot upon which every thing turned with Mr. Gammon—it would be either his salvation or his destruction; and the thought of it kept him in a state of feverish trepidation and excitement, from morning to night—rendering him almost wholly incapable of attending to his professional business. He had gone down several times, accompanied by Mr. Quod, to ascertain, as far as was practicable, the course which things were taking. Mr. Quod was very sanguine indeed as to the issue; but, alas! Gammon had not ventured to tell him the true state of the case: so that Quod naturally confined himself to the substantiating of Mr. Titmouse's pedigree, as it had been propounded, and with success, at the trial of ejectment. Mr. Gammon trembled at the systematic and vigorous prosecution of the cause on the part of Mr. Aubrey; what might it not elicit! Regardless of the consequences, he had several times tried to ascertain from those who had been examined, the course of enquiry which had been pursued, and the evidence which had been obtained from them—but in vain: some of the witnesses were in a station of society which repelled his advances; and others were effectually deterred from communicativeness by the injunctions of the commissioner. Thus Mr. Gammon could ascertain nothing—and was left to await, in fearful suspense, the legitimate issue of this tantalising and mysterious process, till the day when "publication" should "pass," and both parties be put in possession of all the evidence which had been obtained.

The prospects of the Aubreys, brightened though they had been by the sudden interference of Lord de la Zouch, at the very moment of their deepest gloom, did not disturb that calm and peaceful course of life which they had maintained through all their troubles. Oh, how animated and happy, however, was now that little family!—and that not through any overweening confidence as to the result of Lord de la Zouch's operations on their behalf, but from a pious and cheerful persuasion that they were not forsaken of Heaven, which had given this token of its remembrance. The beautiful bloom began to reappear on the cheeks both of Mrs. Aubrey and Kate, and the eye of Mr. Aubrey was no longer laden with gloom and anxiety. He pursued the study of the law with steadfast energy till the period of Mr. Mansfield's quitting town, and his chambers being closed till the beginning of November. The Aubreys, poor souls! secretly pined for a glimpse, however brief, of the pleasures of the country; and about the middle of September, they, sure enough, received a very pressing invitation from Lord and Lady de la Zouch, for all of them to join them in France, by way of a total and enlivening change of scene. Mrs. Aubrey and Kate had all but persuaded Mr. Aubrey into an acceptance of the kind invitation, when he suddenly thought of what he deemed an insuperable obstacle. It will be borne in mind that Mr. Aubrey had given bail to a very large amount, nearly sixteen thousand pounds, in the two actions at the suit of Mr. Titmouse, and of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap; and, on enquiry, two of the friends who had become bail for him were abroad, and could not be communicated with; so Mr. Aubrey peremptorily refused, under such circumstances, to quit the country, though for ever so brief an interval. On seriously assuring Lord de la Zouch that there existed insuperable objections to his just then leaving England, the ever-active kindness of his noble friend prompted a fresh proposal,—that they should, within a week's time, all of them, set off for a lovely residence of his lordship's in Essex, some fifteen miles from town, called Tunstall Priory—where they would find every thing fully prepared for their reception, and where they were earnestly entreated to remain till they should be joined by their host and hostess from France, about the latter end of October. 'Tis quite impossible for me to describe the exhilaration of spirits with which, the invitation having been most gratefully accepted by Mr. Aubrey, they all prepared for their little journey. Mr. Aubrey had made arrangements for their going down by one of the coaches, which went within a couple of miles of the Priory; but here again the thoughtful delicacy and kindness of his lordship was manifest; for the evening before they set off, one of the servants from Dover Street came to ask at what hour they would wish the carriage to call for them, and the van for their luggage—such being the orders which had come from his lordship; and further, that the carriage was to remain at their command during the whole of their stay at the Priory. Both Mrs. Aubrey and Kate, in their excitement, burst into tears on hearing of this additional trait of anxious and considerate kindness. Oh! it would have cheered your heart, good reader, to see the blithe faces and bounding spirits with which that little family set off on the ensuing morning on their expedition. Oh! how refreshing was the country air!—how enlivening and beautiful the country scenery amid the gentle sunlight of September!—'Twas a little paradise of a place—and as day after day glided away, they felt a sense of the enjoyment of existence, such as they had never experienced before!

Though it is not a very pleasant transition, the order of events requires us to return to town,—and to no very pleasant part of town, viz. Thavies' Inn. 'Twas about eight o'clock in the evening, towards the close of October, and Mr. Gammon was walking to and fro about his room, which was cheerful with the light of a lamp and the warmth of a fire. He himself, however, was very far from cheerful—he was in a state of exquisite anxiety and suspense—and well he might be, for he was in momentary expectation of receiving a copy of the evidence which had been taken on the part of Mr. Aubrey, in the ecclesiastical suit, publication having passed the day before. He muttered blighting curses at the intolerable delay of old Mr. Quod, who, Mr. Gammon was assured, might have procured a copy of the evidence several hours before, with only moderate exertion. Twice had Mr. Gammon's messenger been despatched in vain; and he was now absent on the third errand to Mr. Quod's chambers. At length Mr. Gammon heard a heavy footstep ascending the stairs—he knew it, and, darting to the door, opened it just as his messenger had reached the landing with a bulky white packet under his arm, sealed, and tied with red tape.

"Ah!—that will do. Thank you, thank you!—call to-morrow morning," said Gammon hastily, almost snatching the packet out of the man's hand.

"Mrs. Brown—don't let me be disturbed to-night by any one—on any consideration," said he to his laundress; and, having ordered her to close the outer door, he re-entered his sitting room, and with a beating heart burst open the seals, tape, and cartridge-paper, and fastened in an instant with devouring eyes upon the pregnant enclosure. Over page after page his eye glanced with lightning speed, his breath unconsciously accelerating the while. When he had got to about the middle of it, his breath was for a minute or so suspended, while his affrighted eye travelled down a couple of pages, which told him all—all he had feared to see, and more—more than he had known himself. "Ah, perdition, the game is up!" he faintly exclaimed, and, rising from his chair, threw himself down upon the sofa, in a state of dismay and bewilderment which no words of mine are powerful enough to describe.

Quite as much anxiety had been felt on the same subject in a different quarter, during the whole of the day at the Priory; where were still the Aubreys, who had been joined a week before by Lord and Lady de la Zouch, and Mr. Delamere, for he had come over with them from the continent. Mr. Runnington had written to assure Mr. Aubrey, that the first moment of his being able to procure a copy of the evidence, he would come down post with it. As, however, nine o'clock elapsed without his having made his appearance, Mr. Delamere slipped out, and, without announcing his intention, ordered his groom to have his horses in readiness, instantly; and within a quarter of an hour's time he was on his way to town, having left a hasty verbal message, acquainting Lord and Lady de la Zouch of the object of his sudden move. When he reached M. Runnington's offices he found no one there, to his infinite disappointment. Having slept in Dover Street, he reappeared at Mr. Runnington's about ten o'clock the next morning, and found a chaise and four at the door, into which Mr. Runnington, with a large packet under his arm, was in the very act of entering, to drive down to the Priory.

"How is it—for God's sake!" said Mr. Delamere, rushing forward to Mr. Runnington, who was sufficiently surprised at seeing him.

"Oh, thank God! The battle's ours!"—replied Mr. Runnington with delighted excitement. "The murder's out!—I'll pledge my existence that within six months' time we have them all back at Yatton!"

"You are off, are not you?" enquired Delamere, as excited as himself—

"To be sure—won't you come with me?" replied Mr. Runnington.

"Rattle away, my lads!" cried out Delamere to the post-boys—and the next moment they were on their way, and at indeed a rattling pace. In somewnere about an hour and a quarter's time, the reeking horses and dusty chaise dashed up to the hall door of the Priory; and, as Delamere caught one or two figures standing at the windows, he waved his white handkerchief in triumph through the chaise window. That brought Lord and Lady de la Zouch, and Mr. and Mrs. Aubrey, breathless to the door—out jumped Delamere, without waiting for the steps to be let down, and, grasping the hands of all four, exclaimed with enthusiasm—"Victory!—Victory!—but where is she?"—

"Somewhere in the grounds, sir, replied a servant."

"Mr. Runnington will tell you all—said Delamere; and, springing off the steps, was out of sight in a twinkling, in quest of Miss Aubrey—burning to be the first with the joyful news. He soon caught sight of her graceful figure—she was standing with her back towards him, apparently in a musing posture, gazing at the bubbling rivulet. Hearing his bounding steps, she turned round, and started at seeing him.

"Oh, Miss Aubrey—Kate, Kate!"—he stammered, breathlessly—"By Heavens, we've won!"—Miss Aubrey turned very pale.

"Oh, Mr. Delamere—you cannot be—I hope you are not mistaken," said she faintly.

"On my sacred word of honour, I have seen—I have read it all myself! 'Tis as sure as that the sun is shining—'Tis all up with the villains!" Miss Aubrey made him no answer; her cheek continued white as that of a statue; and it was absolutely necessary that he should put his arm round her,—if he had not, she would have fallen.

"Come!—Come! My sweet, my lovely Kate! Rouse yourself!" cried he with fond anxiety, and pressed his lips gently on her forehead—a liberty of which she was probably not conscious, for she made no show of resistance. Presently she heaved a deep sigh, her eyes opened, and, finding herself entirely in his embrace, she made a slight effort to disengage herself, but in vain. He was supporting her on one knee—for there was no bench or seat within view. She burst into tears, and they soon relieved her pent-up bosom of its excitement.

"Dearest Kate—it's glorious news, and I have been too hasty with it."

"No—no—Mr. Delamere! I am only overpowered with joy and with gratitude! Oh, Mr. Delamere, I could sink out of your sight!"

"Pho! my own angel!—Don't make me miserable by talking in that strain."

"Well, what shall I say?" cried she passionately, bursting again into tears, and turning her face from him, feeling that it was reddening.

"Say, Kate! That you will let me love you, and will love me in return! Come, my own Kate! Heaven smiles on you—smile you on me!" She spoke not—but sobbed, her face still averted from him.

"I know you won't say me nay, Kate, if it's only for the news I've brought you express"—said Delamere ardently, and imprinted a passionate kiss on her unresisting lips.

"My sweet Kate! how I have thought of you in every part of the world in which I've been—commenced Delamere, after having a second, and a third, and a fourth time imprinted his lips upon the ripe and rosy lips of his beautiful mistress—and Heaven only knows what other absurdities he might have been guilty of, when, to Kate's inconceivable embarrassment, behold a sudden turn brought them full in view of Lord and Lady de la Zouch and Mr. Runnington.

"My dear Miss Aubrey," cried Lord de la Zouch,

"we have come to congratulate you on this great event!" and he grasped her affectionately by the hands, and then Lady de la Zouch embraced her future daughter-in-law, whose cheeks burned like fire, while those of Mr. Delamere tingled a little.

"Upon my honour, sir, you seem to have been making hay while the sun shines," said his lordship in a low tone, and laughing, having left Miss Aubrey and Lady de la Zouch together for a few moments.

"Dearest Lady de la Zouch, how did my brother bear it?" enquired Miss Aubrey.

"He bore it with calmness, though he turned very pale; but poor Mrs. Aubrey was very painfully excited—it was really a most affecting scene. But she is much better now—shall we return to the house?—By the way," added she slyly, "now you're come into your fortune, as the saying is, Kate—I—I suppose Geoffrey has been talking nonsense to you." Poor Kate blushed deeply, and burst into tears.

That was a happy day, and Mr. Runnington, having been compelled to stay to dinner, returned home at a late hour, feeling already richly repaid for all his exertions. Miss Aubrey sat up till a late hour in her own room, writing, according to a promise she had given, a very long letter to Dr. Tatham, in which she gave him as full an account as she could of the surprising and decisive event that had happened. 'Twas quite the letter of a daughter to a fond father—full of ardent affection, and joyous anticipations of seeing him again; but as to the other little incident of the day, which concerned herself personally, Kate paused—laid down her pen—resumed it—blushed—hesitated—and at length extinguished her taper and retired to rest, saying to herself that she would think of it, and make up her mind by the morning.

The letter went off, however, after all, without the slightest allusion to the possibility of its lovely writer becoming a future Lady de la Zouch.

But it is now high time that the reader should be put in possession of the important disclosures produced by the ecclesiastical enquiry: and we must for a while lose sight of the happy Aubreys, and the gloomy, discomfited Gammon, in order to become acquainted with the exact state of facts which had called forth such violent and opposite emotions.

The reader may possibly bear in mind that Mr. Titmouse had established his right to succeed to the Yatton property, then enjoyed by Mr. Aubrey, by making out to the satisfaction of the jury, on the trial at York, that he, the aforesaid Mr. Titmouse, was descended from an elder branch of the Aubrey family: that there had existed an unsuspected female descendant of Stephen Dreddlington, the elder brother of Geoffry Dreddlington, through whom Mr. Aubrey derived his claim to the succession; and that this obscure female had left issue equally obscure and unsuspected—viz. Gabriel Tittlebat Titmouse—to whom our friend Titmouse was shown to be heir-at-law. In fact, it had been shown in open court, by clear and satisfactory evidence, First, that the aforesaid Gabriel Tittlebat Titmouse was the direct descendant of Stephen Dreddlington; Secondly, the marriage of Gabriel Tittlebat Titmouse; Thirdly, the birth of Tittlebat Titmouse, the first, and indeed the only issue of that marriage. All these were not only proved, but unquestionable facts; and from them, as far as descent went, the preferable right of Titmouse to that of Aubrey, resulted as an inevitable inference, and the verdict went accordingly. But as soon as, according to the happy and invaluable suggestion of the Attorney-General, a rigid inquiry had been instituted on the spot, whence the oral and documentary evidence had been obtained by Mr. Gammon—an enquiry conducted by persons infinitely more familiar with such matters than common lawyers, those acute and indefatigable inquisitors succeeded in making the following remarkable discovery. It was found that the two old witnesses who had been called to prove that part of the case, on the trial, had since died—one of them very recently. But in pushing their enquiries, one or two other old witnesses were met with who had not been called by Mr. Gammon, even if he had been aware of their existence; and one of these, an old man, while being closely interrogated upon another matter, happened to let fall some expressions which startled the person making minutes of the evidence; for he spoke of Mr. Titmouse's mother under three different names, Gubbins, Oakley, and Johnson. Now, the proof of the trial had been simply the marriage of Gabriel Tittlebat Titmouse, by bans, to Janet Johnson, spinster. Either, then, both the witnesses must be mistaken as to her having had other names, or there must be some strange mystery at the bottom of it—and so it at length turned out. This woman's maiden name had been Gubbins; then she had married a ropemaker, of the name of Oakley, in Staffordshire, but had separated from him, after two or three years' quarrelsome cohabitation, and gone into Yorkshire, where she had resided for some time with an aunt—in fact, no other person than old blind Bess. Afterwards, she had become acquainted with Gabriel Tittlebat Titmouse; and, to conceal the fact of her previous marriage—her husband being alive at the time—she was married to Gabriel Titmouse under the name of "Johnson." Two years afterwards, this exemplary female died, leaving an only child, Tittlebat Titmouse. Shortly afterwards, his father came up to London, bringing with him his little son—and some five years afterwards died, leaving a few hundred pounds behind him for the bringing up Tittlebat decently—a duty undertaken by a distant relative of his father, and who had been dead some years. Of course Titmouse, at the time when he was first presented to the reader, knew no more than the dead of his being in any way connected with the distinguished family of the Aubreys in Yorkshire; nor of the very unpleasant circumstances attending his mother's marriage, with which the reader has just been made acquainted. Nothing can be easier than to conceive how Mr. Gammon might have been able, even if acquainted with the true state of the facts, to produce an impregnable case in court by calling, with judgment, only that evidence which was required to show the marriage of Titmouse's father with Janet Johnson—viz. an examined copy of an entry in the parish register of Grillston, of the fact of the marriage under the names specified, and some other slight evidence of the identity of the parties. How was the Attorney-General, or any one advising him, to have got at the mystery attending the name of "Johnson," in the absence of suspicion pointed precisely at that circumstance? The defendant, in an action of ejectment, is necessarily in a great measure in the dark as to the evidence which will be adduced against him, and must fight the evidence as it is presented to him in court; and the plaintiff's attorney is generally better advised than to bring into court witnesses who may be able, if pressed, to disclose more than is necessary or desirable.

The way in which Mr. Gammon became acquainted with the true state of the case was singular. While engaged in obtaining and arranging the evidence in support of the plaintiff's case, under the guidance of Mr. Lynx's opinion, Mr. Gammon stumbled upon a witness who dropped one or two expressions, which suddenly reminded him of two like documents which had been some time before put into his possession, without his then attaching the least importance to them. He was so disturbed at the coincidence, that he returned to town that very night to inspect the papers in question. They had been obtained by Snap from Old Blind Bess: in fact, (inter nos,) he had purloined them from her on one of the occasions of his being with her in the manner long ago described, having found them in an old Bible, which was in a still older canvass bag; and they consisted of, first, a letter from one James Oakley to his wife, informing her that he was dying, and that having heard she was living with another man, he exhorted her to leave her wicked courses before she died; secondly, a letter from one Gabriel Titmouse to his wife, reproaching her with drunkenness and loose conduct, and saying that she knew as well as he did, that he could transport her any day he liked; therefore, she had better mind what she was about. This letter was written in the county jail, where he had been sent for some offence against the game laws. Old Blind Bess had been very feeble when her niece came to live with her; and, though aware of her profligate conduct, had never dreamed of the connexion between the great family at the Hall and her niece's child. These were the two documents which Mr. Titmouse had destroyed, on Gammon's having entrusted them for a moment into his hands. Though I do not attach so much importance to them as Mr. Gammon did—since I cannot see how they could have been made available evidence for any purpose contemplated by Gammon—I am not surprised at his doing so. They were infinitely too dangerous documents to admit of his taking the opinion of counsel upon; he therefore kept them entirely to himself, as also the discovery to which they led, not trusting his secret even to either of his partners. Before the case had come into court, Mr. Gammon had been in possession of the facts now laid for the first time before the reader—contemplating, from the first, the use to be thereafter made of the prodigious power he should have become possessed of, in aid of his own personal advancement. Thus was Titmouse base born indeed—in fact, doubly illegitimate; for, first, his mother was guilty of bigamy in marrying his father; and, secondly, had that not been so, her marrying under a false name was sufficient to make the marriage utterly void, and equally, of course, to bastardise her issue.

Such, then, was the damning discovery effected by the ecclesiastical commission, and which would by and by blazon to the whole world, the astounding fact, that this doubly base born little miscreant had been enabled, by the profound machinations of Mr. Gammon, not only to deprive Mr. Aubrey of the Yatton estates, but also to intermarry with the Lady Cecilia, the last of the direct line of the noble Dreddlingtons and Drelincourts—to defile the blood, and blight the honour, of perhaps the oldest and the proudest of the nobility of England. Upon Mr. Gammon, it lit like a thunderbolt. For many hours he seemed to have been utterly crushed and blasted by it. His faculties appeared paralysed. He was totally incapable of realising his position—of contemplating the prodigious and appalling consequences which must inevitably and almost immediately ensue. He lay upon the sofa the whole night without closing his eyes, or having moved a muscle since he had thrown himself down upon it. His laundress came in with his bed-candle, trimmed the lamp, stirred the fire, and withdrew, supposing him asleep. The fire went out—then the lamp—and when, about eight o'clock the next morning, his laundress reappeared, he still lay on the sofa; and a glimpse of his pale and haggard face alarmed her greatly, and she went for a medical man before he was aware of her having done so. On her returning, and informing him of what she had done, it roused him from his lethargy, and, rising from the sofa, he desired her to go back and request the medical man not to come, as it was unnecessary. Heaving profound sighs he proceeded to his dressing-room, got through his toilet, and then sat down to the breakfast table, and for the first time made a very powerful effort to address his mind to the awful nature of the emergency into which he was driven. Mr. Quod soon after made his appearance.

"This is a very—very—ugly business, Mr. Gammon!" quoth he, with a gloomy countenance, as he sat down. "I look upon it there's an end to the suit—eh?"

"It is not likely that we shall stir further, certainly"—replied Mr. Gammon, with a desperate effort to speak calmly: then there was a pause.

"And I should think the matter can't end here;" presently added Mr. Quod. "With such evidence as this, of course they'll attack Yatton!"

"Then I'm prepared to resist them," said Gammon; convinced in his own mind that the sole object of Mr. Quod's visit was to see after the payment of his bill—a reasonable anxiety, surely, considering the untoward issue of the proceedings.

"How could all this have escaped me, in getting up the case for the trial!" said Gammon, after a pause, darting an anxious and furtive glance at his companion.

"Ay—I hope this will teach you common law fellows, that there's a trick or two worth knowing at Doctor's Commons!" replied Mr. Quod. "D'ye remember what I told you at starting?—How was it, d'ye say, you couldn't find it out? No one could, till we did!—But, by the way, do we fight any more in the cause? Because we must decide at once—it's no use, I should say, going to the expense of a hearing"—

"I will give you an answer in the course of the day, Mr. Quod," replied Gammon; and succeeded in getting rid of his visiter, for the present; and then re-pursued the whole of the evidence, and considered within himself, as well as he was able, what course he ought to pursue. He had need, truly, to do so, for he very shortly found that he had to deal with an enemy in Mr. Runnington—uncompromising and unrelenting—whose movements were equally prompt, vigorous and skilful. That gentleman, following up his blow, and acting under the advice of the Attorney-General, who had just returned to town for the commencement of the legal year—viz: Michaelmas Term—first of all gave notice, through Mr. Pounce, of his intention to proceed with the suit for administration; but found that the enemy in that quarter had struck; Mr. Quod formally notified his abandonment of opposition on the part of Mr. Titmouse. So far so good. Mr. Runnington's next step was to go down into Staffordshire and Yorkshire, accompanied by Mr. Pounce, and by his own experienced confidential clerk, in order to ascertain still more distinctly and conclusively the nature of the evidence which was in existence impeaching the legitimacy of Mr. Titmouse. His enquiries were so satisfactory, that, within a week of his return to town, he had caused an action of ejectment to be brought for the recovery of the whole of the Yatton property; and copies of the "Declaration" to be served on Mr. Titmouse, and on every tenant in possession upon the estate. Then he caused notices to be served on every one of the tenants, calling upon them not to pay rents in future to any one except Charles Aubrey, Esquire, or his agents by him lawfully appointed; and caused a formal demand of the title-deeds of the estate to be forthwith served upon Mr. Titmouse, Messrs. Bloodsuck and Son, and Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap; and also advertisements to be inserted in the newspapers, to caution all persons against advancing money on mortgage or on other security of the Yatton property, "formerly in possession of, and now claimed by, Charles Aubrey, Esq., but at present wrongfully held by Tittlebat Titmouse, Esq., M. P., and for the recovery of which an action has been commenced, and is now pending;" and also from advancing money "on the faith or security of a certain bond conditioned in the penalty of £20,000 for the payment to Tittlebat Titmouse of £10,000, with interest, on or before the 24th day of January next, and dated the 26th July 18—, and signed by Lord de la Zouch and Charles Aubrey, Esq., the same having been obtained by undue means, and on a fraudulent pretence of money being due from the said Charles Aubrey, Esq., to the aforesaid Tittlebat Titmouse."

These advertisements, and certain paragraphs relating to the same matter, which found their way into the newspapers, to the consternation of Gammon, came under the eye of the Duke of Tantallan, and struck him dumb with dismay and horror at so decisive and public a corroboration of his worst fears. A similar effect it produced upon Miss Macspleuchan, who, however, succeeded in keeping them for some time from the observation of the unfortunate Earl of Dreddlington. But there were certain other persons in whom these announcements excited an amazing degree of excitement and agitation; viz. three Jewish gentlemen, Mordecai Gripe, Mephibosheth Maharshalal-hash-baz, and Israel Fang, who were at present the depositaries of Mr. Titmouse's title-deeds, with a lien upon them, as they had fondly imagined, to the extent of nearly seventy thousand pounds, that being the amount of money they had advanced, in hard cash, to Mr. Titmouse, upon mortgage of his Yatton estates. The last of these unfortunate gentlemen—old Mr. Fang—had advanced no less a sum than thirty thousand pounds. He had been the first applied to, and had most fortunately taken a collateral security for the whole sum advanced; viz. a bond—the bond of our old friend, "Thomas Tag-rag, draper and mercer, of No. 375 Oxford street, and Satin Lodge, Clapham, in the county of Middlesex." As soon as ever the dismayed Israelite, by his attorney, had ascertained, by enquiry at the office of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap—where all was confusion—that there really was a claim set up to the whole of the estates, on behalf of him who had been so recently and suddenly dispossessed of them, he exclaimed in an ecstacy, "Oh, ma Got! oh, ma dear Got! Shoo Tag-rag! Shoo on the bond! Looshe no time"——and he was obeyed. Terrible to tell, two big bum baliffs the next day walked straight into the shop of Mr. Tag-rag, who was sitting in his little closet at the further end, with his pen in his hand, busily checking some bills just made out, and without the least ceremony or hesitation hauled him off, hardly giving him time to put his hat on, but gruffly uttering in his ear some such astounding words as "Thirty thousand pounds!" He resisted desperately, shouting out for help, on which all the young men jumped over the counters, and seemed to be coming to the rescue! while one or two female customers rushed affrighted out of the shop. In short, there was a perfect panic in the shop; though the young men merely crowded round, and clamoured loudly, without venturing upon a conflict with the two burly myrmidons of the law, who clapped their prize into a coach that was standing opposite—Mr. Tag-rag, frothing at the mouth, and with impassioned gesticulation, protesting that he would have them both transported to Botany Bay on the morrow. They laughed at him good humouredly, and in due time deposited him safely in the lock-up of Mr. Vice, who, on seeing that he was disposed to be troublesome, thrust him unceremoniously into the large room in which, it may be recollected, Mr. Aubrey had been for a few minutes incarcerated, and left him, telling him he might write to his attorney. There he continued for a long while in a state bordering on frenzy. Indeed, he must have fancied that the devil had made it, just then, his particular business to worry and ruin him; for what do you think had happened to him only two days before! an event which had convulsed Clapham to its centre—so much, at least, of Clapham as knew of the existence of the Tag-rags and the Reverend Dismal Horror, his chapel, and congregation. That young shepherd of faithful souls having long cherished feelings of ardent fondness towards one gentle lamb in his flock in particular—viz. Tabitha Tag-rag—who was the only child of the wealthiest member of his little church—took upon himself to lead her, nothing loth, a very long and pleasant ramble—in plain English, Mr. Dismal Horror had eloped with the daughter of his head deacon—to the infinite scandal and disgust of his congregation, who forthwith met and deposed him from his pulpit; after which his father-in-law solemnly made his will, bequeathing every thing he had to a newly established Dissenters' college; and the next day—being just about the time that the grim priest of Gretna was forging the bonds of Hymen for the happy and lovely couple before him, Mr. Tag-rag was hauled off in the way that I have mentioned—which two occurrences would have the effect of enabling Mr. Dismal Horror to prove the disinterestedness of his attachment—an opportunity for which he vowed that he panted—inasmuch as he and she had become, indeed, all the world to each other. He must now go into some other line of business, in order to support his fond and lovely wife; and, as for Tag-rag, his pious purposes were frustrated altogether. There was no impeaching the validity of the bond held by the infuriate and inexorable Jew who had arrested him, and who clearly had been no party to any fraud by which—if any, the signature of Mr. Tag-rag had been procured to the bond. Mr. Tag-rag's attorney, Mr. Snout, instantly called upon Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, to enquire into the particulars of the astounding transaction by which his client had been drawn into so ruinous a liability—but was very cavalierly treated; for he was informed that Mr. Tag-rag must, in their opinion, have lost his senses—at all events his memory; for that he had most deliberately executed the bond, after its nature had been fully explained to him by Mr. Gammon—and his signature was witnessed and attested in the usual way by a clerk in the office, and also in the presence of all the three partners. On hearing all this—and examining Mr. Aminadab, who stated, without any hesitation, as the fact in truth was, that he had been called in specially to see Mr. Tag-rag execute the bond, and had seen and heard him deliberately sign and say he delivered it as his act and deed—Mr. Snout hurried back to his frenzied client, and endeavoured, for a long while, with praiseworthy patience, to reason with him, explaining to him the glaring improbability of his version of the affair. This led to very high words indeed between them, and at length Mr. Tag-rag actually spit in his face: and Mr. Snout, being a very little man, and unable to resent the insult effectually, instantly quitted the room, expressing his firm belief that Mr. Tag-rag was a swindler, and he would no more be concerned for a person of that description. Mr. Tag-rag could not get bail for so frightful an amount; so he committed an act of bankruptcy, by remaining in prison for three weeks. Down, then, came all his creditors upon him in a heap, especially the Jew; a rattling bankruptcy ensued—the upshot of the whole being—to anticipate, however, a little—that a first and final dividend was declared of three farthings in the pound—for it turned out that he had been speculating a great deal more than any one had had the least idea of. I ought, however, to have mentioned that, as soon as Mr. Tag-rag had become bankrupt, and his assignees had been appointed, they caused an indictment to be preferred against Mr. Titmouse, and Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, for fraud and conspiracy in obtaining the bond from Mr. Tag-rag; and, on the same grounds, made an application, fortified by strong affidavits, to the Lord Chancellor, to strike them all off the rolls. In addition to all this, the two other unfortunate mortgagees, Mordecai Gripe, and Mephibosheth Mahar-shalal-hash-baz—who had no security at all for their advances except the title-deeds of the estate, and the personal covenant of Mr. Titmouse, beset the office in Saffron Hill from morning to night, like a couple of frantic fiends, and nearly drove poor old Mr. Quirk out of his senses. Mr. Snap was peremptory and insolent; while Gammon seldom made his appearance—and would see no one at his private residence, pleading serious indisposition.

After anxious reflection, Mr. Gammon did not absolutely despair of extricating himself from the perils with which he was personally environed. As for certain fond hopes of political advancement, after which, indeed, his soul pined, he did not despair of prevailing on his friend at headquarters—to whom he had undoubtedly rendered considerable political services at no little personal risk—to overlook the accident which had befallen him, in the adverse verdict for the bribery penalties, even should he fail in his motion to defeat that verdict in the ensuing term. He had had a distinct intimation that—that one obstacle removed—a very important and influential situation under government was within his reach. But, alas! this last overwhelming misfortune—how could he possibly evade or surmount it? What human ingenuity or intrepidity could avail to extricate him from the consequences of his avowal to Miss Aubrey—and his counter-statements to the Duke of Tantallan and Miss Macspleuchan—to say nothing of the Earl of Dreddlington? He resolved to risk it—to rely on his own resources, and the chapter of accidents. The mere presence of difficulty, strung his nerves to encounter it. He resolved to rely on the impossibility of fixing him directly with a knowledge of the rottenness of Titmouse's pretensions—at all events, till a period considerably subsequent to the trial, and Titmouse's marriage with the Lady Cecilia. It occurred to him, as calculated, moreover, to aid his contemplated movements, if he could find a fair pretext for throwing overboard his partners, especially Mr. Quirk—satisfied that his own uniform caution had prevented him from committing himself to them—or at least had deprived them of means of proving it. He very soon met with an opportunity, of which he promptly availed himself.

Some week or ten days after the commencement of the term, Mr. Quirk was walking down Parliament Street, on his way to the Court of King's Bench, hoping, amongst other things, to hear the court say whether they would grant or refuse a rule nisi for a new trial, in a certain cause of Wigley v. Gammon, which had been moved for on the first day of the term by the Attorney-General, and which Lord Widdrington had said the court would take a day or two's time to consider. Mr. Quirk's eye caught the figure of a person, a few steps in advance of him, which he fancied he had seen before. In a few minutes' time, the old gentleman was covered with a cold perspiration; for in a young man, about thirty years old, decently dresssed—thin, sallow, and wearing a very depressed air—Mr. Quirk recognized Mr. Steggars—a gentleman whom he had imagined to be at that moment comfortably settled at Botany Bay! This was the individual, it may be recollected, whose execrable breach of trust, when a clerk of Mr. Parkinson's at Grilston, had led to Mr. Quirk's discovery of the infirmity in Mr. Aubrey's title.—The fact was, that Mr. Steggars had quitted England horribly disgusted with Mr. Quirk's conduct towards him; and had also subsequently experienced some little remorse on account of his own mean and cruel conduct towards a gentleman and his amiable family, who had never given him the slightest pretext for hostility or revenge. He had contrived to make his feelings upon the subject known to the official individual at Botany Bay, who had given him an opportunity of explaining matters fully to the authorities at home—the principal of whom, the Home Secretary—had been, and indeed continued to be, a warm personal friend of Mr. Aubrey's. This minister caused enquiries to be made concerning Steggars' behaviour while abroad, which were so satisfactorily answered as to procure a remission of the remainder of his sentence, just as he was entering upon his fourth year's service at Botany Bay. Immediately on his return—which had taken place only a few days before the commencement of Michaelmas term—he sought out Mr. Aubrey's attorneys, Messrs. Runnington, and put them fully in possession of all the facts of the case relating to Mr. Quirk's grossly dishonourable conduct in obtaining and acting upon a knowledge of the supposed defect in Mr. Aubrey's title. Upon Mr. Quirk's coming alongside of this gentleman, and looking at him with a most anxious inquisitiveness, he encountered a fearfully significant glance—and then Mr. Steggars, in a very pointed and abrupt manner, crossed over the street for the purpose of avoiding him. He was so dreadfully disconcerted by this occurrence, that instead of going on to Court, where he would have heard Mr. Gammon's rule for a new trial refused, he retraced his steps homeward, and arrived at the office just as a clerk was enquiring for him; and who, on seeing him, put into his hands the following startling document, being a rule, which had been granted the day before, by the Court of King's Bench:—

"On reading the Affidavit of JONATHAN STEGGARS, the Affidavits of James Parkinson and Charles Runnington, and the paper-writing marked A., all hereunto annexed, and on the motion of Mr. Attorney-General, it is ordered, that Caleb Quirk, Gentleman, an attorney of this Honourable Court, do, on Wednesday next, in this present term, show cause why he should not forthwith deliver up to Charles Aubrey, Esquire, the deeds and documents specified in the paper-writing hereto annexed marked A, and also, why he should not answer the matters contained in the said Affidavits!"

"Oh Lord!" exclaimed Mr. Quirk, faintly, and, sinking into his chair, enquired for Mr. Gammon; but, as usual, he had not been at the office that day. Giving orders to Mr. Aminadab to have copies taken immediately of the affidavits mentioned in the rule, Mr. Quirk set off for Mr. Gammon's chambers, but missed that gentleman, who, he learned, was down at court. The next day Mr. Gammon called at the office, but Mr. Quirk was absent; on going, however, into the old gentleman's room, Mr. Gammon's eye lit an the abovementioned "rule," and also on the affidavits upon which it had been granted; then, hastily replacing them on the desk as he had found them, he repaired to his own room greatly flustered—resolved to wait for Mr. Quirk's arrival, and appear to be informed by him, for the first time, of the existence of the aforesaid rule and affidavits. While he was really buried in a reverie, with his head resting on one hand and a pen in the other, his countenance miserably pale and harassed, Mr. Quirk burst hastily into his room with the rule and affidavits in his hand.

"Oh Lord, Gammon! How are you Gammon?" he stuttered, "Haven't seen you this age! Where have you been? How are you, eh?" and he grasped very cordially the cold hand of Mr. Gammon, which did not return the pressure.

"I am not very well, Mr. Quirk; but—you seem agitated!—Has any thing fresh hap"——

"Fresh?—Ecod, my dear Gammon! Fresh, indeed! Here's a new enemy come into the field! D——d if I don't feel going mad!—Look, Gammon, look!"—and he placed the rule and affidavits in Mr. Gammon's hand, and sat down beside him.

"What!—Answer the matters of the affidavit?" quoted Gammon, amazedly.—"Why, what have you been doing, Mr. Quirk? And—who upon earth is—Jonathan Steggars?"

"Who's Steggars!" echoed Mr. Quirk, stupidly.

"Yes, Mr. Quirk—Steggars. Who is he?" repeated Gammon, intrepidly.

"Steggars, you know—Gammon! You recollect Steggars, of course—eh?" enquired Mr. Quirk, with an apprehensive stare—"Steggars; Steggars—you know! eh! You don't recollect! Oh, botheration! Come, come, Gammon!"

"Who is he?" again enquired Gammon.

"Oh Lud! oh Lud! oh Lud!" exclaimed Mr. Quirk, despairingly—"What are you after, Gammon? You don't intend—it can't be—that you're going to—eh!—It's Steggars, you know—we defended him, you know—and he got transported for robbing Parkinson. You recollect how we got hold of Mr. Aubrey's story from him?" While Mr. Quirk was saying all this with feverish impetuosity, Mr. Gammon appeared to be, for the first time, glancing eagerly over the affidavits.

"Why—good heavens, Mr. Quirk!" said he presently, with a start—"is it possible that these statements can have the slightest foundation in fact?"

"Ay, drat it—that you know as well as I do, Gammon," replied Mr. Quirk, with not a little eagerness and trepidation—"Come, come, it's rather late in the day to sham Abraham just now."

"Do you venture, Mr. Quirk, to stand there and deliberately charge me with being a party to the grossly dishonourable conduct of which you are here accused upon oath—which, indeed, you admit yourself to have been guilty of?"

"D——d if I don't, Master Gammon!" replied Mr. Quirk, slapping his hand on the table after a long pause, in which he looked completely confounded. "Why you'll want by and by to persuade me that my name isn't Caleb Quirk—why, zounds! you'll drive me mad! You're gone mad yourself—you must be!"

"How dare you insult me, sir, by charging me with conniving at your infamous and most unprofessional conduct?"

"Why—come! Do you know how we first got scent of the whole thing? It dropped down from the clouds, I suppose, into our office—oh lud, lud, Gammon! it isn't kind to leave an old friend in the lurch at such a horrid pinch as this."

"I tell you, Mr. Quirk, that I never had the least idea in the world that this wretch Steggars—I should have scouted the whole thing! I would rather have retired from the firm."

"That's it, Gammon! Go on, Gammon! This is uncommonly funny! It is, indeed, ha, ha!"

"This is no time for trifling, sir, believe me. Let me tell you thus much, in all candour—that I certainly had, from the first, misgivings as to the means by which you became possessed of this information; but, considering our relative situations, I did not feel myself at liberty to press you on the point—Oh, Mr. Quirk, I am really shocked beyond all bounds! What will the profession think of"———

"D—— the profession! What d'ye think I must be just now thinking of you? Why, you'd make a dog strike it's father!"

"I may have been unfortunate, Mr. Quirk—I may have been imprudent; but I have never been dishonourable—and I would not for the whole creation have my name associated with this infernal transac"——

"Who wanted me to forge a tombstone, Gammon?" enquired Mr. Quirk, glancing very keenly at his friend.

"Wanted you to forge a tombstone, sir?" echoed Gammon.

"Ay! ay! Forge a tombstone!" repeated Mr. Quirk, dropping his voice.

"Upon my word and honour, Mr. Quirk, I pity you! You've lost your senses."

"You wanted me to forge a tombstone! D——d if you didn't!"

"You had better go home, Mr. Quirk, and take some physic to clear your head, for I'm sure you're going wrong altogether!" said Gammon.

"Oh, Gammon, Gammon! Ar'n't you ashamed of yourself? Come—honour among thieves! Be honest for once"——

"Your conduct is so extraordinary, Mr. Quirk, that I must request you to leave my room, sir"——

"I shan't—it's mine too"—quoth Quirk, snapping his fingers, with a desperate air.

"Then I will, sir," replied Gammon with a low bow; and, taking up his hat, moved towards the door.

"You sha'n't, Gammon—you mus'n't!" cried Quirk, but in vain—Mr. Gammon had taken his final departure, leaving Mr. Quirk on the very verge of madness. By and by he went into Snap's room, who sat there the picture of misery and terror; for whereas it had always seemed to him that he had never been fairly admitted into the confidence of his senior partners in the very important matters which had been going on for the last two years—now, that every thing was going wrong, he was candidly given credit by Mr. Quirk and Mr. Gammon for having lent a helping hand to every thing from the very beginning! In fact, he was frightened out of his wits at the terrible turn things were taking. 'Twas he that had to stand the brunt of the horrid badgering of the three Jews; he was included in half a dozen indictments for fraud and conspiracy, at the instance of these three accursed Jews, and of the assignees of Mr. Tagrag; and Heaven only could form a notion of what other things were in store for him! He wondered vastly that they had not contrived to stick his name into the affidavits which had that day come in, and which seemed to have turned Mr. Quirk's head upside down. But conscious of his own innocence, he resolved to hold on to the last, with a view, in the event of the partnership blowing up, of scraping together a nice little practice out of the remnants.

Half recklessly, and half in furtherance of some designs which he was forming, Gammon followed up on the ensuing morning, his move with Mr. Quirk, by sending to him and to Mr. Snap a formal written notice of his intention to retire from the partnership, in conformity with the provisions of their articles, at the end of a calendar month from the date; and he resolved to take no part at all in the matter to which Mr. Quirk's attention had been so sternly challenged by the Court of King's Bench—leaving Mr. Quirk to struggle through it as best he might. But what was Mr. Gammon to do? He could not stir a step in any direction for want of money—getting every hour more and more involved and harassed on this score. The ecclesiastical suit he had given up, and Mr. Quod had instantly sent in his heavy bill, requiring immediate payment—reminding Mr. Gammon that he had pledged himself to see him paid, whatever might be the issue. Here was an action of ejectment, on a tremendous scale, actually commenced; and being vigorously carried on for the recovery of every acre of the Yatton property. Was it to be resisted? Where were the funds? Here he was, again, already a defendant in four indictments, charging fraud and conspiracy—proceedings entailing a most destructive expense; and his motion for a new trial in the action for the bribery penalty having failed, he was now liable to pay, almost instantly, some £2500 to the plaintiff, for debt and costs. As for the balance of their bill against Mr. Aubrey, that was melting away hourly in the taxing office; and the undoubted result would be an action against them, at the suit of Mr. Aubrey for a malicious arrest. Was it possible, thought Gammon, to make the two promissory notes of Mr. Aubrey available, by discontinuing the actions, and indorsing over the notes at a heavy discount? He took an opinion upon the point—which was to the effect that such a step could not be taken, so as to give any third party a better right against Mr. Aubrey than Mr. Titmouse had. But even had this been otherwise, an unexpected obstacle arose in Mr. Spitfire, who now held Mr. Gammon at arm's length, and insisted on going forward with the actions—when he, in his turn, was, as it were, checkmated by a move of Mr. Runnington's in the Court of Chancery; where he obtained an injunction against proceeding with the actions, till the result of the pending action of ejectment should have been ascertained; and, in the event of the lessor of the plaintiff recovering, an account taken of the mesne profits which had been received by Mr. Titmouse. No one, of course, would now advance a farthing on mortgage of Mr. Titmouse's interest in the Yatton property; and Mr. Gammon's dearly earned rent charge of £2000 a year had become mere waste parchment, and as such he destroyed it. The advertisements concerning Lord de la Zouch's bonds, had effectually restrained

Mr. Gammon from raising any thing upon it; since any one advancing money upon the security of its assignment, must have put it in suit against his lordship, when due, in the name of Mr. Titmouse, and any answer to an action by him, would of course operate against the party using his name. Mr. Gammon then bethought himself of felling the timber at Yatton: but, as if that step on his part had been anticipated, before they had got down more than a couple of trees at the extremity of the estate, down came an injunction from the lord chancellor, and so there was an end of all resources from that quarter. Should he try the experiment of offering to surrender Yatton without the delay and expense of defending the ejectment? He knew he should be laughed at; they must quickly see that he had no funds to fight with, even had he the slightest ease to support. Mr. Gammon saw that Mr. Aubrey's position was already impregnable, and the notion of a compromise utterly ridiculous. As for resources of his own, he had none, for he had been exceedingly unfortunate in his dealings in the British and foreign funds, and had suffered severely and unexpectedly through his connexion with one or two of the bubble companies of the day. In fact he was liable to be called upon at any moment for no less a sum than £3000, and interest, which had been advanced to him on security of a joint and several bond given by himself, and Mr. Titmouse; and he lived in daily dread lest the increasing frequency of the rumours to his discredit, should get to the ears of this particular creditor, and precipitate his demand of repayment. To the vexation occasioned by this direct pecuniary embarrassment, and by the impossibility of retrieving himself by a move in any direction—being, in short, in a complete dead-lock—were to be added other sources of exquisite anxiety and mortification. To say nothing of the perilous legal and criminal liabilities which he had incurred, the consciousness of his appearing an atrocious liar, and indeed an impostor, in the eyes of the Duke of Tantallan, of the Earl of Dreddlington, of Miss Macspleuchan, of the Aubreys, of Miss Aubrey—in fact, of every one who saw or heard what he had done—stung him almost to madness: considerations of this kind were infinitely more insupportable than all the others by which he was oppressed, put together. And when he reflected that the lord chancellor, to whose favourable notice he had ever fondly aspired—and, to a considerable extent, successfully—had been put in possession of all the heavy charges made against him, on the score of fraud and conspiracy, by means of the various motions made before his lordship, and the affidavits by which they were supported, he felt his soul withered within him. In short, it must surely appear, by this time, that the devil had, in his dismal sport, got his friend Mr. Gammon up into a corner.

In like manner Mr. Titmouse had his lesser troubles—for he was all of a sudden reduced very nearly to the verge of literal starvation. His creditors of every kind and degree seemed actuated by the spirit of the law of the Twelve Tables—which, when a debtor was insolvent, permitted his creditors to cut him, bodily, physically, into pieces, in proportion to the respective magnitudes of their claims against him. Actions were commenced against him by the three Jews, on his covenants to repay the principal and interest due on the mortgages; half-a-dozen actions were pending against him on bills of exchange and promissory notes, which he had given for various sums of money, which had been lent him on terms of the most monstrous usury. Scarcely was there a single tradesman in town or country with whom he had ever dealt, that had not sued or was not about to sue him. Every article of furniture both at Yatton and at his lodgings—great or small, cabs, harness, horses,—all had disappeared: and, but for the protection afforded to his person by Parliament, he would have been pounced upon by at least a hundred ravenous and infuriated creditors in an instant, and never been seen or heard of any more, except on the occasion of some feeble and vain cry for relief under the Insolvent Debtors' Act. He had been obliged, on coming up from Yatton, to borrow five pounds from poor Dr. Tatham!—who, though infinitely surprised at the application, and greatly inconvenienced by compliance with it, lent him cheerfully the sum he asked for; Titmouse, the little scamp, pledging himself to enclose the Doctor a five-pound note by the first post after his reaching town. That, however, even had he ever intended giving the matter a thought, he could no more have done than he could have sent Dr. Tatham the mitre of the Archbishop of Canterbury; in consequence of which the worthy little doctor was obliged to postpone his long-meditated purchase of a black coat and breeches indefinitely. The morning after his return, he betook himself to Saffron Hill, which he reached just as Mr. Quirk and Mr. Snap, deserted by Mr. Gammon, were endeavouring, in great tribulation and terror, to concoct affidavits in answer to those on which the rule in the Court of King's Bench had been obtained. Mr. Aminadab, with a little hesitation, yielded to his importunities, and allowed him to go into Mr. Quirk's room.

"Oh, Lud! Oh, Lud!—you—you—you—infernal little villain!" cried out Mr. Quirk, hastily approaching him, pale and stuttering with fury—and, taking him by the collar, turned him by main force out of the room.

"I say!—I say!—Come, sir! I'm a member of"—

"I'll member you, you impostor! Get out with you!—get out!"

"So help me——! I'll go to some other attor"——gasped Titmouse, ineffectually struggling against Mr. Quirk.

"Eugh!—Beast!" exclaimed Snap, who kept by the side of Mr. Quirk, ready to give any assistance that might be requisite.

"What have I —— eh?—What have I done—demme!—Come, come—hallo!—hands off"—

"If ever—if ever—if ever you dare show your cursed little face here—again"—sputtered Mr. Quirk, trembling with rage.

"This is breach of privilege!—On my life I'll—I really will—I'll complain to the House to-night." By this time he had been forced through the outer door into the street, and the door closed furiously behind him. A little crowd was instantly collected around him, and he might possibly have thought of addressing them, in terms of indignant eloquence, but he was deterred by the approach of a policeman with a very threatening countenance, and slung down Saffron Hill in shocking state of mind. Then he hurried to Thavies' Inn, pale as death—and with a tremulous voice enquired for Mr. Gammon; but that gentleman had given special orders to be invariably denied to him. Again and again he called—and was again and again repulsed; and though he lingered on one or two occasions for an hour at least, in order to waylay Mr. Gammon, it was in vain. Letter after letter he sent, but with no better effect; and at length the laundress refused to take them in.

Gammon dared not see Titmouse; not because he feared Titmouse, but himself.

The House of Commons was sitting, unusual as was such an occurrence at that time of the year; but Parliament had been called together on a special urgency, and a very fierce and desperate contest was carrying on between the Opposition and the Ministers, whose very existence was at stake, and almost nightly divisions were melting down their majority till they were within an ace of being in a positive minority. Under these circumstances, although Mr. Titmouse's position had become a matter of notoriety, and he could no longer exhibit in public even the outside show and trappings of a man of fashion, beyond his mere personal finery, (which had become very precious, because he saw no means of replacing it,) and though he was cut, as a matter of course, by every one out of doors, yet he found he had one friend, at least, in his extremity, who scorned to imitate the fickle and perfidious conduct of all around him. That frank and manly individual was no less a person, to his honour be it spoken, than the Secretary of the Treasury—and whipper-in—Mr. Flummery; who always spoke to him in the most cordial and confiding manner, and once or twice even asked him to join his dinner-table at Bellamy's. On one of these occasions, Mr. Titmouse resolved to put Mr. Flummery's friendship to the test, and boldly asked for "a place." His distinguished friend appeared certainly startled for a moment, and then evidently felt inwardly tickled, as was evinced by a faint twitching at the corners of his mouth. He proceeded, however, in a very confidential manner, to ask Mr. Titmouse as to his familiarity with financial matters; for (in the most sacred confidence) it did so happen that, although no one knew it but himself and one other person, there was sure to be a vacancy in a certain office within a fortnight at furthest; and, without saying any thing further, Mr. Flummery laid his finger on his lip, and looked steadfastly at Titmouse, who did similarly; and within half an hour's time made one of a glorious majority of four, obtained by the triumphant Ministry. Titmouse was now in excellent spirits concerning his future prospects; and if he could contrive to hold on during the fortnight intervening between him and his accession to office, all would be well. He therefore conceived he had nothing to do but apply to some one or two friends, whom he had accommodated with loans, for repayment. But, alas! Mr. O'Doodle acknowledged that his exchequer was empty just then; and Mr. M'Squash said he really fancied he had repaid Mr. Titmouse the hundred pounds which he had lent him, but he would look and see. Then Mr. Titmouse ventured to apply to Mr. O'Gibbet—that gentleman being Titmouse's debtor to the tune of some five hundred pounds. He called Mr. Titmouse aside, and in the most delicate and feeling manner intimated the delight it would have afforded him to respond to the call of Mr. Titmouse under ordinary circumstances; but the fact was, he felt placed in a most painfully embarrassing position, on account of the grave doubts which had occurred to him, as to the right of Mr. Titmouse either to have lent the money at all, or, consequently, to receive repayment of it. In short, the lawyers would call this setting up the jus tertii; Mr. O'Gibbet protesting that he looked upon himself, in point of conscience, as a trustee of the money for the real owner; and, till he should have been discovered, bound to retain it—so pleasant is sometimes the performance of one's duty! Titmouse could not in the least appreciate these exquisite scruples; but knowing Mr. O'Gibbet's influence over Mr. Flummery, he feigned to acquiesce in the propriety of what was advanced by Mr. O'Gibbet, who, on being pressed, lent him five pounds.

Finding that those whom he had till then imagined bound to consider his interests, had, in so unprincipled and ungrateful a manner, deserted him, he resolved to be true to himself, and bent all the powers of his mind to the contemplation of his present circumstances, and how he should act with advantage. After due and deep reflection, a very felicitous stroke occurred to him. He did not know the exact state of the question with reference to the right to the possession of Yatton—little dreaming that, in point of fact, Mr. Aubrey was at that moment virtually reinstated in the enjoyment of that fine estate. Now, it occurred to Mr. Titmouse as very probable, that his opponent would catch at any fair offer of a compromise, since he—Titmouse—had unquestionably the advantage over him at present, having nine-tenths of the law on his side, viz. possession; and if he was to propose to split their differences by making an offer of his hand and heart to Miss Aubrey, it could do no harm, and might be attended with the happiest results. How was she to know the desperate shifts to which he was driven at present? And if he could but contrive, consistently with his pledge to Mr. Flummery, to give her an inkling of the brilliant prospects that awaited him! In short, I am able to give the reader an exact copy of a letter which, after infinite pains, two days being spent over it, he sent to Miss Aubrey; and which was duly forwarded to her, and deposited in her hands, as she alighted from her horse, on returning from a ride with Mr. Delamere and Lord de la Zouch. Here follows that skilful and touching performance:—

"House of Comones.

"Miss Aubrey, Vivian Street."

"I hope, Kate, you have not been giving this gentleman encouragement!" quoth Delamere, when he had read the above. It formed a topic of pleasant merriment when they all met at dinner—a right cheerful party, consisting solely of the Aubreys and Lord and Lady de la Zouch, and Delamere. Mr. Aubrey had returned from town with important intelligence.

"Mr. Runnington is steadily and patiently unravelling," said he, as they sat in unrestrained converse after dinner—(I must take the opportunity of saying that Miss Aubrey looked as beautiful as ever, and in brilliant spirits)—"one of the most monstrous tissues of fraud that ever was woven by man! We sometimes imagine that Mr. Gammon must have had in view the securing Yatton for himself! The firm of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, are completely overwhelmed with the consequences of their conduct!—I understand they have terribly taken in the Jews—to the amount of at least seventy or eighty thousand pounds of hard cash; and one of them, it seems, on discovering that he has no security, very nearly succeeded in hanging himself the other day!"

"What's this I see in the paper about a Mr. Tag-rag?" enquired Lord de la Zouch:—and Mr. Aubrey told him the miserable condition to which Tag-rag had been reduced by the alleged chicanery of the firm of Quirk, Gammon, and Snap.

"Mr. Runnington seems to be managing matters with great vigour and skill," said his lordship.

"Admirably! admirably! I never in my life saw or heard of such complete success as attends every step he takes against the enemy; he is hourly pressing them nearer and nearer to the verge of the precipice, and cutting off all retreat. They would fight, but they have no funds! Look at the administration suit!" Mr. Aubrey then proceeded to mention two very important circumstances which had transpired since his former visit to town. First, an offer was understood to have come direct from Mr. Gammon, to abandon the defence to the ejectment, on condition of his receiving, on behalf of Mr. Titmouse, the sum of two thousand pounds; but Mr. Runnington had peremptorily refused to listen to any proposal of the kind, and the actions were, at that moment, in full progress with every prospect of there being no real defence even attempted. The next piece of intelligence was, that Messrs. Screw and Son, the solicitors to the Vulture Insurance Company, had called on Messrs. Runnington, on learning that they were the solicitors of the party to whom letters of administration had been granted, and intimated that the directors, "taking all the circumstances of the case into their consideration," had determined to offer no further opposition to the payment of the policy on the life of the late Lady Stratton. Mr. Screw talked very finely about the high principle and good feelings which ever actuated that distinguished company; but he did not tell Mr. Runnington what was the real cause of their abandoning their opposition, which was this—before their "commission" to examine their sole witness, Dr. Podagra, had reached China, they accidentally received authentic intelligence of his death, having been killed for vaccinating the infant of one of the Chinese! Under these circumstances, Mr. Runnington agreed to the terms proposed on the part of the company; viz. that the action be discontinued forthwith, each party pay their own costs, and the whole amount of the policy, minus the £2000 which had been advanced to Lady Stratton, be paid to Mr. Aubrey within a month from the day of discontinuing the action. Though Kate very vehemently protested against it, she was at length persuaded to allow her brother to act according to the manifest intentions of the venerable deceased; and he, in his turn, received a very gratifying assurance that she would have given him, under the special circumstances of the case, no anxiety respecting his bond for £2000 given to Lady Stratton, even had the grant of administration to the debtor interposed no technical objection! Thus was Kate no longer a dowerless maiden; having at her absolute disposal a sum of eighteen thousand pounds, in addition to which, in the event of their being restored to the possession of Yatton, she would be in the receipt of the income left her as a charge upon the estate by her father; viz. five hundred a year.

While the cheering sunshine of returning prosperity was thus beaming with daily increasing warmth and brightness upon the Aubreys,

"And all the clouds that lower'd upon their house," were, indeed,

"In the deep bosom of the ocean buried"— the sun of that proud and weak old man, the Earl of Dreddlington, was indeed going down in darkness. The proceedings which have been laid at length before the reader, arising out of the extraordinary termination of the enquiry set on foot by the Ecclesiastical Court, and quickly ending in the adoption of measures for the immediate recovery of Yatton, had attracted far too much of public attention to admit of their being concealed from the Earl, comparatively secluded from the world as he was. But the frightful confirmation of his assertion concerning what had occurred between himself and Mr. Gammon, respecting Titmouse, appeared to make no commensurate impression upon a mind no longer capable of appreciating it. He had been seized by a partial paralysis shortly after the last interview between himself, Mr. Gammon, and the Duke of Tantallan, with which the present part of this history opens; and it was evident that his reason was failing rapidly. And it was perhaps a merciful dispensation, for it appeared that the cup of his misery and mortification was not even yet full. That other monstrous fabric of absurdity and fraud, built upon public credulity—the Gunpowder and Fresh Water Company—suddenly dropped to pieces, principally on account of its chief architect, Mr. Gammon, being unable to continue that attention and skill by which it had been kept so long in existence. It suddenly exploded, involving every body concerned in it in ruin. The infatuated, and now dismayed, shareholders, and the numerous and designing creditors, came crowding round the more prominent of the parties concerned, clamorous and desperate. Meetings were called from time to time—producing, however, no other results than extending the view of liability incurred. The shareholders had fondly imagined that they could repose with confidence on the provision inserted in the prospectus, and in the deed of settlement, viz. that no one was to be liable beyond the amount of their shares actually subscribed for: alas! how dreadful the delusion, and how quickly was it dissipated! The houses of Lord Dreddlington, the Duke of Tantallan, and others, were besieged by unfortunate creditors; and at length a general meeting was called, at which resolutions were passed. strongly reflecting upon the Earl of Dreddlington and Mr. Gammon; and directing the solicitor concerned for the rest of the shareholders to file a bill against the Earl and Mr. Gammon, for the purpose of compelling them to pay all the debts incurred by the Company. More than this, it was threatened that unless satisfactory proposals were promptly received from, or on behalf of the Earl of Dreddlington, he would be proceeded against as a TRADER liable to the bankrupt laws, and a docket forthwith struck against him!—Of this crowning indignity impending over his head, the poor old peer was fortunately not conscious, being at the moment resident at Poppleton Hall, in a state not far removed from complete imbecility. The Duke of Tantallan was similarly threatened; and alarmed and enraged almost to a pitch of madness, resolved to take measures for completely exposing and punishing the individual to whose fraudulent plausibility and sophistries he justly attributed the calamity which had befallen him and the Earl of Dreddlington.

"Out of this nettle danger, I'll yet pluck the flower safety"—said Mr. Gammon to himself, as he sat inside one of the coaches going to Brighton, towards the close of the month of November, being on the morning after the explosion of the Gunpowder and Fresh Water Company. Inextricably involved as he appeared, yet he did not despair of retrieving himself, and defeating the vindictive measures taken against him. His chambers were besieged by applicants for admission—Titmouse among them, whose senseless pertinacity, overheard by Gammon as he sat within, while his laundress was being daily worried by Titmouse, several times inflamed him almost to the point of darting out and splitting open the head of the intruder; Old Mr. Quirk also sent daily letters, in a piteous strain, and called besides daily, begging to be reconciled to Gammon; but he sternly turned a deaf ear to all such applications. In order to escape this intolerable persecution, at all events for a while, and, in change of scene and air, unpropitious as was the weather, seek to recruit his health and spirits, he had determined upon spending a week at Brighton; telling no one, however, except his old and faithful laundress, his destination; and instructing her to say that he was gone, she believed, into Suffolk, but would certainly return to town within a week. His pale and harassed features showed how much he required the repose and relief he sought for, but which he sought for in vain. He felt not a whit the better after a two days' stay, though the weather had suddenly cleared up, and the air become brisk and bracing. Whithersoever he went, he carried about him a thick gloom which no sun could penetrate, no breezes dissipate. He could find rest nowhere, neither at home nor abroad, neither alone nor in company, neither sleeping nor waking. His brow was clouded by a stern melancholy, his heart was bursting with a sense of defeat and shame, exposure, mortification; and with all his firmness of nerve, he could not contemplate the future but with a sickening apprehension. In fact, he was quite in a state of intense nervous irritability and excitement from morning to night. On the evening of the third day after his arrival, the London paper, forwarded to him as usual from the neighbouring library, contained a paragraph which excited him not a little; and which was to the effect that a named solicitor of eminence had been the day before appointed by the Lord Chancellor to a specified office; being no other, in truth, than that which Gammon knew his lordship had all along destined for him, one which he could have filled to admiration, which would have given him permanent status in society; and the salary attached to it was, moreover, £1800 a year! Gammon laid down the paper and a sense of desolation came into his soul. After a while his eye lit on another part of the paper—gracious Heavens!—there were three or four lines which instantly roused him almost into madness. It was an advertisement, stating that he had "ABSCONDED," and offering a reward of £100 to any one who would give information by which he might be discovered and apprehended!"

"Absconded!" he exclaimed aloud, starting up, and his eye flaming with fury—"accursed miscreants!—I will quickly undeceive them." Instantly unlocking his paper case, he sat down and wrote off a letter to the editor of the newspaper, giving his full name and address; most indignantly denying his having attempted or dreamed of absconding; stating that he should be in London within forty-eight hours; and requiring an ample apology for the gross insult and libel which had been perpetrated, to be inserted in the next number of his paper. Then he wrote off to the solicitor, Mr. Winnington, who had conducted all the town proceedings in the cause of Wigley v. Gammon, alluding in terms of indignation and astonishment to the offensive advertisement, and assuring him that he should, within forty-eight hours be found, as usual, at his chambers, and prepared to make an immediate and satisfactory arrangement in respect of the damages and costs which were now due from him. In a similar strain he wrote to Mr.

Runnington, (who had maintained throughout, personally, a cautious courtesy towards Mr. Gammon)—begging him to postpone signing judgment in the action of Doe on the demise of Aubrey v. Roe, till the last day of term, as he had a new and final proposal to make, which might have the effect of saving great delay and expense. He added, that he had also a proposition to offer upon the subject of Lord de la Zouch's bond and Mr. Aubrey's promissory notes, and begged the favour of a line in answer, addressed to him at his chambers in Thavies' Inn, and which he might find on his arrival. To a similar effect, he also wrote to the solicitor who was working the docket which had been struck against Mr. Tag-rag; and also to the solicitor who was employed on behalf of the shareholders in the Gunpowder and Fresh Water Company:—in all of them reprobating in terms of the keenest indignation the unwarrantable and libellous use of his name which had been made, and making appointments for the individuals addressed to call at his chambers on the day after his arrival in town. Having thus done all in his power to counteract the injurious effects which were calculated to arise from so very premature and cruel a measure as that which had been taken, in offering a reward for his apprehension as an absconded felon, he folded up, sealed, and directed the letters, and took them himself to the post-office, in time for that night's post; and very greatly excited he was, as may be easily believed. He did not touch the dinner which he found laid for him on his return, but sat on the sofa, absorbed in thought, for nearly an hour: when he suddenly rung the bell, ordered his clothes to be instantly got ready for travelling—his bill made out—and then he went and secured a place in that night's mail, which was starting for town at half-past eight o'clock. At that hour he entered the mail, and as the only passenger—a circumstance which gave him an ample opportunity for reflection, and of which doubtless he availed himself—at all events, certain it is, that he closed not his eyes in sleep during the whole of the journey. Greatly to the surprise of his laundress, he made his appearance at his chambers between six and seven o'clock in the morning, rousing her from bed. He had thus, it will be observed, reached town contemporaneously with his own letters; and as all the appointments which he had made, were for the day after that of his arrival, he had secured a full day's freedom from interruption of any sort, and resolved to avail himself of it, by keeping within doors the whole of the time, his laundress denying him, as usual, to any one who might call. He asked her if she had seen or heard of the atrocious advertisement which had appeared in yesterday's paper? She replied that she had; and added, that no doubt to that circumstance were to be attributed the calls made yesterday from morning to night—an announcement which seemed to heighten the excitement under which Mr. Gammon was evidently labouring. As soon as his lamp had been lit, he opened his paper-case, and wrote the following letter:—

"Thavies' Inn, Wednesday morning.

"Dear Hartley,—As I have not missed an annual meeting of our little club for these ten years, I shall be found at my place to-night at nine to a moment: that is, by the way, if I shall be admitted, after the execrable advertisement concerning me which appeared in yesterday's papers, and the writer of which I will give cause, if I can discover him, to repent to the latest day he lives. I came up this morning suddenly, to refute, by my presence, the villanous falsehoods about my absconding. Entre nous, I am somewhat puzzled just now certainly—but never fear! I shall find a way out of the wood yet. Expect me at nine, to a minute.

"Yours as ever,

"Harry Hartley, Esq. "O. Gammon.
"Kensington Square."

This he sealed and directed; and requesting his laundress to put it into the office in time for the first post, without fail—he got into bed, and slept for a couple of hours: when he awoke somewhat refreshed, made his toilet as usual, and partook of a slight breakfast.

"You did not suppose I had absconded, Mrs. Brown, eh?" he enquired, with a melancholy smile, as she removed his breakfast things.

"No, sir; indeed I did not believe a word of it—you've always been a kind and just master to me, sir—and"—she raised her apron to her eyes and sobbed.

"And I hope long to continue so, Mrs. Brown. By the way, were not your wages due a day or two ago?"

"Oh yes, sir—but it does not signify, sir, the least; but on second thoughts—it does, sir—for my little niece is to be taken into the country—she's dying, I fear—and her mother's been out of work, for"——

"Here's a ten-pound note, Mrs. Brown," replied Mr. Gammon, taking one from his pocket-book—"pay yourself your wages; write me a receipt as usual, and keep the rest on account of the next quarter's wages, if it will assist you just now." She took the bank-note with many expressions of thankfulness; and but for her tears, which flowed plentifully, she might have noticed that there was something deadly in the eye of her kind and tranquil master. On her retiring, he rose, and walked to and fro for a long time, with folded arms, wrapped in profound meditation—from which he was occasionally unpleasantly started by hearing knocks at his door, and then his laundress assuring the visiter that Mr. Gammon was out of town, but would return on the morrow. It was a cheerless November day, the snow fluttering lazily through the foggy air; but his room was made snug and cheerful enough, by the large fire which he kept up. Opening his desk, he sat down, about noon, and wrote a very long letter—in the course of which, however, he repeatedly laid down his pen—got up and walked to and fro, heaving deep sighs, and occasionally exceedingly agitated. At length he concluded it, paused some time, and then folded it up, and sealed it. Then he spent at least two hours in going over all the papers in his desk and cabinet; a considerable number he burnt, and replaced and arranged the remainder carefully. Then again he walked to and fro. The cat, a very fine and favourite cat, one which had been several years an inmate of the chambers, attracted his attention, by rubbing against his legs. "Poor Puss!" exclaimed Gammon, stroking her fondly on the back; and, after a while, the glossy creature quitted him, and lay comfortably coiled up on the hearth-rug, as before. Again he walked to and fro, absorbed in melancholy reflection for some time; from which he was roused, about five, by Mrs. Brown bringing in the spare dinner—which, having barely tasted, he soon dismissed, telling Mrs. Brown that he felt a strange shooting pain in his head, but doubted not his being well enough to keep his appointment at the club—as she knew had been his habit for years. He requested her to have his dressing-room ready by a quarter to eight, and to have a coach fetched by eight o'clock precisely; and as soon as she had withdrawn, he sat down and wrote the following letter to an old, and the most devoted personal friend he had in the world:—

"My Dear ———. I entreat you, by our long unbroken friendship, to keep the enclosed letter by you for a fortnight; and then, with your own hand, and alone, deliver it to the individual to whom it is addressed. Burn this note to you, the instant you shall have read it—and take care that no eye sees the enclosed but hers—or all my efforts to secure a little provision for her will be frustrated. Call here to-morrow—at any hour you please—and say that you have called to see me, according to appointment. Bear this in mind, by the value you set upon my friendship. Whatever you may then see or hear, be firm and prudent.

"Wednesday. O. G."

In this letter he enclosed the long letter already spoken of, and having sealed and directed the whole with elaborate distinctness, he threw his cloak round him, and went with his packet to the post-office, and with his own hand, after an instant's hesitation, dropped it into the box, and returned to his chambers.

Then he took another sheet of paper, and wrote thus:—

"Dear Viper,—I doubt whether, after all, there will be a dissolution; but, at any rate, I will perform my promise, and be ready with what you wish for Sunday week—Your's ever, O. G."

"P. S.—I shall call on you on Saturday."

This he folded up and directed, and proceeded to commence the following:—

"Thavies Inn, Wednesday.

"Dear Sir,—I have finally determined to make every sacrifice in order to extricate myself from my present embarrassments. You will therefore, as soon as you get this, please to sell out all my——" here he laid down his pen; and Mrs. Brown presently announcing that every thing was ready in his dressing-room, he thanked her, and proceed to shave and dress. He was not more than a quarter of an hour over his toilet. He had put on his usual evening dress, his blue body-coat, black trowsers, a plain shirt, and black stock, and a white waistcoat—scarcely whiter, however, than the face of him that wore it.

"I am going for the coach now, sir," said Mrs. Brown, knocking at the door.

"If you please," he replied, briskly and cheerfully—and the instant that he had heard her close the outer door after her, he opened the secret spring drawer in his desk, and calmly took out a very small glass phial, with a glass stopper, over which was tied some bladder. His face was ghastly pale; his knees trembled; his hands were cold and damp as those of the dead. He took a strong peppermint lozenge from the mantelpiece, and chewed it, while he removed the stopper from the bottle, which contained about half a drachm of the most subtle and potent poison which has been discovered by man—one extinguishing life almost instantaneously, and leaving no trace of its presence except a slight odour, which he had taken the precaution of masking and overpowering with that of the peppermint. He returned to get his hat, which was in his dressing-room; he put it on—and in glancing at the glass, scarcely recognised the ghastly image it reflected. His object was to complete the deception he intended practising on the Insurance Company with whom he had effected a policy on his life for £2000—and also to deceive every body into the notion of his having died suddenly, but naturally. Having stirred up the large red fire, and make a kind of hollow in it, he took out the stopper, and dropped it with the bladder into the fire; took his pen in his right hand, with a fresh dip of ink in it; kneeled down with his feet on the fender; uttered aloud the word "Emma;" poured the whole of the deadly contents into his mouth, and succeeded in dropping the phial into the very heart of the fire—and the next instant dropped down on the hearth-rug, oblivious, insensible—dead. However, it might be that the instant after he had done this direful deed, he would have GIVEN THE WHOLE UNIVERSE, had it been his, to have undone what he had done—he had succeeded in effecting his object.

Poor Mrs. Brown's horror on discovering her master stretched senseless on the floor, may be imagined. Medical assistance was called in, but "the vital spark had fled." It was clearly either apoplexy, said the medical man, or an organic disease of the heart. Of this opinion were the coroner and his jury, without hesitation. He had evidently been seized while in the very act of writing to some broker. [Gammon had no more stock of any sort, for all he had wrote that letter, than the cat which had witnessed his death. Mr. Hartley came, and produced the letter he had received, and spoke of the disappointment they had all felt on account of his non-arrival: the other letters—the appointments which he had made for the morrow—all these things were decisive—it was really scarcely a case requiring an inquest; but as they had been called, they returned a verdict of "Died by the Visitation of God." He was buried a few days afterwards in the adjoining churchyard, (St. Andrew's,) where he lies mouldering away quietly enough, certainly; but as to any thing further, let us not presume to speculate.

His "friend" was faithful and discreet, obeying his injunctions to the letter. The "individual" alluded to in Mr. Gammon's note to him, was a very lovely girl whom Mr. Gammon had seduced under a solemn promise of marriage, who was passionately attached to him, whose name he had uttered when on the eve of death; and who, though Mr. Gammon's creditors were entitled to every farthing of the two thousand pounds out of which he had so artfully swindled the Insurance Company, was yet generously allowed by them to receive the sum of one thousand pounds.

Part the Last.

With its architect, fell that suprising fabric of fraud and wrong, the rise and fall of which is commemorated in this history—a fabric which, if it "rose like an exhalation," so like an exhalation disappeared, and with it all the creatures which had peopled it. Though Mr. Runnington's vigilance and ability had set matters into such a train, that, had Mr. Gammon lived to continue his most skilful opposition, he could not have delayed for any length of time Mr. Aubrey's restoration to Yatton, yet the sudden and most unexpected death of Mr. Gammon greatly accelerated that event. Notwithstanding the verdict of the coroner's inquest, both Mr. Aubrey and Mr. Runnington—and in fact very many others—strongly suspected the true state of the case; viz: that, in the desperation of defeat and dreaded exposure, he had destroyed himself.

Toward the close of the term, Mr. Runnington went to the proper office of the Court of King's Bench, in order to ascertain whether Mr. Titmouse had taken the requisite steps towards defending the actions of ejectment commenced by Mr. Aubrey, and found that, though the prescribed period had elapsed, he had not; in other words, that he had suffered JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT. Delighted, though not much surprised by this discovery, Mr. Runnington resolved at once to follow up his victory. 'Twas only a short and simple process that was requisite to effect such great results. He took a single sheet of draft paper, on which he wrote some half dozen lines called an "Incipitur," as if he were going to copy out the "declaration" in ejectment, but stopped short about the fifth line. This sheet of paper, together with another containing his "Rule for Judgment," he took to the Master's office, in order that that functionary might "SIGN JUDGMENT"—which he did, by simply writing in the margin of what Mr. Runnington had written, the words—"Judgment signed, 23d November 18—" and impressing above it the seal of the court; and behold, at that instant, the property in the whole of the Yatton estates had become vested in Mr. Aubrey again!

The next step requisite was to secure the possession of the property; for which purpose Mr. Runnington instantly procured a WRIT OF POSSESSION, i. e. a writ requiring the sheriff of Yorkshire to put Mr. Aubrey into actual possession, to be engrossed on a slip of parchment. This he got sealed; and then obtained a WARRANT from the sheriff to his officers, to execute the writ. Now the sheriff might, had it been necessary, have roused—nay, was bound to do so—the whole posse comitatus, in order to compel submission to his authority; and I can assure the reader that the whole posse comitatus would have answered his summons on that occasion very eagerly—but it was needless. Who was there to resist him at Yatton? The transference of the possession became, under these circumstances, a very slight matter-of-fact affair. The under-sheriff of Yorkshire drove up in his gig to the Hall, where he found Mr. Parkinson waiting his arrival—(no breaking open of doors was necessary!)—and in a whispered word or two, informed Mr. Parkinson that he then delivered the possession to him for and on account of Charles Aubrey, esquire, his heirs, and assigns, for ever—and after remarking, "what a fine estate it was, and in very good order, considering," he drove off. I may add, that to save the useless expense of some hundred writs of possession, "attornments" were taken from all the tenants—i. e. written acknowledgments that they held under Charles Aubrey, esquire, as their sole, true, and proper landlord. This done, that gentleman was reinstated in all that he had been dispossessed of, as absolutely, and to all intents and purposes, as if the events of the last three years had been a dream—as if such persons as Tittlebat Titmouse, and Quirk, Gammon, and Snap, had never existed; and Mr. Griffiths the steward, and Mr. Parkinson, opened a couple of bottles of port wine, which, with the efficient assistance of Mr. Waters and Mr. Dickons, the upper and under bailiffs, Mr. Tonson the gamekeeper, and Mr. Pumpkin the gardener, were very quickly emptied amidst—in which 'tis hoped the good-natured reader will join—shouts of "Hip, hip, hip, hurrah!—Hip, hip, hip, hurrah!—Hip, hip, hip, hurrah! hurrah! HURRAH!" Then phlegmatic Mr. Dickons stepped out into the court-yard, and, by way of further relieving his excited feelings, flung his heavy ashen walking-stick up a surprising height into the air; and when he had caught it on its descent, as he grasped it in his huge horny hand in silence, he shook it above his head with a feeling that he could have smashed a million of Titmice in a minute, if he could have got among them. Then he thought of Miss Aubrey and Kate, and up it went again, higher even than before—by which time they had all come out into the yard, and shouted again, and again, and again, till their voices rung, and echoed in the air, and excited an uproar in the rookery behind them.

While this result of his triumphant exertions was being thus celebrated at Yatton, Mr. Runnington was exerting himself to the utmost in London, in the extrication of Mr. Aubrey from all his pecuniary embarrassments—the chief of which were, his two promissory notes for £5000 each, with interest, and the actions depending upon them—the joint bond of himself and Lord de la Zouch for £10,000 and interest—and the actions pending for the balance of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap's bill—viz. £1446: 14: 6d. Undoubtedly, these matters occasioned him a vast deal of trouble and anxiety; but his experienced tact, and vigilance, and determination, overcame all obstacles. The balance of Messrs. Quirk, Gammon, and Snap's abominable bill of costs, melted away and totally disappeared in the heat of the taxing office; and with the aid of certain summary applications, both to the Lord Chancellor and to the common law judges, and after a good deal of diplomacy, Mr. Runnington succeeded in getting into his hands, cancelled, the above-mentioned two notes, on payment to Mr. Spitfire, for and on account of Mr. Titmouse, of £250, (of which Mr. Titmouse by the way got £15,) and the bond for ten thousand pounds, which was found in the strong box of the late Mr. Gammon, was delivered up by Messrs. Quirk and Snap on certain hints being given them by Mr. Runnington of the serious consequences of refusal. Not satisfied with this, Mr. Runnington obtained from Mr. Titmouse a formal and solemn release to Mr. Aubrey of all claims, debts, damages, and demands whatsoever, both at law and in equity. But how stood the matter of Mr. Titmouse's liabilities to Mr. Aubrey, in respect of the mesne profits during the last two years and more? Why, he owed Mr. Aubrey a sum of some twenty-five thousand pounds—not one farthing of which would ever see its way into the pockets of him who had been so cruelly defrauded of it! The greatest trouble of Mr. Runnington, however, was the extorting the title-deeds from the three Jews, Mordecai Gripe, Israel Fang, and Mephibosheth Mahar-Shalal-hash-baz. Unhappy wretches! they writhed and gasped as though their very hearts were being torn out; but they had no help for it, as their own attorneys and solicitors told them; since the right of Mr. Aubrey to his title-deeds was clear and indisputable, and their resistance of his claim would only entail on them additional and fruitless expense. They grinned, chattered, stuttered, and stamped about in impotent but horrible fury; and, if they could, would have torn Mr. Gammon out of his grave, and placed his body, and those of Messrs. Quirk and Snap, over a slow fire! These gentleman were not, however, the only persons who had been astounded, dismayed, and defeated, by Mr. Gammon's leap into the dark. To say nothing of Mr. Wigley, who might now whistle for his debt and costs, and many other persons who had rested all their hopes upon Mr. Gammon's powers, and his responsibility, his sudden death precipitated total ruin upon his weak aristocratical dupe and victim, the poor old Earl of Dreddlington. In addition to the formidable movement against his lordship and Mr. Gammon in the Court of Chancery, on the part of their co-shareholders and adventurers, for the purpose of procuring them to be declared alone liable for all the debts contracted by the Gunpowder and Fresh Water Company, the creditors, rendered impatient and desperate by the sudden death of Mr. Gammon, began to attempt daily to harass the unfortunate earl with their personal importunity for payment of their demands, and that at his residence in Grosvenor Square and at Poppleton Hall. At the former they were, of course, uniformly encountered by the answer that his lordship was both ill and out of town. Upon that, down to his lordship's nearest country residence—viz: Poppleton—went the chief of his infuriate creditors, not believing the answer they had received at his lordship's town-house; but which was there repeated to them, and with a peremptoriness of manner, which, excited as they were, they converted into insolence and defiance, and a determined denial to his lordship's creditors. Upon this, they took the opinion of counsel upon three points. First, whether a peer of the realm could be made a bankrupt if he became a trader; Secondly, whether the Earl of Dreddlington's active connexion with the Gunpowder and Fresh Water Company constituted him a trader within the meaning of the bankrupt laws; and Lastly, whether the facts stated amounted to an act of bankruptcy. To this it was answered—First, that a peer could clearly be made a bankrupt if he traded, as an Earl of Suffolk had been declared a bankrupt by reason of an act of bankruptcy committed by him in buying and selling of wines, (per Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, in ex parte Meymot, 1 Atkyn's Reports, page 201.) Secondly, that the Gunpowder and Fresh Water Company was one of such a nature as constituted its members "traders" within the meaning of the bankrupt laws. Thirdly, that the facts stated showed the committing of an act of bankruptcy, on the part of the Earl of Dreddlington, by "beginning to keep his house." Upon this, the more eager and reckless of his lordship's creditors instantly struck a docket against him; and thereupon, down came the messenger of the court to take possession of his lordship's houses and effects, both at Grosvenor Square, Poppleton Hall, and in Cornwall, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland—that is, as to the last four, if he could discover them. At Poppleton he was sternly refused an entrance; on which he produced his authority, and protested that, if further denied, he would immediately proceed to affect an entrance by main force, come what might, and those within must take the consequence. After a brief affrighted pause, he was admitted—and immediately declared himself to be in possession, under the bankruptcy, and by the authority of the Lord Chancellor, of the premises, and every thing upon them; at the same time announcing to the dismayed inmates, that he would do nothing to give the slightest annoyance, or occasion apprehensions to the noble bankrupt.

This very unusual occurrence found its way into the newspapers of the next day, which brought, accidentally, under the notice of Mr. Aubrey, the lamentable condition of his haughty yet fallen kinsman. He hurried off in alarm and agitation to Mr. Runnington, and requested him immediately to put himself into communication with the earl's solicitor, whoever he might be, with a view to saving him, if possible, from the indignity and ruin with which he was threatened; and then drove down himself to Poppleton, to tender his personal services in any way that might appear most desirable. He was shocked indeed at finding the house, and every thing in it, in formal possession of the bankruptcy messenger; but much more so, on learning the deplorable condition of the earl personally. It appeared that he had most unfortunately witnessed, during a brief lucid interval, and while he was being assisted out of his carriage on his return from an airing, the arrival of the messenger, and his altercation with the servants at the door; and that, on being made acquainted with the true nature of the proceeding, he staggered back into the arms of Miss Macspleuchan, and was soon afterwards seized with another fit of paralysis. All this Mr. Aubrey, on his arrival, learned from Miss Macspleuchan—whom he knew only by name—and who communicated the dismal tidings in an agony of grief and agitation.

The physician and apothecary were with the earl when Mr. Aubrey arrived; and, finding that he could render no personal service to his suffering kinsman, he returned to town, assuring Miss Macspleuchan that she would see him again on the morrow—and that he would, in the meanwhile, do every thing in his power, in town, to avert from the earl the immediate effects of his fearful imprudence. Faithful to his promise, he instructed Mr. Runnington to do every thing in reason to rescue the earl, and, in his person, the honour of the family, from the impending misfortune. 'Twas, however, all in vain. Two days afterwards, and before Mr. Runnington had acted upon the instructions given to him by Mr. Aubrey, the latter received intelligence by express from Poppleton, that the earl was in dying circumstances; that he was conscious of his rapidly approaching end; and was understood to have expressed a wish to see Mr. Aubrey before he died. When he arrived, he was at once ushered into the earl's bed-chamber, and found the Duke of Tantallan sitting on one side of the bed, and Miss Macspleuchan on the other; she was weeping in silence, and her left hand was grasped between the thin white hands of the earl, whose face was turned towards her. His snow-white hair and wasted features, and the expression of mingled misery, feebleness, and affection that were in his eyes, fixed heavily upon Miss Macspleuchan, filled Mr. Aubrey with deep emotion. The earl seemed a mere skeleton! Shortly after Mr. Aubrey had entered the room, Miss Macspleuchan leaned down to the earl's ear, and, in a whisper, informed him of Mr. Aubrey's arrival. He did not seem at first to have heard, or at least comprehended, what she had said; but, a few moments afterwards, opened his eyes a little wider than they had been before, and his lips quivered as if with an effort at speaking. Then he very feebly extended both his thin arms towards Miss Macspleuchan, who was still leaning over him, and placed them trembling round her neck, from which, however, in a moment or two, they suddenly fell; the lower jaw also fell: the poor earl was dead—and Miss Macspleuchan, with a faint shriek, sunk back in a swoon into the arms of the nurse who stood beside her, and who, assisted by a female attendant, immediately removed her from the room. The Duke of Tantallan remained sitting where he was, but with his face averted, and his right hand clasping one of the hands of his deceased kinsman: and Mr. Aubrey continued standing at the foot of the bed, his eyes covered by his hand. Neither of them spoke for some time. At length the duke, very deeply affected, slowly rose, and quitted the chamber in silence, followed by Mr. Aubrey, as those entered who were to commence the last sad offices for the dead.

The duke undertook all the arrangements for the funeral; and after much melancholy conversation with his grace concerning the shocking state in which the earl had left his affairs, and having offered to provide, should it be necessary, for Miss Macspleuchan, Mr. Aubrey took his departure.

"Is the carriage at the door?" he enquired of the servant who stood in the hall expecting his approach.

"Yes, my lord," he replied; "and his words caused Lord Drelincourt almost to start back a step or two; and he changed colour. Then he entered his carriage, and continued in a very melancholy and subdued mood during the whole of the drive up to town. He had, indeed, now become Lord Drelincourt—an event thus announced the next morning to the great world, in the columns of the obsequious Aurora.

"Yesterday, at his residence, Poppleton Hall, Hertfordshire, in his seventieth year, died the Right Hon. the Earl of Dreddlington, G. C. B., &c., &c. His lordship was Fifth Earl of Dreddlington, and Twentieth Baron Drelincourt.—The Earldom (created in 1667) is now extinct; but his lordship is succeeded in the ancient barony of Drelincourt (created by writ, 12th Henry II.) by Charles Aubrey, Esq. of Yatton, in Yorkshire, who is now 21st Lord Drelincourt, and has just succeeded in recovering back the whole of the Yattan property, which about two years ago, it may be remembered, was recovered in a very extraordinary manner (which is now, we believe, the subject of judicial inquiry) by Tittlebat Titmouse, Esq., at present M. P. for Yatton. His lordship (who is now in his thirty-sixth year) took a double first-class at Oxford, and sat for several years as member for Yatton. He married, in 18—, Agnes, sole daughter and heiress of the late Colonel St. Clair, who fell in the Peninsular war, and has issue by her ladyship two children, Charles, born in 18—, and Agnes, born in 18—. His lordship has no brothers, and only one sister, Miss Catherine Aubrey, who is understood to be affianced to the Hon. Mr. Delamere, the only son and heir of the Right Hon. Lord de la Zouch,—The late Farl was a staunch Whig; but the present Lord Drelincourt is a Tory."

Till Yatton could be got ready for their reception, they had taken, as a temporary residence, a furnished house in Dover Street, only a few doors' distance from that of Lord de la Zouch; and on his arrival from Poppleton Hall, Lord Drelincourt found Lady Drelincourt and his sister had not yet returned from their afternoon's drive. When they drew up to the door, however, the closed shutters and drawn blinds apprized them of the melancholy event which had taken place. On hearing that Lord Drelincourt was alone in the drawing-room, where he had been for upwards of an hour, they rushed hastily up stairs, and in a few moments Lord and Lady Drelincourt had fondly embraced each other, and Miss Aubrey, full of eager affection, had embraced both of them; and then, quitting the room, quickly returned with Charles and Agnes, now—little unconscious creatures!—the Honourable Charles and the Honourable Agnes Aubrey. Surely it was not to be expected that any of them should entertain very poignant feelings of sorrow for the death of an individual who had ever totally estranged himself from them, and treated every member of their family with the most offensive and presumptuous insolence—the bitterest contempt; who, when he knew that they were destitute and all but perishing, had kept cruelly aloof as ever, without once extending towards them a helping hand. Still, they had regarded the afflicting circumstance which attended, and hastened their lofty kinsman's death, with sincere commiseration for one so weak and misguided, and whose pride had had, indeed, so signal and fearful a fall. These were topics which afforded scope for sad but instructive conversation and reflection; and before Lord and Lady Drelincourt laid their heads on their pillows that night, they again devoutly returned thanks to Heaven for the happy restoration which had been vouchsafed to them, and offered sincere and fervent prayers for its guidance in every stage of their future career.

This event, of course, threw them again, for a time, into mourning. Lord Drelincourt attended the funeral of the late earl, which took place at Poppleton, and was plain and private; and a few days afterwards, yearning to see Yatton once again, and anxious also to give his personal directions concerning very many matters which required them, he accepted an offer of a seat in the carriage of Lord de la Zouch, who was going down for a few days to Fotheringham on business of importance. Lord Drelincourt agreed to take up his abode at Fotheringham during his brief stay in Yorkshire, and to give no one at Yatton the least intimation of his intention to pay a visit to them,—purposing, the morning after his arrival at Fotheringham, to ride over quietly, alone and unexpectedly, to the dear place of his birth, and scene of such signal trials and expected joy and triumphs.

'Twas about four o'clock in the afternoon of a frosty day in the early part of December; and Dr. Tatham was sitting alone in his plainly-furnished and old-fashioned little study, beside the table on which Betty, his old housekeeper, had just laid his scanty show of tea-things—the small, quaintly-figured round silver tea-pot, having been the precious gift, more than twenty years before, of old Madam Aubrey. On his knee lay open a well-worn parchment-covered Elzevir copy of Thomas a Kempis, a constant companion of the doctor's, which he had laid down a few moments before, in a fit of musing—and he was gazing in the direction of the old yew tree, a portion of which, with a gray crumbling corner of his church, at only some two dozen yards' distance, was visible through the window. On one side of his book-shelves hung his surplice, on a peg; and on the other his rusty shovel hat and walking-stick.

Over the mantel-piece hung two small black profile likenesses of old Squire Aubrey, and Madam Aubrey, which they had themselves presented to the doctor nearly thirty years before. Though it was very cold, there was but a handful of fire in the little grate; and this, together with the modicum of coarse brown sugar in the sugar-basin, and about two tea-spoonfuls of tea, which he had just before measured out of his little tea-caddy, into his tea-cup, in order to be ready to put it into his tea-pot, when Betty should have brought in the kettle—and four thin slices of scantily buttered brown bread—all this, I say, seemed touching evidence of the straitened circumstances in which the poor doctor was placed. His clothes, too, very clean, very thread-bare, and of a very rusty hue,—down even to his gaiters,—suggested the same reflection to the beholder. The five pounds which he had scraped together for purchasing a new suit, Mr. Titmouse, it will be remembered, had succeeded in cheating him out of. His hair was of a silvery white; and though he was evidently a little cast down in spirits, the expression of his countenance was as full of benevolence and piety as ever. He was, moreover, considerably thinner than when he was last presented to the reader; and well he might be, for he had since undergone great privation and anxiety. He—he, peaceful unoffending old soul!—had long been followed with pertinacious bitterness and persecution by two new inhabitants of the village, viz., the Rev. Smirk Mudflint and Mr. Bloodsuck, junior. The former had obtained a lease from Mr. Titmouse of the little building which had formerly been Miss Aubrey's school, and had turned it into a Unitarian chapel,—himself and family residing in part of the building. He preached every Sunday at Doctor Tatham, turning his person, his habits, his office, and his creed into bitter ridicule; and repeatedly challenging him, from his pulpit, to an open discussion of the points in difference between them! By means of his "moral" discourses every Sunday morning, and his "political" discourses every Sunday evening,—and which he used all his powers to render palatable to those who heard him—he was actually seducing away many of the parishioners from the parish church; a matter which began visibly to prey upon the doctor's spirits. Then Mr. Bloodsuck, too, was carrying on the campaign briskly against the parson,—against whom he had got a couple of actions pending at the suit of parishioners in respect of his right to certain tithes which had never before been questioned by any one. Only that very day the impudent jackanapes—for that, I am sure, you would have pronounced Mr. Barnabas Bloodsuck at first sight—had sent a very peremptory and offensive letter to the doctor, which had been designed by its writer to have the effect of drawing the doctor into a sudden compromise; whereas the doctor, with a just sense and spirit, had resolved never in any way to suffer his rights, and those of his successors, to be infringed. Many and many a weary walk to Mr. Parkinson's office at Grilston had these persecuting proceedings of Bloodsuck's cost the doctor, and also considerable and unavoidable expense, which, had he been in any other hands than those of good Mr. Parkinson, must by this time have involved the doctor in utter ruin, and broken his heart. Still generous according to his means, the good soul had, on his last visit to Grilston, purchased and brought home with him a couple of bottles of port wine, which he intended to take on Christmas day to a poor brother parson in an adjoining parish, whose wife had been bedridden for ten years. All these matters might well occasion Dr. Tatham anxiety, and frequent fits of despondency, such as that under which he was suffering, when he heard a gentle tapping at his door, while sitting in his study as I have described him. "Come in, Betty," quoth the doctor in his usual kind and quiet way, supposing it to be his old housekeeper with his tea-kettle; for she had gone with it a few minutes before across the yard to the well, leaving the front door ajar till her return. As he uttered the words above mentioned, the door opened. He sat with his back towards it; and finding, after a pause, that no one entered or spoke, he turned round in his chair to see the reason why, and beheld a gentleman standing there, dressed in deep mourning, and gazing at him with an expression of infinite tenderness and benignity. The doctor was a little of a believer in the reality of spiritual appearances; and, taken quite off his guard, jumped out of his chair, and stared for a second or two in mute amazement, if not even apprehension, at the figure standing silently in the doorway.

"Why! Bless—bless my soul—can it be"—he stammered, and the next instant perceived that it was indeed, as I may say, the desire of his eyes—Mr. Aubrey, now become, as the doctor had a few days before heard from Mr. Parkinson, Lord Drelincourt.

"Oh my dear, old, revered, beloved friend! Do I see you once again?" he exclaimed in a tremulous voice, as he stepped hastily up to the doctor, with his arms extended towards him, and, grasping the hand of the doctor with vehement pressure, they both gazed at each other for some moments in silence, and with the tears in their eyes, Lord Drelincourt's soul touched within him by the evident alteration which had taken place in Dr. Tatham's appearance.

"And is it indeed true, my dear friend?" at length faltered the doctor, still gazing at Lord Drelincourt.

"It is your old friend, Charles Aubrey! dearest doctor! God bless you, my revered friend and instructor of my youth!" said Lord Drelincourt, with a full heart and a quivering lip; "I am come, you see, once more to Yatton, and first of all to you; and in your presence to acknowledge the goodness of God, for he has been very good to me!"

"The Lord God of thy fathers bless thee!" exclaimed Dr. Tatham solemnly; and Lord Drelincourt reverently received the benison. A few moments afterwards he sat down, opposite the doctor, in the only spare chair there was in the room, and they were instantly engaged in eager and affectionate converse.

"Why, Mr. Aubrey," quoth the doctor with a smile, but also a slight embarrassment, "I had forgotten—Lord Drelincourt, how strangely it sounds!"

"Yes, it is true, such is now my name; but believe me, I am not yet reconciled to it, especially, dearest doctor, in your presence! Shall I ever be as happy as Lord Drelincourt as I have been as Charles Aubrey!"

"Ay, ay, dear friend, to be sure you will! 'Tis in the course of God's providence that you are raised to distinction, as well as restored to your own! Long may you live to enjoy both! and I hope at Yatton," he added earnestly.

"Oh, can you doubt it, dearest doctor? My heart is only now recovering the wounds it received in being torn from this dear spot."

"And Mrs. Au—I mean Lady Drelincourt. God Almighty bless her! and Kate, sweet, dear Kate? Well! she has not changed her name yet, I suppose!"

"Not yet," replied Lord Drelincourt with a cheerful smile.

"And do you mean to say that you are all coming to old Yatton again?"

"Coming to Yatton again? 'Tis a little paradise to all of us! Here we wish to live; and, when we follow those who have gone before us, there we wish to rest!" said Lord Drelincourt solemnly, and he pointed towards the churchyard, with a look that suddenly filled the doctor's eyes with tears, for it brought full before them the funeral of Mrs. Aubrey.

"I have two letters for you," said Lord Drelincourt after a pause, taking out his pocket-book, "from my wife and sister, who charged me to give them into your own hands with their fervent love;" and he gave two letters into the doctor's hands, which trembled with emotion as he received them.

"I shall read them by-and-by, when I am alone," said he, as, gazing fondly at the superscriptions, he placed the two letters on the mantelpiece.

'Come in! come in!" quoth the doctor quickly, hearing a knocking at the door—"that's Betty. You have not forgotten old Betty, have you?" said he to Lord Drelincourt, as the good old woman opened the door in a flustered manner, with the kettle in her hands, and dropped an awful curtsy on seeing Lord Drelincourt, whom she instantly recognised.

"Well, Betty," said he, with infinite cordiality, "I'm glad to see you again, and to hear that you are well!"

"Yes, sir!—if you please, sir!—thank you, sir!" stammered Betty, curtsying repeatedly, and standing, with the kettle in her hand, as if she did not intend to come in with it."

"That will do, Betty," quoth the doctor, and looked so delighted at Lord Drelincourt's good-natured greeting of his faithful old servant; "bring it in! And Thomas is quite well, too," he added, turning to Lord Drelincourt—Thomas being Betty's husband—and both of whom had lived with the doctor for some eighteen or twenty years—Thomas's business being to look after the doctor's nag while he kept one, and now to do odd jobs about the little garden and paddock. After one or two kind enquiries about him, "I must join you, doctor—if you please," said Lord Drelincourt, as Betty put the kettle on the fire; "you'll give me a cup of tea"——

"A cup of tea! Ay, to be sure! Betty!—here," said he, beckoning her to him, and whispering to her to bring out the best tea-things, and to run out into the village for a couple of tea-cakes, and a little more tea, and some eggs and butter, and half a pound of lump sugar—for the doctor was bent upon doing the thing splendidly on so great an occasion; but Lord Drelincourt, who overheard him, and who had asked to take tea with him only that he might not delay the doctor's doing so—(for Lord Drelincourt had not yet dined)—interposed, declaring that if any thing of the sort were done he would leave immediately; adding, that he expected his horses at the door every moment, and also that Lord de la Zouch (who had come over with him from Fotheringham, and was at that moment at the Hall) would presently call to join him on his way home. This secured Lord Drelincourt's wishes—and you might, within a few minutes' time, have seen him partaking of the doctor's humble beverage, while they continued in eager and earnest conversation. Lord Drelincourt had that morning had a very long conversation with Mr. Parkinson, from whom he had learned the life of persecution which the poor doctor had led for the last two years—and learned it, too, with the keenest indignation. The doctor himself softened down matters a good deal in the account which he gave Lord Drelincourt—but his lordship saw at once that the case had not been in the least overstated by Mr. Parkinson; and, without intimating any thing of his intentions to the doctor, resolved upon forthwith taking certain steps which, had they known them, would have made two persons in the village shake in their shoes.

"What's that, doctor?" suddenly enquired Lord Drelincourt, hearing a noise as of shouting outside. Now the fact was, that the appearance of Lord Drelincourt and Lord de la Zouch, and their two grooms, as they galloped down the village on their way to the Hall, (from which Lord Drelincourt, as I have stated, had walked to the vicarage, whither he was to be followed by Lord de la Zouch,) had created a pretty sensation in the village; for Lord Drelincourt, rapidly as he rode in, was soon recognised by those who were about, and the news spread like wildfire that the lord "Squire" had come back, and was then at Yatton—a fact which seemed to be any thing but gratifying to Messrs. Bloodsuck and Mudflint, who were talking together, at the moment when Lord Drelincourt asked the question of Dr. Tatham, at the door of Mr. Mudflint, whose face seemed to have got several degrees sallower within a quarter of an hour, while Mr. Bloodsuck looked quite white. There was a continually increasing crowd about the front of the vicarage; and as they got more and more assured of the fact that Lord Drelincourt was at that moment in the vicarage, they began to shout "hurrah!" So——

"What's that!" enquired Lord Drelincourt.

"Ah!—I know!" cried the doctor, with not a little excitement; "they've found you out, bless them!—hark!—I have not heard such a thing I don't know how long—I wonder they don't set the bells a-ringing!—Why, bless me! there's a couple of hundred people before the door!" exclaimed he, after having stepped into the front room, and reconnoitred through the window. Though the gloom of evening was rapidly deepening, Lord Drelincourt also perceived the great number of people that had collected together, and his eye having caught the approaching figure of Lord de la Zouch, for whom, and the grooms, the crowd made way, he prepared to leave. Lord de la Zouch dismounted, and, entering the vicarage, shook hands with the utmost cordiality with the little doctor, whom he invited to dine and sleep at Fotheringham on the morrow, promising to send the carriage for him. The little doctor scarce knew whether he stood on his head or his heels, in the excitement of the moment; and when he and Lord Drelincourt appeared at the door, and a great shout burst from those present, it was with great difficulty that he could resist his inclination to join in it. It was growing late, however, and they had a long ride before them: so Lord Drelincourt, having stood for some moments bareheaded and bowing to all around, and shaking hands with those who pressed nearest, following the example of Lord de la Zouch, mounted his horse, and waving his hand affectionately to Dr. Tatham, rode off amidst the renewed cheers of the crowd. From that moment Dr. Tatham had regained almost all his former ascendency at Yatton.

As the two peers sat together over their wine that evening, the fate of the Rev. Mr. Mudflint and Barnabas Bloodsuck, junior, gentleman, was sealed. The more that they talked together about the wanton and bitter insults and persecutions which those worthies had so long inflicted upon surely one of the most inoffensive, peaceable, and benevolent beings upon the earth, Dr. Tatham, the higher rose their indignation, the sterner their determination to punish and remove his enemies. The next morning Lord de la Zouch wrote up to town, directing instructions to be given to Mr. Runnington, who had conducted the proceedings in the actions of Wigley v. Mudflint, and Wigley v. Bloodsuck, to issue execution forthwith. Lord Drelincourt also did his part. Almost every house in the village was his property, and he instructed Mr. Parkinson immediately to take steps towards summarily ejecting them from the premises they were respectively occupying—convinced that by so doing he was removing two principal sources of filth and mischief from the village and neighbourhood; for they were the founders and most active members of a sort of spouting-club for radical and infidel speechifying, and promoting the interests of the Liberal cause at Yatton, and which club their presence and influence alone kept together.

Early the next morning Lord Drelincourt returned to the Hall, having appointed several persons to meet him there, on business principally relating to the restoration of the Hall to its former state, as far as practicable; at all events, to render it fit for the reception of the family within as short a period as possible. According to an arrangement he had made before quitting town, he found, on reaching the Hall, a gentleman from London, of great taste and experience, to whose hands was to be entrusted the entire superintendence of the contemplated reparations and restorations, both internal and external, regard being had to the antique and peculiar character of the mansion—it being his lordship's anxious wish that Lady Drelincourt and Miss Aubrey, on their return, should see it, as nearly as was practicable, in the condition in which they had left it. Fortunately the little Vandal, who had just been expelled from it, had done little or no permanent or substantial injury. There was the same great irregular mass of old brickwork, with its huge stacks of chimneys, just as they had ever known it, only requiring a little pointing. That fine old relic, the castellated gateway, clad in ivy, with its gray, crumbling, stone-capped battlements, and escutcheon over the point of the arch, had suffered no change; even the quaint, weather-beaten sundial stood in the centre of the grass-plot, within the court-yard, as they had left it. The yew-trees still lined the high walls which surrounded the court-yard; and the fine old clump of cedars of Lebanon was there—green, stately, and solemn, as in days of yore. The moment, however, that you passed the threshold of the Hall, you sighed at the change that had taken place. Where were now the armed figures, the pikes, bows, guns, and spears, and the quaint old pictures of the early ancestors of the family of the Aubreys? Not a trace now to be seen of them, and it gave Lord Drelincourt a pang as his eye travelled round the bare walls. But the case was not desperate. All the aforesaid pictures still lay rolled up in the lumber-room, where they had continued as articles utterly valueless ever since Mr. Titmouse had ordered them to be taken down. They had been brought down, and now lay on the floor, having been carefully unrolled and examined by the man of taste, who undertook quickly to remove the incipient ravage of mould and dirt at present visible, and to have them suspended in their former position, in such a state as that only the closest scrutiny could detect any difference between their present and former condition. The other relics of antiquity—viz., the armour—had been purchased by the late Lady Stratton at one of the sales of Titmouse's effects, occasioned by an execution against him, and they still were at her late residence, and of course at Lord Drelincourt's disposal, as her ladyship's administrator. These, on his seeing them, the man of taste pronounced to be very fine and valuable specimens of old English armour, and undertook to have them also in their old places, and in a far better condition even than before.

Lord Drelincourt sighed repeatedly as he went over every one of the bare and deserted rooms in the mansion—nothing being left except the beautiful antique mantelpieces of inlaid oak, and the oak-paneling of the different rooms, which, as a part of the freehold, could not be seized as the personal property of Mr. Titmouse. His creditors had swept off, from time to time, any thing that had belonged to him—the hall, the dining-room, breakfast-room, drawing-rooms, the library, the bed-rooms, dressing-rooms, boudoirs of Mrs. Aubrey and his sister, the long galleries, the rooms in which Charles and Agnes used to romp and play about—all was now bare and desolate, and the echoes of their footfalls and voices, in passing through them, struck Lord Drelincourt's heart with sadness. But all this was to be easily and quickly remedied; for a carte blanche was given to the man of taste at his elbow, who undertook within two, or at most three months' time, to leave nothing for the eye or the heart to sigh for—guided, moreover, as all his movements would be, by those who were so deeply interested in their success. On reaching the two rooms in the north-eastern extremities of the building, the windows of which commanded a view of nearly three-fourths of the estate, he gazed around him in silence which those beside him thoroughly appreciated. There was nothing to shock the eye or pain the heart; for, as Mr. Titmouse had been restrained from cutting timber, behold! what a sight would be seen when, in the approaching spring, the groves and forests, stretching far and wide before him, should have put on all their bravery. And he found, on enquiry, and going over a portion of the grounds, that Mr. Waters and Dickons had kept pretty sharp eyes about them, and maintained every thing in infinitely better condition than could have been expected. Mr. Tonson had, moreover, looked very keenly after the game; and Pumpkin undertook, by spring time, to make his gardens and greenhouses a sight delightful to behold. In a word, Lord Drelincourt left every thing under the management of the London man of taste, and of Mr. Griffiths, the former being guided, of course, in the purchase of the leading articles of furniture in town, from time to time, by the tastes of Lord and Lady Drelincourt and Miss Aubrey. The latter was desired to re-engage as many of the former servants of Mr. Aubrey as he could, and informed Lord Drelincourt of two in particular, who had signified their anxious wish to him on the subject, viz: Mrs. Jackson, the housekeeper, who had lived in that capacity with a brother of hers at York, on quitting the service of Mrs. Aubrey. She was, of course, to be immediately reinstated in her old place. The other was Harriet, Miss Aubrey's maid, who, it may be remembered, was so disconsolate at being left behind by Miss Aubrey, who had secured her a place at the late Lady Stratton's at whose house she still lived, with several of the other servants, the establishment not having been yet finally broken up. The poor girl very nearly went distracted with joy on receiving, a short time afterwards, an intimation, that as soon as she had got her clothes in readiness, she might set off for town, and enter at once upon her duties as lady's maid to Miss Aubrey. Finding, on enquiry, that there was not one single tenant upon the estate, whose rent had not been raised above that which had been paid in Mr. Aubrey's time, he ordered the rent of all to be reduced to that amount, and enquiries to be made after several respectable tenants, whom the extortion of Mr. Titmouse and his agents had driven from their farms, with a view of restoring them in lieu of their very questionable successors. Having thus set every thing in train for a restoration to the former happy and contented state of things which prevailed at Yatton before the usurpation of Mr. Titmouse, Lord Drelincourt returned to town, but first left a hundred pounds in Dr. Tatham's hands, to be distributed as he thought proper amongst the poorer villagers and neighbours on Christmas eve; and also insisted on the doctor's acceptance, himself, of fifty pounds in advance, on account of his salary, a hundred a-year, as chaplain to Lord Drelincourt, which appointment the doctor received from his lordship's own hands, and with not a little delight and pride. His lordship, moreover, desired Mr. Parkinson to hold him responsible for any little demand which might be due from the poor doctor, in respect of the litigation in which he had been involved; and thus Dr. Tatham was made a free man of again, with no further question about his right to tithes, or any more of the interruption of any of the sources of his little income, to which he had lately been subjected; and with fifty pounds, moreover, at his absolute disposal. The doctor made his appearance on Christmas-day in a very fine suit of black, new hat and all, and had a very full attendance at church, and, moreover, a very cheerful and attentive one.

A day or two after Lord Drelincourt's return to town, Messrs. Mudflint and Bloodsuck received a very pressing invitation to York Castle, whose hospitable owners would receive no denial. In plain English, they were both taken in execution on the same day, by virtue of two writs of capias ad satisfaciendum, for the damages and costs due Mr. Wigley; viz., £.2960: 16: 4 from Smirk Mudflint, and £.2760, 19s. from Barnabas Bloodsuck, junior. Poor Mr. Mudflint! In vain—in vain had been his Sunday evening's lectures for the last three months, on the errors which pervaded all systems of jurisprudence which annexed any pecuniary liabilities to political offences, instead of leaving the evil to be redressed by the spontaneous good sense of society. A single tap of the sheriff-officer on the eloquent lecturer's shoulder, upset all his fine speculations, just as Corporal Trim said, that one shove of the bayonet was worth all Dr. Slop's metaphysical discourses upon the art of war!

In the next Yorkshire Stingo, (which, alas! between ourselves, was very nearly on its last legs,) there appeared one, I must own, of the most magnificent articles I ever read upon the subject of the atrocious and unparalleled outrage on the liberties of the subject, which had been committed in the incarceration of the two patriots—the martyr-patriots—Mudflint and Bloodsuck. On that day, it said, the sun of liberty had set on England for ever—in fact, it had gone down in blood. The enlightened patriot, Mudflint, had at length fallen before the combined forces of bigotry and tyranny, which were now, in the shape of the Church of England and the aristocracy, riding rough-shod over the necks of Englishmen. In his person lay prostrate the sacred rights of conscience, and the inalienable liberty of Englishmen. He had stood forth, nobly foremost, in the fray between the people and their oppressors; and he had fallen!—but he felt how dulce et decoram it was, pro patria mori! He felt prouder and happier in his bonds than could ever feel the splendid fiend at F———m, in all his blood-stained magnificence! It then called upon the people, in vivid and spirit-stirring language, to rise against their tyrants like one man, and the days of tyranny were numbered; and stated that the first blow was already struck against the black and monstrous fabric of priestcraft and tyranny, for that a subscription had been already opened on behalf of Mr. Mudflint and Mr. Bloodsuck, for the purpose of discharging the amount of debt and costs for which they had been so infamously deprived of their liberty. An unprecedented sensation had been already excited; and a reference to the advertising columns of their paper would show that the work went bravely on. The friends of religious and civil liberty all over the country were roused; they had but to continue their exertions, and the majesty of the people would be heard in a voice of thunder. This article produced an immense sensation in that part of York Castle where the patriots were confined, and in the immediate neighbourhood of the office of the Yorkshire Stingo, (in fact, it was the production of the masterly pen of Mudflint himself.) Sure enough, on referring to the advertising columns of the Stingo, the following did appear fully to warrant the tone of indignant exultation indulged in by the editor:

"Subscriptions already received (through C. Woodlouse) towards raising a fund for the liberation of the Reverend Smirk Mudflint and Barnabas Bloodsuck, junior, Esq., at present confined in York Castle.

Now, to conceal nothing from the reader, whose confidence my candour has, I feel sure, gained me long ago, I regret to inform him that, with the exception of Sir H. R. Wildfire, Bart., the above noble-spirited individuals, whom no one had ever heard of in or near Grilston, or any where else, had their local habitation and their name only in the fertile brain of the Rev. Mr. Mudflint, who had hit upon this device as an effectual one for getting up the steam, (to use a modern and a significant expression,) and giving the mighty impulse which was requisite to burst the bonds of the two imprisoned patriots.

Sir Harkaway's name was in the list, to be sure, but that was on the distinct understanding that he was not to be called on to pay one farthing; the bargain being, that, if he would give the sanction of his name to Messrs Mudflint and Bloodsuck, they would allow him to have the credit, gratis, of so liberally supporting the liberal cause.

The following, however, were real and bona fide names and subscriptions collected during the ensuing three weeks; and though, when annexed to the foregoing flourishing commencement of the list, they give it, I must own, a somewhat tadpole appearance, yet here they follow:—

Certainly this was "not as good as could have been expected"—as the editor subsequently owned in his leading article—and asked, with sorrowful indignation, how the people could expect any one to be true to them if they were not true to themselves. He said, our cheeks tingle with shame on looking at the paltry list of additional contributions—"Oh, lame and impotent conclusion" to so auspicious a commencement!—This was very fine indeed. It came very well from Mr. Woodlouse in his editorial capacity; but Mr. Woodlouse, in his capacity as a man of business, was a very different person. Alas! that it should fall to my lot to enquire, in my turn, with sorrowful indignation—was there NO honour among thieves? But, to come to the point, it fell out in this wise. Patriots must live, even in prison; and Mr. Mudflint, being sorely pressed, wrote a letter to his "Dear Woodlouse," asking for the amount of subscriptions received up to that date. He received, in return, a most friendly note, addressed "My Dear Mudflint"—hoping the air of the castle agreed with him—saying how he was missed from the Liberal circle, and would be received with open arms if ever he got out—and enclosing a nicely-drawn out debtor and creditor account, headed—

"The Rev. Smirk Mudflint and Barnabas Bloodsuck, Esq., in account with Cephas Woodlouse," in which every farthing of the above sum of £3 13 5¾. was faithfully set down to the credit side; but, alas!—on the debit side stood the following:—

On perusing the above document, so pregnant with perfidy and extortion, Mr. Mudflint put it into his pocket, and, slipping off to his sleeping-room, closed the door, took off his garters, and, with very deadly intentions towards himself, was tying them together—casting a ghastly glance, occasionally, to a great hook in the wall, which he could just reach by standing on a stool—when he was discovered, and removed, with his hands tied behind him, "to the strong room," where he was fastened to a heavy wooden bench, and left to his meditations. Solitude and reflection restored the afflicted patient to something like composure and resignation; and after reflecting deeply on the selfishness and worthlessness of worldly friendship, his thoughts gradually turned towards a better place—a haven of rest—viz. the Insolvent Debtor's Court.

The effect of this infamous treatment upon his fellow captive, Bloodsuck, was quite different. Having sworn one single prodigious oath, he enclosed the above account and sent it off to his father, in the following pithy letter:—

"York Castle, 29th Dec. 18——

"Dear father,—Read the enclosed, and then sell up Woodlouse.

"Your affectionate son,
"B. Bloodsuck, (Jun.)"

The old gentleman, on reading the above and its enclosure, immediately issued execution against Woodlouse, and a cognovit of his for £150, which had been given to the firm of Bloodsuck and Son for the balance of a bill of theirs for defending him unsuccessfully against an action for an infamous libel. Nobody would bid any thing for his moribund paper; he had no other effects; and was immediately taken in execution, and sent to York Castle, where he, Bloodsuck, and Mudflint, whenever they met, could hardly be restrained from tearing one another's eyes out.

Thus it is that reptiles of this sort prey upon each other. To "begin nothing of which you have not well considered the end," is a saying the propriety of which every one recognises when he hears it enunciated, but no one thinks of it in the conduct of actual life; and what follows will illustrate the truth of my reflection. 'Twas a capital notion of Mudflint's to send forth such a splendid list of sham subscribers, and it was natural enough for Mr. Bloodsuck to assent to it, and Mr. Woodlouse to become the party to it which he did—but who could have foreseen the consequences?

A quarrel a[illegible]gues is always attended with ugly and unexpected consequences to themselves.—Now, here was a mortal feud between Mr. Woodlouse on the one side, and Messrs. Mudflint and Bloodsuck on the other; and in due course of time they all applied, as a matter of course, for relief under the Insolvent Debtor's Act. Before they got to the question concerning the nature of the debt—viz. the penalties in an action for the odious offence of bribery—in the case of Mr. Mudflint, he had to encounter a very serious and truly unexpected obstacle—viz. he had given in, with the minutest accuracy, the items of the subscription, amounting to £3., 13s., 5¾d., but had observed the most mysterious and (as he might suppose) politic silence concerning the greater sum of £650, which had been brought under the notice of the creditors of Messrs. Mudflint and Bloodsuck by Mr. Woodlouse. On the newspaper acknowledging the receipt of that large sum being produced in court, Mr. Mudflint made very light of the matter, simply smiling and shrugging his shoulders; but when Mr. Woodlouse was called as a witness, you may guess the consternation of Mr. Mudflint, on hearing him swear that he had certainly never himself received the money, but had no doubt of Mr. Mudflint having done so—which, in fact, had always been his impression; for when Mr. Mudflint had furnished him with the list, which he produced in court, in Mudflint's handwriting, he inserted it in his paper as a matter of course—taking it to be a bona fide and matter of fact transaction. The evident consternation of Mudflint satisfied all who heard him of his villany and the truth and honesty of Woodlouse, who stuck to his new version of the affair manfully. But this opened quite a new view of his position to Mr. Bloodsuck, who, on finding that he must needs adopt either Mudflint's or Woodlouse's version of the affair, began to reflect upon the disagreeable effect it would have upon the connexion and character of the respectable firm of Bloodsuck and Son, for him to appear to have been a party to such a shocking fraud upon the public, as a sham list of subscribers, and to so large an amount. He therefore swore stoutly that he had always been under the impression that Mr. Mudflint had received the £650, and very much regretted to find that that gentleman must have been appropriating so large a sum to himself. This tallied with Woodlouse's account of the matter; and infinitely disgusted was that gentleman at finding himself so cleverly outwitted by Bloodsuck. On this Mudflint turned with fury upon Bloodsuck, and he upon Mudflint, who abused Woodlouse; and eventually the court, unable to believe any of them, remanded them all till the next court day; addressing a very stern warning to Mr. Mudflint, concerning the serious consequences of his thus fraudulently concealing his property from his creditors. By the time of his being next brought up, Mudflint had bethought himself of a mode of collaterally combating the truth of his version of the affair of that accursed first list of subscribers—viz. summoning Sir Harkaway Rotgut Wildfire; whom he confidently asked whether, for all his name appeared in the subscription list, he had really ever given one farthing of the £50 there mentioned! Had Mr. Mudflint been a long-headed man; he would never have taken this step: for Sir Harkaway could never be supposed capable of bringing himself to admit that he had allowed himself to be a party to such a deceit upon the public. On a careful consideration of the circumstances, therefore, Sir Harkaway having an eye solely to his own credit, first said that he was not in the habit of allowing his name to appear in such lists without his having actually paid the sum named; then he swore that he thought he must have paid it; then, that he had very little doubt on the subject; then, that he had no doubt in the matter at all; then, that he knew that in point of fact he had advanced the money; and finally, that he then recollected the circumstances distinctly. On this complete confirmation of the roguery of Mudflint, he was instantly reprimanded severely, and remanded indefinitely; the whole court believing that he had appropriated to his own use every farthing of the £650, defrauding even his fellow-prisoner, Mr. Bloodsuck. It was a good while before Mr. Mudflint recovered from the effects of this astounding conduct of Sir Harkaway. He felt certain that, somewhere or other, he had a letter from him which would satisfy every body of the peculiarly unpleasant position in which the worthy baronet had placed himself. And sure enough, on desiring his wife to institute a rigorous search over his papers, she succeeded in discovering the following, which she at once forwarded to her disconsolate husband:—

View-Hallo Hall, 27th Dec. 18—.

"Sir,

"I have a considerable regard for your services to liberty, (civil and religious,) and am willing to serve you in the way you wish. You may put me down in the list for any thing you please, as my name carries weight in the county—but, of course, you know better than to kill your decoy-duck.

Sir,
Your obedient servant,
H. R. WILDFIRE.

The Rev. S. Mudflint,
&c.

This unfortunate letter, in the first frenzy of his rage and exultation, Mudflint instantly forwarded, with a statement of facts, to the editor of the True Blue newspaper, which carried it into every corner of the county on the very next morning; and undoubtedly gave thereby a heavy blow and a great discouragement to the Liberal cause all over Yorkshire, for Sir Harkaway had been till then looked upon as a very staunch and powerful supporter of it.

Very shortly after Messrs. Mudflint and Bloodsuck had gone to pay this, their long-expected visit, to the governor of York Castle, Mr. Parkinson required possession of the residence of each of them, in Yatton, to be delivered up to him on behalf of Lord Drelincourt, allowing a week's time for the removal of the few effects of each; after which period had elapsed, the premises in question were completely cleared of every thing belonging to their late odious occupants—who, in all human probability, would never again have an opportunity of settling themselves in Yatton—infinitely to the delight of Dr. Tatham and all the better sort of the inhabitants. In a similar manner another crying nuisance—viz. the public-house known by the name of The Toper's Arms, was got rid of; it having been resolved upon by Lord Drelincourt that there should be thenceforth but one public-house in Yatton; viz.—the quiet, old, original Aubrey Arms, and which was quite sufficient for the purposes of the inhabitants of the village. Two or three other persons who had crept into the village during the Titmouse dynasty were similarly dealt with, infinitely to the satisfaction of those left behind; and by Christmas day the village was beginning to show signs of a return to its former condition. The works going on at the Hall gave an air of cheerful bustle and animation to the whole neighbourhood, and afforded extensive employment at a season of the year when employment was most wanted. The chapel and residence of the Rev. Mr. Mudflint underwent a rapid and remarkable alteration. The fact was, that Mr. Delamere had conceived the idea, which, with Lord Drelincourt's consent, he proceeded to carry immediately into execution, of pulling down the existing structure, and raising in its stead a beautiful school, and filling it with scholars, and providing a matron for it by way of giving a pleasant surprise to Kate on her return to Yatton. He engaged a well-known architect, who submitted to him a plan of a very beautiful little Gothic structure, adapted for receiving some eighteen or twenty scholars, and also affording a permanent residence for the mistress; and whose plan being heartily approved of by Mr. Delamere and Dr. Tatham, whom he had taken into his counsel in the affair, they received a pledge that the school should be completed and fit for occupation within three months' time. There was to be in the front a small and tasteful tablet, bearing the inscription—

C. A.
Fundatrix.
18—.

The mistress of Kate's former school gladly relinquished a similar situation which she held in another part of the county, in order to return to her old one at Yatton, and Dr. Tatham was, in the first instance, to select the scholars, who were to be clothed, at Delamere's expense, in the former neat and simple attire which had been adopted by Miss Aubrey. How he delighted to think of the charming surprise he was thus preparing for his lovely mistress, and by which, at the same time, he was securing for her a permanent and interesting memento in the neighbourhood! About this time there came a general election, the nation being thoroughly disgusted with the character and conduct of a great many of those who had, in the direful hubbub of the last election, contrived to creep into the House of Commons. All I have to do, however, at present, with that most important election, is to state its effect upon the representation of the borough of Yatton. Its late member, Mr. Tittlebat Titmouse, it completely annihilated. Of course, he made no attempt to stand again; nor, in fact, did any one in the same interest. The Yorkshire Stingo tried desperately to get up a contest, but in vain. Mr. Going Gone—and even Mr. Glister—were quite willing to have stood—but, first, neither of them could afford to pay his share of the expenses of the hustings; and secondly, there were exceeding great difficulties in the way of either of them procuring a qualification. Besides, the more sensible even of the strong Liberal electors, had become alive to the exquisite absurdity of returning such persons as Titmouse, or any one of his class. Then the Quaint Club had ceased to exist, partly through the change of political feeling which was rapidly gaining ground in the borough, and partly through terror of the consequences of bribery, of which the miserable fate of Mudflint and Bloodsuck was a fearful instance. In fact, the disasters which had befallen these gentlemen, and Mr. Titmouse, had completely paralysed and crushed the Liberal party at Yatton, and disabled it from ever attempting to contend against the paramount and legitimate influence of Lord Drelincourt. The result of all this, was the return, without a contest, of the Honourable Geoffry Lovel Delamere as the representative of the borough of Yatton in the new Parliament; an event, which he penned his first frank in communicating to a certain young lady then in London. Nothing, doubtless, could be more delightful for Mr. Delamere; but in what a direful predicament did the loss of his seat place the late member, Mr. Titmouse? Just consider for a moment. Mr. Flummery's promise to him of a "place" had vanished, of course, into thin air—having answered its purpose of securing Mr. Titmouse's vote up to the very moment of the dissolution; an event which Mr. Flummery feared would tend to deprive himself of the honour of serving his country in any official capacity for some twenty years to come—if he should so long live, and the country so long survive his exclusion from office. Foiled thus miserably in this quarter, Mr. Titmouse applied himself with redoubled energy to render available his other resources, and made repeated and most impassioned applications to Mr. O'Gibbit—who never took, however, the slightest notice of any of them: considering very justly that Mr. Titmouse was no more entitled to receive back, than he had originally been to lend, the £500 in question. As for Mr. O'Doodle and Mr. M'Squash—they, like himself, were thrown out of parliament; and no one upon earth seemed able to tell whither they had gone, or what had become of them, though there were a good many people who made it their business to inquire into the matter very anxiously. That quarter, therefore, seemed at present quite hopeless. Then there was the Honourable Empty Belly, who owed him a hundred pounds;—but he, the moment that he lost his election, caused it to be given out to any one interested in his welfare—and there suddenly appeared to be a great many such—that he was gone on a scientific expedition to the South Pole, from which he trusted, though he was not very sanguine, that he should one day come back. All these things drove Mr. Titmouse very nearly beside himself—and certainly his position was a little precarious. When parliament was dissolved he had in his pocket a couple of sovereigns, the residue of a five-pound note, out of which, mirabile dictu, he had actually succeeded in teasing Mr. Flummery on the evening of the last division; and these two sovereigns, and a shirt or two, and the articles actually on his person, and a copy of Boxiana, were all his assets to meet liabilities of about a hundred thousand pounds; and the panoply of parliamentary "privilege" was dropping off, as it were, daily. In a very few days' time, in fact, he would be at the mercy of a terrific host of creditors, who were waiting to spring upon him like so many famished wolves. Every one of them had given in his action up to judgment for both debt and costs—and had his Ca. Ca. and Fi. Fa. ready for use at an instant's notice. There were three of his creditors—the three Jews, Israel Fang, Mordecai Gripe, and Mephibosheth Mahar Shalal-hash-baz—who had entered into a solemn vow with one another that they would never lose sight of Titmouse for one moment, by day or by night, whatever pains or expense it might cost them—until, the period of privilege having expired, they should be at liberty to plunge their talons into the carcass of their little debtor. There were, in fact, at least a hundred of his creditors ready to pounce upon him the instant that he should make the slightest attempt to quit the country. His lodgings consisted, at this time, of a miserable little room in a garret at the back of a small house in Westminster, not far from the Houses of Parliament, and of the two, inferior to the room in Closet Court, Oxford Street, in which he was first presented to the reader. Here he would often lie in bed half the day, drinking weak—because he could not afford strong—brandy and water, and endeavouring to consider "what the devil" he had done with the immense sums of money which he had had at his disposal—how he would act if by some lucky chance he should again become wealthy—and, in short, "what the plague" was now to become of him. What was he to do? Whither should he go?—To sea?—Then it must be as a common sailor—if any one would now take him! Or suppose he were to enlist? Glorious war, and all that; but both these schemes presupposed his being able to escape from his creditors, whom he had a vehement suspicion were on the look-out for him in all directions. Every review that he thus took of his hopeless position and prospects, ended in a fiendish degree of abhorrence of his parents, whose fault alone it was that he was thus turned out of a splendid estate of ten thousand a year, and made worse than a beggar of. He would sometimes spring out of bed, convulsively clutching his hands together, and wishing himself beside their grave, to tear them out of it. He thought of Mr. Quirk, Mr. Snap, Mr. Tagrag, with fury; but whenever he thought of Mr. Gammon, he shuddered all over, as if in the presence of a baleful spectre. For all this, he preserved the same impudent strut and swagger in the street which had ever distinguished him. Every day of his life he walked towards the scenes of his recent splendour, which seemed to attract him irresistibly. He would pass the late Earl of Dreddlington's house in Grosvenor Square, gazing at it, and at the hatchment suspended in front of it. Then he would wander on to Park Lane, and gaze with unutterable feelings—poor little wretch!—at the house which once had been his and Lady Cecilia's, but was then occupied by a nobleman, whose tasteful equipage and servants were often standing at and before the door. He would, on some of those occasions, feel as though he should like to drop down dead, and be out of all his misery. If ever he met and nodded, or spoke to those with whom he had till recently been on the most familiar terms, he was encountered by a steady stare, and sometimes a smile, that withered his very heart within him, and made the three last years of his life appear to have been but a dream. The little dinner that he ate—for he had almost entirely lost his appetite through long addiction to drinking—was at a small tavern, at only a few doors' distance from his lodgings, and where he generally spent his evenings, for want of any other place to go to; and he formed at length a sort of intimacy with a good-natured and very respectable gentleman, who came nearly as often thither as Tit-mouse himself, and would sit conversing with him very pleasantly over his cigar and a glass of spirits and water. The oftener Titmouse saw him, the more he liked him; and at length, taking him entirely into his confidence, unbosomed himself concerning his unhappy present circumstances, and still more unhappy prospects. This man was a brother of Mahar-Shalal-hash-baz the Jew, and a sheriff's officer, keeping watch upon his movements, night and day, alternately with another who did not attract Titmouse's notice. After having canvassed several modes of disposing of himself, none of which were satisfactory to either Titmouse or his friend, he hinted that he was aware that there were lots of the enemy on the look-out for him, and who would be glad to get at him; but he knew, he said, that he was as safe as in a castle for some time yet to come; and he also mentioned a scheme which had occurred to him—but this was all in the strictest confidence—viz. to write to Lord Drelincourt, (who was, after all his relation of some sort or other, and ought to be devilish glad to get into all his, Titmouse's, property so easily,) and ask him for some situation under government, either in France, India, or America, and give him a trifle to set him up at starting, and help him to "nick the bums!" His friend listened attentively, and then protested that he thought it an excellent idea, and Mr. Titmouse had better write the letter and take it at once. Upon this Titmouse sent for pen, ink, and paper; and while his friend leaned back calmly smoking his cigar, and sipping his gin and water, poor Titmouse wrote the following letter to Lord Drelincourt, which is the last letter of his in my possession:—

"To the Right Hon. Lord Drelincourt, My Lud—

TITTLEBAT TITMOUSE.

P. S. I Leave This with my Own Hand That you May be Sure and get it. Remember me to Miss A. and Lady D."

Mr. Titmouse contented himself with telling his new friend merely the substance of the above epistle, and, having sealed it up, he asked his friend if he were disposed for a walk to the West End; and on being answered in the affirmative, they both set off for Lord Drelincourt's house in Dover Street. When they had reached it, his friend stepped to a little distance; while Titmouse, endeavouring to assume a confident air, hemmed, twitched up his shirt collars, and knocked and rung with all the boldness of a gentleman coming to dinner. Open flew the door in a moment; and—

"My Lord Drelincourt's—isn't it?" enquired Titmouse, holding his letter in his hand, and tapping his ebony cane pretty loudly against his legs.

"Of course it is! What d'ye want, quoth the porter sternly, enraged at being disturbed at such an hour by such a puppy of a fellow as then stood before him—for the bloom was off the finery of Titmouse; and who that knew the world would call at seven o'clock with a letter? Titmouse would have answered the fellow pretty sharply, but was afraid of endangering the success of his application: so, with considerable calmness, he replied,—

"Oh—it is? Then have the goodness to deliver this into his lordship's own hand—it's of great importance."

"Very well," said the porter stiffly, not dreaming who the speaker was whom he was addressing, and the next instant shut the door in his face.

"Dem impudent blackguard!" said he, as he rejoined his friend—his heart almost bursting with mortification and fury; "I've a great mind to call to-morrow, 'pon my soul—and get him discharged!"

He had dated his letter from his lodgings, where, about ten o'clock on the ensuing morning, a gentleman—in fact, Lord Drelincourt's man of business—called, and asking to see Mr. Titmouse, gave into his hands a letter, of which the following is a copy:—

"Dover Street, Wednesday Morning.

"Lord Drelincourt begs, in answer to Mr. Titmouse's letter, to request his acceptance of the enclosed Bank of England Note for Ten Pounds.

Lord D. will feel obliged if Mr. Titmouse will furnish him with an address to which any further communications on the part of Lord D. may be addressed."

On repairing to the adjoining tavern, soon after receiving the above most welcome note, Mr. Titmouse fortunately (!) fell in with his friend, and, with somewhat of an air of easy triumph, showed him Lord Drelincourt's note, and its enclosure.—Some time afterwards, having smoked each a couple of cigars and drunk a couple of tumblers of brandy and water, Mr. Titmouse's friend got very confidential; and in a low whisper said that he had been thinking over Mr. Titmouse's case ever since they were talking together the night before; and for five pounds would put him in the way of escaping all danger immediately, provided no questions were asked by Mr. Titmouse; for he, the speaker, was running a great risk in what he was doing. Titmouse placed his hand over his heart, exclaiming, "Honour—honour!" and having called for change from the landlord, gave a five-pound note into the hand of his companion, who thereupon, in a mysterious under tone, told him that by ten o'clock the next morning he would have a hackney coach at the door of his lodgings, and would at once convey him safely to a vessel then in the river, and bound for the south of France; where Mr. Titmouse might remain till he had in some measure settled his affairs with his creditors. Sure enough, at the appointed time, the coach drew up at the door of the house where Titmouse lodged; and within a few moments' time he came down stairs with a small portmanteau, and entered the coach, where sat his friend, evidently not wishing to be recognised or seen by any body passing. They talked together earnestly and eagerly as they journeyed eastward; and just as they arrived opposite a huge, dismal-looking building, with a large door, and immensely high walls, the coach stopped. Three or four persons were standing, as if they had been in expectation of the arrival of the coach; and, requesting Mr. Titmouse to alight for a moment, his friend opened the coach door from within, and let down the steps. The moment that poor Titmouse had got out, he was instantly surrounded, and seized by the collar by those who were standing by; his "friend" had disappeared, and, almost petrified with amazement and fright, and taken quite off his guard by the suddenness of the movement, he was hurried through the doorway of the King's Bench Prison, the three Jews following close at his heels, and conducted into a very gloomy room. There he seemed first to awake to the horrors of his situation, and went into a paroxysm of despair and fury. He sprang madly towards the door, and on being repulsed by those standing beside him, stamped violently about the room, shouting, "Murder, murder! thieves!" Then he pulled his hair, shook his head with frantic vehemence, and presently sank into a seat, from which, after a few moments, he sprang wildly, and broke his cane into a number of pieces, scattering them about the room like a madman. Then he cried passionately; more, in fact, like a frantic school-girl than a man; and struck his head violently with his fists. All this while the three Jews were looking on with a grin of devilish gratification at the little wretch's agony. His frenzy lasted so long that he was removed to a strong room, and threatened with being put into a strait-waistcoat if he continued to conduct himself so outrageously. The fact of his being thus safely housed, soon became known, and within a day or two's time, the miserable little fellow was completely overwhelmed by his creditors; who, absurd and unavailing as were their proceedings, came rushing down upon him, one after another, with as breathless an impetuosity as if they thought he had been a mass of solid gold, which was to become the spoil of him that could first seize it. The next day his fate was announced to the world by paragraphs in all the morning newspapers, which informed their readers that "yesterday Mr. Titmouse, late M. P. for Yatton, was secured by a skilful stratagem, just as he was on the point of quitting this country for America, and lodged in the King's Bench Prison, at the suit of three creditors, to the extent of upwards of sixty thousand pounds. It is understood that his debts considerably exceed the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds." As soon as he had become calm enough to do so—viz. three or four days after his incarceration—he wrote a long, dismal epistle to Lord Drelincourt, and also one to Miss Aubrey, passionately reminding them both that he was, after all, of the same blood with themselves, only luck had gone for them, and against him, and therefore he hoped they would "remember him, and do something to get him out of his trouble." He seemed to cling to them as though he had a claim upon them—instead of being himself Lord Drelincourt's debtor to the amount of, at least, twenty thousand pounds, had his lordship, instead of inclining a compassionate ear to his entreaties, chosen to fling his heavy claim into the scale against him. This, however, was a view of the case which never occurred to poor Titmouse. Partly of their own accord, and partly at Miss Aubrey's earnest entreaty, Lord Drelincourt and Mr. Delamere went to the King's Bench prison, and had a long interview with him—his lordship being specially anxious to ascertain, if possible, whether Titmouse had been originally privy to the monstrous fraud, by means of which he had succeeded in possessing himself of Yatton, at so fearful a cost of suffering to those whom he had deprived of it. While he was chattering away, more after the fashion of a newly caged ape than a MAN, with eager and impassioned tone and gesticulation—with a profuse usage of his favourite phraseology—"'Pon my soul!" "'Pon my life!" "By Jove!" and of several shocking oaths, for which he was repeatedly and sternly rebuked by Lord Drelincourt, with what profound and melancholy interest did the latter regard the strange being before him, and think of the innumerable extraordinary things which he had heard concerning him! Here was the widowed husband of the Lady Cecilia, and son-in-law of the Earl of Dreddlington—that broken pillar of pride!—broken, alas! in the very moment of his imaginary magnificence!—Here was the late member of parliament for the borough of Yatton, whose constituency had deliberately declared him possessed of their complete confidence!—on whose individual vote in parliament had several times depended the existence of the king's ministry, and the passing of measures of the greatest possible magnitude! This was he whom all society—even the most brilliant—had courted as a great lion! This was the some time owner of Yatton! who had aspired to the hand of Miss Aubrey! who had for two years revelled in every conceivable species of luxury, splendour, and profligacy! Here was the individual at whose instance—at whose nod—Lord Drelincourt had been deprived of his liberty, ruthlessly torn from the bleeding bosom of his family, and for many weary months subjected to the most harassing and heart-breaking privations and distresses! On quitting him Lord Drelincourt put into his hand a ten-pound note, with which Titmouse seemed—though he dared not say so—not a little disappointed. His lordship and Mr. Delamere were inclined, upon the whole, to believe that Titmouse had not been aware of his illegitimacy till the issue of the ecclesiastical proceedings was known; but from many remarks he let fall, they were satisfied that Mr. Gammon must have been aware of the fact from a very early period—for Titmouse spoke freely of the constant mysterious threats he was in the habit of receiving from Mr. Gammon. Lord Drelincourt had promised Titmouse to consider in what way he could serve him; and during the course of the day instructed Mr. Runnington to put the case into the hands of some attorney of the Insolvent Debtors' Court, with a view of endeavouring to obtain for the unfortunate little wretch the "benefit of the Act." As soon as the course of practice would admit of it, Mr. Titmouse was brought up in the ordinary way before the court, which was quite crowded by persons either interested as creditors, or curious to see so celebrated a person as Tittlebat Titmouse. The court was astounded at the sight of the number and magnitude of his liabilities—a hundred thousand pounds at least!—against which he had nothing to set except the following items:—

|---|---|---|
| "Cash lent | Swindle O'Gibbet, Esq. M. P. | £500 |
| Do. | Phelim O'Doodle, | 200 |
| Do. | Micah M'Squash, | 100 |
| Do. | Hon. Empty Belly, | 100" |

—together with some other similar but lesser sums; but for none of them could he produce any vouchers, except for the sum lent to the Hon. Empty Belly, who had been ass enough to give him his I O U. Poor Titmouse's discharge was most vehemently opposed on the part of his creditors—particularly the three Jews—whose frantic and indecorous conduct in open court occasioned the chief commissioner to order them to be twice removed. They would have had Titmouse remanded to the day of his death! After several adjourned and lengthened hearings, the court pronounced him not to be entitled to his discharge till he should have remained in prison for the space of eighteen calendar months; on hearing which he burst into a fit of loud and bitter weeping, and was removed from court, wringing his hands and shaking his head in perfect despair. As soon as this result had been communicated to Lord Drelincourt, (who had taken special care that his name should not be among those of Mr. Titmouse's creditors,) he came to the humane determination of allowing him a hundred and fifty pounds a year for his life, payable weekly, to commence from the date of his being remanded to prison. For the first month or so he spent all his weekly allowance in brandy and water and cigars, within three days after receiving it. Then he took to gambling with his fellow prisoners; but, all of a sudden, he turned over quite a new leaf. The fact was, that he had become intimate with an unfortunate literary hack, who used to procure small sums by writing articles for newspapers and magazines; and at his suggestion, Titmouse fell to work upon several quires of foolscap: the following being the title given to his projected work by his new friend:—

"Ups and Downs:
Being
Memoirs of My Life,
by Tittlebat Titmouse, Esq.
Late M. P. for Yatton."

He got so far on with his task as to fill three quires of paper; and it is a fact, that a fashionable publisher got scent of the undertaking, came to the prison, and offered him five hundred pounds for his manuscript, provided he would only undertake that it should fill three volumes. This greatly stimulated Titmouse; but unfortunately he fell ill before he had completed the first volume, and never, during the remainder of his confinement, recovered himself sufficiently to proceed further with his labours. I once had an opportunity of glancing over what he had written, which was really very curious. I do not know what has since become of the manuscript. During the last month of his imprisonment he became intimate with a villanous young Jew attorney, who, under the pretence of commencing proceedings in the House of Lords (!) for the recovery of the Yatton property once more from Lord Drelincourt, contrived to get into his own pockets more than one-half of the weekly sum allowed by that nobleman to his grateful pensioner! On the very day of his discharge, Titmouse went off straight to the lodgings of Mr. Swindle O'Gibbet to demand payment of the five hundred pounds due to him from that gentleman, to whom he became a source of inconceivable vexation and torment. Following him about with a sort of insane and miserable pertinacity, he lay in wait for him at his lodgings—at the door of the House of Commons; dogged him from the one point to the other; assailed him with passionate entreaties and reproaches in the open street; went to the public meetings over which Mr. O'Gibbet presided, or where he spoke, (always on behalf of the liberty of the subject,) and would call out—"Pay me my five hundred pounds! I want my money! Where's my five hundred pounds?" on which Mr. O'Gibbet would point to him, call him an impostor! a liar! that he was only hired by the enemies of the people to come and disturb their proceedings: on which Titmouse was always shuffled about—his hat knocked over his eyes—and he was finally kicked out, and once or twice pushed down from the top to the bottom of the stairs. The last time that this happened, poor Titmouse's head struck with dreadful force against the bannisters; and he lay for some time stunned and bleeding. On being carried to a doctor's shop, he was shortly afterwards seized with a fit of epilepsy. This seemed to have given the finishing stroke to his shattered intellects; for he sank soon afterwards into a state of idiocy. Through the kindness and at the expense of Lord Drelincourt, he was admitted an inmate of a private lunatic asylum, in the Curtain Road, near Hoxton, where he still continues. He is very harmless; and after dressing himself in the morning with extraordinary pains, he generally sits down with a glass of strong toast and water, and a coloured straw, which he imagines to be brandy and water, and a cigar. He complained, at first, that the brandy and water was very weak; but he is now reconciled to it, and sips his two tumblers daily with an air of tranquil enjoyment. When I last saw him he was thus occupied; and he struck me as looking in better health than I had ever known him to enjoy before.

I should have been very glad, if, consistently with my duty as an impartial historian, I could have concealed some discreditable features—discreditable, at least, in my opinion—in the conduct of Mr. Tag-rag, subsequently to his unfortunate bankruptcy. I shall not, however, dwell upon them at greater length than is necessary. His creditors were so much dissatisfied with his conduct, that not one of them could be prevailed upon to sign his certificate, by which means he was prevented from re-establishing himself in business, even had he been able to find the means of so doing; since, in the eye of our law, any business carried on by an uncertificated bankrupt, is carried on by him only as a trustee for his creditors. His temper getting more and more soured he became at length quite intolerable to his wife, whom he had married (only for her fortune (£800, and the goodwill of her late husband's business, as a retail draper and hosier, in Little Turn-stile, Holborn.) When he found that Mrs. Tag-rag would not forsake her unhappy daughter, he snapped his fingers at her, and, I regret to say, told her that she and her daughter, and her respectable husband, might all go to the devil together—he must shift for himself; and, in fact, he took himself off. Mr. Dismal Horror found that he had made a sad business of it, in marrying Miss Tag-rag, who brought him two children in the first nineteen months, and seemed likely to go on at that rate for a long time to come, which made Mr. Horror think very seriously of following the example of his excellent father-in-law—viz. deserting his wife.—They had contrived to scrape together a bit of a day-school for young children, in Goswell Street; but which was inadequate to the support of themselves, and also of Mrs. Tag-rag senior, who had failed in obtaining the situation of pew-opener to a neighbouring dissenting chapel. The scheme he had conceived, he soon afterwards carried into effect; for, whereas he went out one day saying he should return in an hour's time, he nevertheless did not return at all. Burning with zeal to display his pulpit talents, he took to street-preaching, and at length succeeded in getting around him a crowd of hearers, many of them most serious and attentive pickpockets, with dexterous fingers and devout faces, wherever he held forth, which was principally in the neighbourhood of the Tower and Smithfield—till he was driven away by the police, who never interfered with his little farce till he sent his hat round, when they would rush in, disperse the crowd, and take him into custody to the police-office, where, in spite of his eloquent defences, he several times got sentenced to three months' imprisonment, as an incorrigible disturber of the peace, and in league with the questionable characters, who—the police declared—were invariably members of every congregation he addressed. One occasion of his being taken into custody was rather a singular one:—Mr. Tag-rag happened to be passing while he was holding forth, and, unable to control his fury, made his way immediately in front of the impassioned preacher; and, sticking his fists in his side a-kimbo, exclaimed, "Aren't you a nice young man now?" which quite disconcerted his son-in-law, who threw his hymn-book into his father-in-law's face, which bred such a disturbance that the police rushed in, and took them both off in custody to the police-office, where such a scene ensued as beggars all description. What has since become of Mr. Horror, I do not know; but the next thing I heard of Mr. Tag-rag was his entering into the employ of no other a person than Mr. Huckaback, who had been for some little time settled in a little shop in the neighbourhood of Leicester Square. Having, however, inadvertently shown in to Mr. Huckaback one of the creditors to whom he had given special orders to deny himself, that gentleman instantly turned him out of the shop, in a fury, without character or wages; which latter, however, Tag-rag soon compelled him, by the process of the Court of Requests, to pay him, being one week's entire salary. In passing one day a mock auction, on the left-hand side of the Poultry, I could not help pausing to admire the cool effrontery with which the Jew in the box was putting up articles for sale to four patient puffers—his entire audience—and who bid against one another in a very business-like way for every thing that was proposed for their consideration. What was my astonishment and concern, when one of the puffers, who stood with his back towards me, happened to look round for a moment, to discover in him my friend Mr. Tag-rag!! His hat was nicely brushed, but all the "nap" was off; his coat was clean, threadbare, and evidently had been made for some other person; under his arm was an old cotton umbrella; and in his hands, which were clasped behind him, were a pair of antiquated black gloves, doubled up, only for show, evidently not for use.—Notwithstanding, however, he had sunk thus low, there happened to him, some time afterwards, one or two surprising strokes of good fortune. First of all, he contrived to get a sum of three hundred pounds from one of his former debtors, who imagined that Tag-rag was authorized by his assignees to receive it. Nothing, however, of the kind; and Mr. Tag-rag quietly opened a small shop in the neighbourhood of St. George's in the East, and began to scrape together a tolerable business. Reading one day a flourishing speech in parliament, which had been delivered by a distinguished dissenter, on the atrocious enormity of calling upon Dissenters to pay Church-rates,—it occurred to Mr. Tag-rag as likely to turn out a good speculation, and greatly increase his business, if he were to become a martyr for conscience' sake; and after turning the thing about a good deal in his mind, he determined on refusing to pay the sum of eightpencehalfpenny, due in respect of a rate recently made for the repair of the church steeple, which was very nearly falling down. In a very civil and unctuous manner, he announced to the collector his determination to refuse the payment on strictly conscientious grounds. The collector expostulated—but in vain. Then came the churchwardens—Tag-rag was inflexible. The thing began to get wind, and the Rector of the parish, an amiable and learned man, came to try his power of persuasion—but in vain; 'twas impossible to divert Mr. Tag-rag's eye from the glorious crown of martyrdom he had resolved upon earning. Then he called on the minister of the congregation where he "worshipped," and, with tears and agitation, unbosomed himself upon the subject, and besought his counsel. The minister got excited; so did his leading people. A meeting was called at his chapel, the result of which was, a declaration that Mr. Tag-rag's conduct was most praiseworthy and noble, and he deserved to be supported. Several leading members of the congregation, who had never dealt with him before, suddenly became customers of his. The upshot of the matter was, that after a prodigious stir, Mr. Tag-rag became a victim in right earnest; and was taken into custody by virtue of a writ De Contumace Capiendo, amidst the indignant sympathy and admiration of all those who shared his opinion. In a twinkling he shot up, as it were into the air like a rocket, and became popular, beyond his most sanguine expectations. The name of the first Church-rate martyr went the round of every paper in the United Kingdom; and at length a lithographed likeness of him came out, with his precious autograph appended, so—

"THOMAS TAG-RAG, CHURCH-RATE MARTYR."

Subscriptions were entered into on his behalf; and as they were paid into his hands from time to time, he kept quietly increasing his purchases of linen drapery and enlarging his business, in a most decisive and satisfactory manner. Nothing could exceed the accounts brought into him of the extent to which his custom was increasing; for in each window of his shop hung a copy of his portrait, attracting the eye of every passenger. But he was not the only person who rejoiced in this state of things; there being others who had a deep stake in his success, and whom he had not at first adverted to, viz. HIS ASSIGNEES—to whom belonged, in point of law, the rattling business he was carrying on, and who were watching his movements with lively interest. He was suddenly struck dumb with dismay and astonishment when he heard of this unexpected issue of the affair; and began to fear that he had missed his providential way. His assignees, however, seemed to think that they had got into theirs—and enlarged the premises, and greatly increased the stock, profiting by the continually augmenting popularity of Tag-rag. From the moment of his making this dismal discovery, his ardour in the Great Cause wonderfully declined; and he would have jumped at any decent excuse for getting out of the thing altogether. And indeed, when he came to think of it—where was the difficulty! He had fought a good fight—he had maintained a great principle—he had borne the heat and burden of the day. But while the martyr was thus musing within himself, powerful forces were coming into the field to his succour—viz. the Society for the Promotion of Civil and Religious Discord; who having caused all the proceedings against Tag-rag to be laid before an ambitious little Radical barrister, he discovered a fatal flaw in them—viz. that in the Significavit, the word "Bishop" was spelled "Bisop," (i. e. without the "h.") The point was argued with prodigious pertinacity, and incredible ingenuity, by four counsel on each side; but after great deliberation, the objection, "being in favour of liberty," was held to prevail; all the proceedings were quashed; and Mr. Tag-rag consequently declared entitled to his discharge. On this he was invited to a grand tea-party by the leading friends of the voluntary principle, given in Hackney Fields; where amidst a concourse of at least a hundred and fifty souls, (including women and children,) Tag-rag avowed himself ready to go again to the stake, "if Providence should require it." That seemed not, however, likely to be the case; for the church-wardens, having already had to pay some £730 odd in the shape of costs, resolved never to meddle with him any more. He succeeded in prevailing on his assignees to take him into the shop, in order to carry on the business upon their account, and as their servant—for which they allowed him two pounds a week. Out of this, however, he was soon after compelled by the parish authorities to allow twelve shillings a week to Mrs. Tagrag; and on making her the first payment he spit in the poor woman's face. Dr. Johnson used to say that patriotism was the last refuge of a scoundrel. Now-a-days, however, it is Church-rate Martyrdom; and Tag-rag has had many imitators.

I must not, however, conclude this part of my long history, without adverting to what befell the surviving partners of Mr. Gammon; namely, Messrs. Quirk and Snap. The former had horrible misgivings as to the true cause of Mr. Gammon's death—having a strange inward persuasion that he had destroyed himself. When he heard, very suddenly, from the laundress of Mr. Gammon's death, he was seized with a fit of trembling that lasted for several days. He dared not attend the funeral—or go to Mr. Gammon's chambers while his corpse lay there. Mr. Snap, however, had younger and firmer nerves; and resolved to gratify his natural and very delicate curiosity, by seeing how Mr. Gammon looked in his coffin. The day after the coroner's inquest had been held, therefore, he went to the chambers for that purpose, and was shown by the sobbing laundress into the silent and gloomy bed-room where Mr. Gammon lay awaiting burial. The coffin lay on tressels near the window, which of course was darkened; and Mr. Snap, having taken off his hat, removed the coffin-lid and the face-cloth, and there was the cold stern countenance of Mr. Gammon before him. In spite of himself, Mr. Snap trembled as he looked, and for a moment doubted whether, in gazing at the yellow effigy of him that was, he was really looking at the late Mr. Gammon; so fixed, so rigid were the features, so contracted of their proportions, and disfigured by the close-fitting frilled cap. What determination was yet visible in the compressed lips! The once keen and flashing eyes of Mr. Gammon were now hid for ever beneath the heavy and clammy eyelids; and the ample brow was no longer furrowed by the workings of the active and powerful spirit which had "jumped the world to come!" Mr. Snap gazed for several minutes in silence, and his heart beat a little quicker than usual.

"Oh, sir!" sobbed the laundress at length, as she too advanced to look again at the countenance of her deceased master, and from which she seldom took her eyes long together when alone—"he was the kindest and best of men! He was indeed!" Mr. Snap said nothing, but presently took hold of the cold, thin, stiff fingers of Mr. Gammon's right hand, squeezed them gently, and replaced the hand in its former position.

"I hope he's happy, dear soul!" cried the laundress, gazing at him through her tears.

"Yes, of course he is—no doubt," replied Mr. Snap, in a much weaker tone of voice than he had spoken in before, and slowly returned to the sitting-room, whether the laundress followed him as soon as she had replaced the face-cloth and coffin-lid.

"Got a drop of brandy in the room, Mrs. Brown?" he enquired, and passed his hand across his face, which had grown very pale.

She gave him what he asked for; he drank it, and sighed.

"Devilish ugly look that cap gives him—eh, Mrs. Brown? Hardly knew him."

"Ay, poor soul; but it don't much signify how the face looks if the heart's all right. He was always so kind to me; I shall never get another master like him!"

"Died very suddenly, Mrs. Brown, didn't he?"

"Ay, it was, sir! His troubles broke his heart!"

"He'd quite enough of them to do so!" replied Snap, significantly, and took his departure. He was one of the few who attended the funeral, and the day on which it took place was the gloomiest he had ever known.

Mr. Gammon being gone, old Mr. Quirk seemed to have quite lost the use of his head, and could attend to nothing. As for "the matters in the affidavits," which he had been ordered by the Court of King's Bench to answer, it was impossible to do so except by acknowledging the facts they stated to be true; and he was, in the ensuing term, struck off the roll of attorneys, and ceased to be any longer a "gentleman, one of the attorneys of our lord the king, before the king himself." In short, he was completely broken up. He was quickly compelled to part with Alibi House—in fact, with all his property; and very nearly escaped being thrown into a prison, there to end his days. During the last week of his stay at Alibi House, while all his effects were being sold, he was observed to sit down for hours together before a certain picture covered with black crape; and once or twice he lifted up the crape, and gazed with a horrid look at the object before him, as if he was meditating something very mysterious and dismal. Nothing, however, happened. If he had ever wished to hang himself, he never could succeed in screwing his courage up to the sticking-place. He prevailed on a friend to buy in for him that particular picture; and it was almost the only article that he took with him to the small lodgings to which he removed with his daughter, on the sale of Alibi House. As for poor Miss Quirk, I pity her from my very soul; for, though rather a weak girl, she was perfectly good-natured; and the reader will probably join in my indignation against Mr. Toady Hug, when he hears that that gentleman, on seeing the unfortunate turn which affairs took with Miss Quirk, owing to no fault of hers, at the very moment when he ought to have clung closest to the poor girl, deserted her, after having been engaged to be married to her for upwards of two years. It was, however, the business of the firm of Quirk, Gammon and Snap, that he had desired to marry; and finding that it no longer existed, he considered himself justified in rescinding the contract, on the ground of a failure of consideration. Snap, hearing of this, instantly tendered his own "heart" in lieu of that of Mr. Hug—and was accepted. He kept this very still, however, till the fate of the action for a breach of promise of marriage, which he persuaded Miss Quirk to allow him to bring in her name against Mr. Hug, should have been decided—as it soon was; for I should have mentioned that no attempt had been made by any one to strike him off the rolls. Snap retained a Mr. Heartbreak, a most eloquent counsel in such cases: and as Mr. Toady Hug defended himself in what he imagined to be a very splendid speech, the jury immediately found a verdict against him of five hundred pounds—a little fortune for Miss Quirk, if Hug could have paid it. But the fact was, that he could not; and after a long negotiation between Snap and him, it was settled that there should be a sort of secret partnership between them; and that Hug should work out the damages, by doing Mr. Snap's business for a quarter only of the proper fees—the full fee, however, for appearance's sake among his brethren, was to be marked in his brief. Shortly after this Snap got married, and took a little house in Saffron-hill, only two doors from the old office; and, as he had already cultivated the acquaintance of the leading thieves, he soon got into a very respectable line of business. A year afterwards, Mrs. Snap made him the happy father of a quaint-looking little child; which, being a boy, his father, out of reverence for his deceased friend and partner, Mr. Gammon, caused to be christened by the name of "Oily Snap." Old Mr. Quirk lingered on for about a couple of years longer, most inconveniently to Snap, when he died of a broken heart; and as Snap assisted in depositing the revered remains of his father-in-law in St. Andrew's churchyard, he could not help thinking within himself what a horrid bore it would be were the old gentleman to get up again, and come back and establish himself for another couple of years in their little back parlour!

Let us now turn to characters worthier of our notice, of our sympathy, and our congratulation.

Two or three days after the assembling of the new parliament, Lord Drelincourt was introduced by two of his brother barons, (one of whom was Lord de la Zouch,) with the usual formalities, into the House of Lords. As he stood at the table while being sworn in, tranquil and dignified, there was such an expression of noble simplicity and goodness in his features—which had not even then entirely lost the traces of the anxiety and suffering through which he had passed during the last three years—as touched me to the very soul, and I fervently wished him health and long life to enjoy his new honours. He looked quite commanding in his ample ermine and scarlet robes; and having taken the pen which was tendered him, and inscribed on the roll the name "DRELINCOURT"—that of very nearly the most ancient barony in England)—and formally taken his seat on the barons' bench, and received the congratulations of his brother peers who came crowding around him—he stepped up to the woolsack, and grasped with silent energy the hand of the new Lord Chancellor, Lord Wolstenhome, who, dignified and commanding in his appearance and bearing, and familiar with his position as if he had occupied it for more years than he had days, welcomed the newly-introduced peer with infinite warmth and cordiality. This was the Attorney-General of a few short months before, and he to whose masterly ability and unwavering friendship Lord Drelincourt was indebted for the position which he then occupied. They sat talking together for some time; and the Chancellor happening to mention the ludicrous and yet intolerable pressure to which he was subject for every thing he had to give away—particularly in the livings which fell to his disposal—he instanced a small one in Devonshire, of five hundred a year, of which he had had notice only two hours before coming to the House, since which time he had had a dozen applications for it from peers present. "Now as a small memento of to-day, Drelincourt," said he, with a smile, "can you give me the name of any man that in your judgment wants, and would suit, such a living?"

"Oh, my dear Lord Chancellor!" replied Lord Drelincourt, with eager delight, "I know a man—a very able, exemplary, starving friend of mine—Mr. Neville, the Rev. Ralph Neville."

"'Tis his!" replied the Chancellor; "give me his name and address—he shall have it offered him this very evening!"

Lord Drelincourt, overjoyed, wrote down Mr. Neville's name and address, and gave it to the Chancellor; and having reminded him that their dinner hour was seven precisely that day, (the Chancellor had been for some days engaged to dinner with him,) Lord Drelincourt somewhat hastily quitted the house, resolved to be himself the first bearer to poor Mr. Neville of the delightful intelligence of his promotion. His carriage, with Lady Drelincourt and Miss Aubrey in it, had been standing for some time near the House, awaiting his return, in order to drive once or twice round the Park before dinner; but you may guess the kind of transport with which they heard him give directions for their being driven to St. George's in the East, and the object of his errand.

When Lord Drelincourt's equipage—simple and elegant, and with the coronet painted on the panels so small as not to challenge the observation of every passenger—drew up opposite the humble lodgings of Mr. Neville, he and his little sick wife were sitting at tea, for which purpose he had a few minutes before propped her up upon the sofa, on which she was obliged to recline during the greater part of each day. Prettily flustered were both of them on seeing the carriage roll up, the steps let down, and hearing Lord Drelincourt, followed quickly by Lady Drelincourt and Miss Aubrey, (it was the first time that they had seen the former two, except as Mr. and Mrs. Aubrey,) knock at the door. Oh, how sweet was the office of communicating such intelligence as that which they brought to Mr. and Mrs. Neville! He, on hearing it, turned immediately, and as it were instinctively, to his pale suffering wife, with full eye and quivering lip—and she returned the look he gave her. Well he knew that the true source of her frail health was their privation and miserably straitened circumstances, and that the intelligence which they had just received, would as it were pour into the broken heart the oil of gladness and of health. There was not the slightest change in the deportment of his distinguished visiters: but his own was, in spite of all that he could do to the contrary, consciously subdued, and a little embarrassed. What thankfulness was in his heart! How was the great, barren, frowning world around him, turned into a smiling paradise! No longer would they be unable to supply their few and modest wants! No longer deny themselves the innocent enjoyments of life, and cheerful intercourse with society! Soon would they be in the independent exercise of the delightful duties of the pastoral office! And what a thoughtfulness of their humble interests had been evinced by Lord Drelincourt in the first moments of his own excitement and triumphs! To all parties, that was, indeed, an occasion of the outgoing of hearts towards each other; and Lord and Lady Drelincourt, before leaving, had insisted on seeing Mr. and Mrs. Neville at dinner in Dover Street, before they left town, as they expected would shortly be the case.

As I have already intimated, Lord Drelincourt had that evening a select dinner party; and there was a little incident connected with it, which will also, I think, serve to set forth the considerate good nature of Lord Drelincourt. His guests consisted of the Lord Chancellor and Lady Wolstenholme, Lord and Lady de la Zouch, Mr. Delamere, three or four other friends, and Mr. Runnington, and a Mr. Staveley, a former fellow pupil of his, and whom he had left still studying closely in the chambers of Mr. Mansfield. Lord Drelincourt had always entertained a very friendly feeling towards Mr. Staveley, who was a man of very strong understanding, great industry, sound principle, and perfect frankness and simplicity of character.

Mr. Aubrey had from the first observed the depression of spirits to which his companion was subject, and which, in the course of their subsequent unreserved communications with each other, he had discovered to be occasioned by the sad precariousness of his pecuniary circumstances, and the absence of all prospect or apparent chance of professional connexion. It seemed that the relative by whose liberality he had been enabled to enter himself a student at Lincoln's Inn, and become a pupil of Mr. Mansfield's, had died suddenly, leaving his nephew almost totally destitute. Was it not likely that he was just such a person as could excite the yearning sympathies of his now ennobled companion? Indeed it was so; and the reason of Lord Drelincourt's asking him to dinner on the present occasion was, to give him a personal introduction to two individuals capable of being hereafter of vast service to any candidate for professional business and distinction; namely, Mr. Runnington, as a soliciter of first-rate professional eminence, personal respectability, and amiability of character—and the Lord Chancellor, with both of whom, as may easily be believed, Lord Drelincourt had great personal influence. Mr. Staveley was the first guest that arrived, and found Lord Drelincourt alone in the drawing-room; and his lordship seized the opportunity of conversing with his friend unrestrainedly upon the topics above alluded to, and of assuring him that he might always rely on any good offices which it might be in his lordship's power to perform for him. He spoke to his desponding companion in a tone of earnest and inspiriting encouragement. "Come, come, my dear Staveley," said he, "expurrige frontem! It would seem to be the tendency of close and solitary legal study to make a man despond, and distrust its utility! Go straight on. Constancy, honour, and industry, will inevitably clear the way for their possessor, and also in due time force him forward. Ah! believe me, I know what your feelings are; for very recently I shared them, but always endeavoured to master them. As for the want of a connexion, I can only say that I knew but one attorney and solicitor in all London—my own Mr Runnington, (who dines with me to-day;) but had I known none, I should not have been disheartened, so long as I had health of body and mind, and the means of pursuing my studies"——Here Lord Drelincourt's ear caught a faint and half-suppressed sigh, uttered by his companion.—"I did my best while engaged in the study of the law, and am sure that I shall never have occasion to regret it; and I frankly tell you, Staveley, I was as poor as a church mouse the whole time—over head and ears in debt; and, but for the kindness of this very Mr. Runnington, who lent me three hundred pounds, I never could have entered Mr. Mansfield's chambers, or formed your acquaintance."—While saying this, Lord Drelincourt was looking very keenly indeed at his companion.—"The law is a noble profession! I should have become an enthusiast in it had I continued to devote myself to its study and practice;—by the way, will you accept, as a little memento of our friendship—which I trust you will not break off, Stavely—my few law-books? Of course, I have no further occasion for those which relate to the more practical"—— Here one of the doors opened, and Lady Drelincourt and Miss Aubrey entered, looking each of them exceedingly lovely, and receiving Mr. Staveley with a delightful cordiality and courtesy, for they had often heard Lord Drelincourt mention his name. The other guests then made their appearance in quick succession; and Lord Drelincourt made a point of introducing Mr. Staveley, in very flattering terms, to the Chancellor, who received him with great urbanity, as indeed did Mr. Runnington. 'Twas truly a delightful dinner party—all were in high spirits. As for the Lord Chancellor, he took an opportunity of pressing on Lord Drelincourt the acceptance of an important office under the new government—one which they were exceedingly anxious to have satisfactorily filled, and to which would be annexed a seat in the cabinet. Lord Drelincourt, however, firmly declined the dazzling offer, on the plea of the repose which he felt to be requisite, both for his family and himself, and also the attention due to his private affairs, to which it would be necessary to devote his personal superintendence for some time to come. But to return for a moment to Mr. Staveley. Soon after he had sat down to breakfast the next morning, a servant of Lord Drelincourt's brought to his chambers a small parcel, which, in fact, consisted of the books of which his lordship had begged his acceptance overnight. With what peculiar interest did Mr. Staveley glance over them, finding in every page the slight pencil marks evidencing the careful reading of Lord Drelincourt. In laying down the first book which he had opened, something fell from it upon the floor, which, on his picking it up, proved to be a letter addressed to himself, in the handwriting of Lord Drelincourt. On opening it, what were his feelings on seeing it contain an enclosure of a draft on his lordship's banker for the sum of £300, which he begged Mr. Staveley to accept as a loan, to be repaid whenever and however he might think fit; and in terms of the most earnest delicacy, reminding him of the circumstance which his lordship had named overnight—namely, his own acceptance of a similar sum from Mr. Runnington. Mr. Staveley coloured under a conflict of emotions, which subsided quickly into one strong and deep feeling of gratitude towards his truly noble and generous friend; and that morning he wrote a letter, acknowledging in fitting terms the munificent act of Lord Drelincourt, and enclosing his note of hand for the amount, both of which, however, on his receiving them, Lord Drelincourt, with a good natured smile, put into the fire, that there might exist no evidence whatever of the transaction between himself and Mr. Staveley. His lordship did not even take Lady Drelincourt in this matter into his confidence.

At length every arrangement had been made in London for their quitting it, and at Yatton for their arrival. The last article of furniture, a magnificent piano for Lady Drelincourt, had gone down a fortnight since. Lord and Lady de la Zouch, together with Mr. Delamere, had been at Fotheringham for some time; and the accounts they gave in their letters of the scene which might be expected on the memorable occasion of Lord Drelincourt's taking possession of Yatton, threw them all into a flutter of excitement. From Mr. Delamere's accounts, it would seem as if the day of their arrival was to be a sort of jubilee. He himself had been to and fro twenty times between Yatton and Fotheringham; an entire unanimity of feeling existed, with reference to all the leading arrangements, between himself, Mr. Griffiths, Dr. Tatham, Lord and Lady de la Zouch, and the Earl and Countess of Oldacre, whom it had been deemed expedient to take into their confidence upon the occasion; and a difficult negotiation concerning a certain fine military band, belonging to a regiment stationed only eleven miles off, had been brought to a most satisfactory termination! Dr. Tatham wrote letters to them, especially to Miss Aubrey, almost every day, and, in fact, they all began to imagine themselves already at Yatton, and in the midst of the delicious bustle that was going on there. At length, the long-expected day for their setting off arrived—the 5th day of May, 18—. About ten o'clock in the forenoon might have been seen standing, opposite Lord Drelincourt's door in Dover Street, two roomy travelling carriages and four. Several newly-engaged servants had gone down two or three days before, in charge of a large van full of luggage; and in the first carriage were going only Lord and Lady Drelincourt and Miss Aubrey, his lordship's valet and Lady Drelincourt's maid sitting in the rumble behind; while the second carriage was occupied by little Charles and Agnes, and their attendants, together with Harriet, Miss Aubrey's faithful and pretty little maid. All having been at length completed, the word was given, crack went the whips, and away they rolled, every soul of them as full of glee as souls could be. There was an evident air of expectation and interest along the road, for a long while before they approached Yatton; for in fact it was generally known that Lord Drelincourt, who, it was believed, had passed through a series of romantic adventures, was going down to take possession of the ancient family estate in Yorkshire. How the hearts of the travellers yearned towards the dear old familiar objects on each side of the road, which, as they advanced at a rapid pace, they passed with increasing frequency! At length they reached the last posting-house, which was within twelve miles of Yatton, and there were manifest symptoms of preparation and excitement. Eight very fine horses were brought out in a twinkling, and the harness appeared both new and gay. Mrs. Spruce, the landlady, together with her two daughters, all of them dressed with unusual smartness, stood at the inn door, curtsying repeatedly: and on Lady Drelincourt and Kate seeing them, they beckoned them to the carriage-door, and enquired after their health, with such a kindness and interest in their manner, as almost brought tears into their eyes.

"So you have not forgotten us, Mrs. Spruce?" asked Lord Drelincourt with a gay smile, as they handed a couple of glasses of water into the carriage, at the request of Lady Drelincourt and Kate, who were evidently getting very nervous, with their proximity to Yatton, and the exciting scenes which there awaited them.

"Oh, my lord, forgotten your lordship! No, my ladies, not for one minute since the dismal day you all went—my lord! There's such a stir, my ladies, along the road—you'll see it all when you get a mile further on!—Of course your lordship and your ladyships knows what's going to be done at the Hall"—

"Ah, ah! so I hear! Well—good day, Mrs. Spruce!" cried Lord Drelincourt, and the next moment they had dashed off in their last stage, and at a thundering pace, to be sure. It was nearly twelve o'clock at noon, and the day was bright and beautiful—and there was a fresh and exhilarating breeze stirring, that oft came laden with the rich scents of summer fields.

"Oh Agnes! oh Kate! what a contrast is this to the day on which our horses' heads, two years ago, were turned the other way!" exclaimed Lord Drelincourt; but received only a faint reply, for his companions were getting excited and restless with the rapidly increasing evidences of excitement on the road. As they advanced they overtook vehicles of every description, all containing people in gay holiday trim, and all with their horses' heads turned one way; viz. towards the great centre of attraction, Yatton. At length the increasing number of carriages, chaises, cars, gigs, vans, carts, wagons — many of them decked with ribands and flowers—compelled them to slacken their speed, and gave them fuller opportunities of witnessing the joyful enthusiasm with which their approach was greeted. Already they heard, or imagined they heard, from the direction of Yatton, the sounds of voices and music.

"I'm sure, Charles, I shall cry like a child"—quoth Kate, her eyes suddenly filling with tears; and such was the case also with Lady Drelincourt.

"And what, Kate, if you do?" cried her brother joyfully, kissing and embracing them affectionately.

"Gracious! Charles! Charles!—I declare there's old Granny Grimston—it is indeed!" cried Kate, as they passed an old-fashioned market cart, in which sat, sure enough, the good woman Miss Aubrey had mentioned, beside her daughter, to whom Kate waved her hand repeatedly—for it was to an old pensioner of the late Mrs. Aubrey's! Oh, what a sight burst upon them when they came to the turning of the road which brought them full in view of Yatton—the village and the Hall! They came too, to a dead stand still—'twas impossible to get on for some time, for they seemed to have got suddenly into the middle of some great fair! What a shout rent the air! Boughs of laurel, were waving in all directions, with wreaths and ribands! Beautiful nosegays were flung in through the carriage windows by men, women, and even children, all dressed in their best and gayest attire! Here was formed an equestrian procession that was to precede them into Yatton, consisting of some hundred stout Yorkshire yeomen, chiefly tenants of Lord Drelincourt and his neighbours. Louder and louder came the shouts of welcome from all quarters, before and behind, intermingled at length, as they entered the village, with the clash and clangour of cymbols, the thundering of drums, the sounds of trumpets, trombones, clarionets, and fifes. 'Twas really most exciting, and Lady Drelincourt and Kate were already amply fulfilling their own predictions. Their carriage suddenly stopped for some moments, and a louder shout than had yet been heard burst around them, while the band approached, playing "Rule Britannia!" followed by a procession of at least two hundred horsemen, headed by Delamere, and all wearing his bright blue colours! He thrust his hand into the carriage, and grasping those of each of them, again rode off. Here an attempt was made to take the horses out of Lord Drelincourt's carriage, which he peremptorily forbade acknowledging, however, the affectionate enthusiasm which prompted the proposal, by repeatedly bowing in all directions as they passed down the village. Flags and branches of laurel hung from almost every window, and the crowd had become so great as to prevent them frequently from moving on for more than a minute or two together. At length they saw the church, with its long, thin, gray spire — no doubt its bells were ringing as loudly as they could be rung, but they could not be heard; for the band at that moment, when within a few yards of the park-gates, struck up in fine style the inspiring air of "The King shall hae his own again!" A great number of carriages were drawn up on each side of the entrance to the park, and the high antique gates and stone pillars were covered with wreaths of flowers and branches of laurel. Immediately within the gates, upon each side, upon forms and stools, sat about a dozen of the oldest tenants on the estate, male and female, who, on the approach of Lord Drelincourt, lifted up their hands feebly towards heaven, while tears ran down their eyes, and they implored a blessing on those who were re-entering their own, after so long and cruel a separation from it. But here the eager and affectionate eyes of the travellers lit upon an object infinitely more interesting and affecting than any they had yet seen—'twas the venerable figure of Dr. Tatham, who, with his hat off, stood with his hand and his face elevated momentarily towards heaven, imploring a blessing upon those who were entering. Lord Drelincourt instantly called for the carriage door to be opened, and, within a moment or two's time he had grasped the little doctor's hands in his own; and Lady Drelincourt and Kate, having also hastily alighted, had thrown their arms around him and kissed him, with the feelings of two daughters towards a fond and venerable father. The little doctor was quite overcome, and could scarcely say a word—indeed, they were all much excited. At this point came up Mr. Delamere, who had dismounted at the gate, and, placing Kate's arm hastily, and with a proud and triumphant air, within his own, while Lady Drelincourt was supported between her husband and Dr. Tatham, the two children following, with their attendants immediately behind, in this manner they approached the Hall, each side of the avenue being lined with the gaily-dressed gentry of the neighbourhood, collected from far and wide. When they reached the fine old gateway, there shot up suddenly into the air, upon a flagstaff planted upon the centre of the turret, a splendid crimson banner, while the band within the court-yard struck up the spirit-stirring air, one which no Englishman can listen to without excitement—"See the conquering hero comes!" The moment that they had passed under the old gateway, what a gay and brilliant scene presented itself! Upon the steps fronting the door, and indeed all around, stood the most distinguished persons in the county, ready to greet the new comers. There was the Lord-lieutenant, the High Sheriff, two of the country Members, Catholics and Protestants, High Tories and High Whigs—there they were—the high-born, the beautiful—all crowding with enthusiastic welcome around those who were thus returning to their own, after so extraordinary and infamous an exclusion and banishment. To Lady Drelincourt, to Miss Aubrey, to Lord Drelincourt himself, amidst the overpowering excitement of the moment, it appeared as though they were in a vivid and dazzling dream, and they felt completely confused and bewildered. Lady de la Zouch, and one or two others of their considerate friends, observing the painful excitement under which Lady Drelincourt and Miss Aubrey were labouring, succeeded in withdrawing them for a while from the tumultuous and splendid scene into their chambers.

A splendid cold collation was spread in the hall for the immediate friends and guests of Lord Drelincourt, while an immense entertainment of a more substantial description, was prepared under an awning, upon the beautiful terrace at the back of the Hall, for about three hundred people, consisting principally of the tenantry, their families, and friends. (Half-a-dozen feasts were going on in the village, for those who were necessarily excluded from the terrace tables.) The substantial business of the day, viz. feasting, was to commence, both for gentle and simple, at three o'clock, shortly before which period Lady Drelincourt and Miss Aubrey appeared in the drawing-room, and then in the hall, infinitely the better for their refreshing toilets. 'Tis true that their eyes looked somewhat impaired by the excessive emotions occasioned by the events of the day—for they had both been several times, during their brief absence, on the verge of hysterics. Yet for all that they looked a pair of as lovely women as dear Old England, rich in beauty as it is, could produce.

They both wore plain white muslin dresses, with small blue rosettes, which Lady de la Zouch had intimated would give a certain person infinite gratification—meaning the new member for the borough; for his colours were blue—whereof there was a modest glimpse in his own surtout. Lord Drelincourt also appeared greatly the better for his visit to his dressing-room, and was in the highest possible spirits—as well he might be, amidst a scene so glorious and triumphant as that around him; all people, high and low, rich and poor, without distinction of party, vying with one another in doing him honour, and welcoming him back to the halls of his ancestors. At length, it being announced that all was in readiness, before sitting down to their own banquet, Lord Drelincourt, with Lady Drelincourt on one arm and his sister on the other, and followed by Dr. Tatham, Mr. Runnington, and almost all his guests, passed along under the old archway that led over the bridge to the terrace, in order that the doctor might say grace before the feast began; and the instant that Lord and Lady Drelincourt and Miss Aubrey made their appearance, the shouting and clapping of hands, and waving of handkerchiefs, that ensued, defies description, completely overpowered Lady Drelincourt and Kate, and somewhat disturbed the equanimity of Lord Drelincourt himself. 'Twas several minutes before the least cessation occurred. At length, however, Mr. Griffiths, the steward, who was to preside on the occasion, succeeded in directing attention to Dr. Tatham, who stood uncovered ready to say grace, which he did as soon as there was a decent approach to silence; he, and those who had accompanied him, then returning to the hall. What a prodigious onslaught was instantly made on the enormous masses of beef, boiled and roast—the hams, the tongues, the fowls, and all the innumerable other good things which were heaped upon those hospitable tables! There was all ad libitum; and in addition to that, a bottle of port and of sherry to each mess of four, which latter viands, however, were generally reserved for the business that was to take place after the substantial part of the feast had been discussed.

According to a previous arrangement, about four o'clock intimation was given to the vast party upon the terrace, that Lord Drelincourt, accompanied by his guests, would come and take their seats for a short time at the head of the tables—his lordship occupying the place of Mr. Griffiths. After a great bustle, the requisite space was obtained at the head of the nearest table; and presently Dr. Tatham led in Lady Drelincourt, and Mr. Delamere, Kate; followed by Lord Drelincourt and all his guests—their arrival being greeted in the same enthusiastic manner as before. After they had selected their places, but before they had sat down, Dr. Tatham returned thanks amidst a sudden and decorous silence; and then, all having taken their places, had an opportunity of feasting their eyes with the sight of those who had been so cruelly torn from them, and so long estranged. Lord Drelincourt sat at the head of the table, with Lady Drelincourt on one side and his sister upon the other, both looking exceedingly animated and beautiful. Beside Kate sat Mr. Delamere his eyes greedily watching her every look and motion; and beside Lady Drelincourt sat Dr. Tatham, looking as happy and as proud as it was possible for him to look. After sitting for some minutes conversing with those immediately around him, during which time expectation had gradually hushed down the noise which had prevailed on their entering, Lord Drelincourt slowly poured out a glass of wine, his hand slightly trembling; and while Lady Drelincourt and Kate leaned down their heads, and hid their faces in their handkerchiefs, he slowly rose amidst profound and respectful silence. His voice was at all times clear and melodious, his enunciation distinct and deliberate; so that every word he uttered could be heard by all present. There were grace and dignity in his countenance and gestures; and you felt, as you looked and listened to him, that he was speaking from his heart. Thus he began:—

"Oh, my friends! what a happy moment is this to me and mine! What thanks do I not owe to God for his great goodness in bringing us again together in our former relations of mutual and uninterrupted respect and affection! You must not expect me to say much now, for I cannot, because my heart is so full of love and respect to those whom I see around me, and of gratitude to God. May he, my dear friends, who is now beholding us, and marking the thoughts of our hearts, bless and preserve you all, and enable me never to give you cause to regret having thus affectionately welcomed me back again to my home. It pleased God, my friends, that I, and those whom you see near me, and whom I so tenderly love, should be torn away suddenly, and for a long time, from all that our hearts hold dear. The pangs it cost us—bear with me, my friends—the pangs it cost us"—here Lord Drelincourt could not go on for some moments. "We have, since we left you all, gone through much affliction, a little privation, and some persecution. It was all, however, God's ordering, and we have besought him that we might at all times feel and know it to be so; for then we shall not be impatient or rebellious. He is wiser and kinder in his dealings with us, my friends, than we are sometimes able to see; and as for myself, I think I can say that I would not have lost the lessons which my recent sufferings have taught me, for a thousand times my present advantages. May I never forget them!

"What has befallen me has satisfied me, and, I hope, you too, of the slight hold we have of those advantages which we consider ourselves surest of. Who can tell, dear friends, what a day or an hour may bring forth? And I hope I have also learned one of the great lessons of life, better than I knew it before—that cheerful resignation to the will of God is the only source of fortitude! Never, dear friends, when we are in our deepest difficulties and troubles, despair! Thank God, I never did, or you would not have seen me here to-day. God overrules every thing for the good of those who faithfully obey him; and in our own case, I can assure you, that the very things which we looked upon as the cruellest and hardest to bear of all that had happened to us, turned out to be the very means by which we have been restored to the happiness which we are now met to celebrate! See how good God has been to us! When I look around me, and see what I am permitted to enjoy, and know what I deserve, I tremble.

"You all know, of course, that it has pleased God to place us a little higher in point of mere worldly station than we were before; but I think you will find that it has made only this difference in us; namely, we are more sensible of the importance of the duties which we have to perform. 'Tis not, dear friends, the mere coronet which confers true distinction, but how it is worn. I, of course, have only succeeded by birth to that mark of distinction which the merit of some other person won for him. I trust I shall wear it with honour and humility, and that so will my son after me.

"And now, my dear friends, I must conclude. You see how much those who are sitting near me are affected." Lord Drelincourt paused for some time, and then in a lower tone resumed, "You may remember, some of you at least, the evening before we left Yatton; what you said to me"—here again he paused, and for some time. "I have never forgotten that evening; the thought of it has been like balm poured into a broken heart.

"I have heard that since I left you all, things have gone very differently from the way they went in my time. Oh, dear friends, there shall be no more extortion—there shall be no more oppression, at Yatton. I can, I think, answer for myself; and I think my little son will not take after his father if—you shall see my children presently—God bless you, dear friends! You see that I have now and then been overcome while speaking: I know you will bear with me. Were you in my place, and to look upon those whom I now look upon, you also would be overcome. But let our tears now pass away! Rejoice, dear friends, for it is a day of rejoicing! Be merry! be happy! I now from my heart drink—we all drink, all your healths! Here are health, and peace, and prosperity to you all! God bless you all!"

Lord Drelincourt raised his glass to his lips, and drank off the wine it contained, his hand visibly trembling the while. He then sat down, evidently much subdued; and as for Lady Drelincourt, Miss Aubrey, and Lady de la Zouch—nay every body present, they were deeply affected by the simple and affectionate address that had fallen from Lord Drelincourt, which was followed by a long silence that was infinitely more expressive than the most vociferous responses. After a while, the band commenced playing, in a very beautiful manner,

"Should auld acquaintance be forgot."

There were heard several attempts, from time to time, from different quarters, to join in the chorus, but they were very faint and subdued; and Lord Drelincourt, perceiving the true state of the case, covered his face with his hands. Then, affectionately taking the hands of Kate and Lady Drelincourt, he whispered that all their past sufferings were surely that day richly recompensed; and fearing lest his presence and that of his guests might be a check upon the freedom and hilarity of the great company before him, he rose, and bowing courteously to all around, withdrew amidst most vehement and prodigious cheering. A few minutes afterwards, according to Lord Drelincourt's promise, Charles and Agnes were led in amidst a thousand exclamations of fondness and admiration, (they were really very beautiful children;) and having had a little drop of wine poured into each of their cups, they drank timidly, as they were told, to the health of all present, and then skipped hastily back whence they had come.

I shall not detain the reader with the description which I had prepared of the opening of Kate's school on the morrow; though I think he would like to have been present. A prettier school there is not in England; and if any thing could have increased Kate's love for him who had taken such pains to please her in the matter, it was Dr. Tatham's informing her a morning or two afterwards, that Mr. Delamere had endowed her school with thirty pounds a year for ever. In proportion to Kate's sorrow on leaving her school upon the occasion of their all being driven from Yatton, it may easily be believed were her delight and gratitude for this its complete and more efficient restoration. The opening of that school by Dr. Tatham, in her presence, and also in that of Mr. Delamere, was doubtless an interesting ceremony, yet not to be compared, perhaps, with one that occurred one short month afterwards at Yatton, and in which the same three persons were principally concerned!

Here is a heavenly morning in June! and Kate lying trembling and with beating heart, alone, in that old-fashioned chamber of hers, in which she was first seen—or at least a faint and dim vision of her—by the reader. 'Tis very early, certainly; and as Kate hath passed a strange, restless night, she is at length closing her eyes in sleep; and as nothing is to be heard save yonder lark that is carrying his song higher and higher out of hearing every moment, she will sleep for a while undisturbed.

But now, rise Kate! rise! It is your wedding morning! Early though it be, here are your fair bridesmaids seeking admittance, to deck you in your bridal robes! Sweet Kate, why turn so pale, and tremble so violently? It is truly a memorable day, one long looked forward to with a fluttering heart—a day of delicious agitation and embarrassment; but courage, Kate! courage! Cannot these three beautiful girls who, like the Graces, are arraying you, as becomes your loveliness, with all their innocent arts and archness, provoke one smile on your pale cheek? Weep, then, if such be your humour; for it is the overflowing of joy, and will relieve your heart!—But hasten! hasten! your lover is below, impatient to clasp you in his arms! The maids of the village have been up with the sun gathering sweet flowers to scatter on your way to the altar! Hark, how merrily, merrily ring the bells of Yatton church!—Nearer and nearer comes the hour which cannot be delayed, and why, blushing and trembling maiden, should you dread its approach? Hark—carriage after carriage is coming crashing up to the Hall. Now your maidens are placing on your beautiful brow the orange blossoms—mysterious emblems!

"The fruits of autumn and the flowers of spring," and a long flowing graceful veil, shall conceal your blushes!—Now, at length, she descends—and sinks into the arms of a fond and noble brother, whose heart is too full for speech, as is that of your sister! Shrink not from your lover, who approaches you, see how tenderly and delicately! Is he not one whom a maiden may be proud of? See the troops of friends that are waiting to attend you, and do you honour! Every where that the eye looks, are glistening gay wedding-favours, emblems of innocence and joy.—Come, Kate—your brother waits; you go with him to church, but you will come back with another! He that loves you as a father, the venerable minister of God, is awaiting your arrival! What a brilliant throng is in that little church!

Now her beautiful form is standing at the altar, beside her manly lover, and the solemn ceremony has commenced, which is to unite, with heaven's awful sanction, these two young and happy and virtuous hearts!

'Tis done! Kate Aubrey! Kate Aubrey! where are you? She is no more—but, as Mrs. Delamere, is sitting blushing and sobbing beside her husband, elate with pride and fondness, as they drive rapidly back to the Hall. In vain glances her eye at that splendid banquet, and she soon retires with her maidens to prepare for her agitating journey!

Well—they are gone! My pure and lovely Kate is gone! 'Tis hard to part with her! But blessings attend her! Blessings attend you both! You cannot forget dear YATTON, where all that is virtuous and noble will ever with open arms receive you!

THE END.

And now, dear friends! farewell for many a day!
If e'er we meet again, I cannot say.
Together have we travell'd two long years,
And mingled sometimes smiles, and sometimes tears!
Now droops my weary hand, and swells my heart,—
I fear good friends! we must for ever part.
Forgive my many faults! and say of me,
He hath meant well, who writ this history!

Reuchlin, Geschichte von Port-Royal. Der Kampf der Reformirten und des Jesuitischen Katholicismus. 1ter Band: bis zum tode Angelica Arnauld.—(Reuchlin, History of Port-Royal. The Struggle of the Reformed and Jesuitical Catholicism. 1st vol. to the death of Angelique Arnauld.) 8vo. Leipsic: 1839.

All religions, and all ages, have their saints; their men of unearthly mould; self-conquerors; sublime even in their errors; not altogether hateful in their very crimes. If a man would understand the dormant powers of his own nature, let him read the Acta Sanctorum. Or, if 'too high this price of knowledge,' let him at least acquaint himself with the legends of the later heroes of the Gallican Church. Of all ascetics they were the least repulsive. They waged war on dulness with the ardour of Dangeau and St. Simon, and with still better success. While macerating their bodies in the cloisters of Port-Royal, they did not cease to be French men and French women of the Augustan age. While practising the monastic virtue of silence, their social spirit escaped this unwelcome restraint, in a body of Memoirs as copious as those which record the splendour and miseries of Versailles. In a series of volumes, of which the above is the first, the author is about to tell their story in the language (vernacular and erudite) of his country and his times. A rapid sketch of it may be of use in directing the attention of our readers to one of the most remarkable episodes in ecclesiastical history.

He whose journey lies from Versailles to Chevreuse, will soon find himself at the brow of a steep cleft or hollow, intersecting the monotonous plain across which he has been passing. The brook which winds through the verdant meadows beneath him, stagnates into a large pool, reflecting the solitary Gothic arch, the water-mill, and the dovecot, which rise from its banks; with the farm-house, the decayed towers, the forest trees, the innumerable shrubs and creepers which clothe the slopes of the valley. France has many a lovelier prospect, though this is not without its beauty; and many a field of more heart-stirring interest, though this, too, has been ennobled by heroic daring; but through the length and breadth of that land of chivalry and of song, the traveller will in vain seek a spot so sacred to genius, to piety, and to virtue. That arch is all which remains of the once crowded monastery of Port-Royal. In those woods Racine first learned the language—the universal language—of poetry. Under the roof of that humble farm-house, Pascal, Arnauld, Nicole, De Saci, and Tillemont, meditated those works, which, as long as civilization and Christianity survive, will retain their hold on the gratitude and reverence of mankind. There were given innumerable proofs of the graceful good-humour of Henry the Fourth. To this seclusion retired the heroine of the Fonde, Ann Genevieve, Duchess of Longueville, to seek the peace which the world could not give. Madame de Sevigné discovered here a place 'tout propre à 'inspirer le désir de faire son salut.' From the Petit Trianon and Marly, there came hither to worship God; many a courtier and many a beauty, heart-broken or jaded with the very vanity of vanities—the idolatry of their fellow mortals. Survey French society in the seventeenth century from what aspect you will, it matters not, at Port-Royal will be found the most illustrious examples of whatever imparted to that motley assemblage any real dignity or permanent regard. Even to the mere antiquarian, it was not without a lively interest.

At the eve of his departure to the conquest of the Holy Sepulchre, the good knight, Matthieu de Marli, cast a wistful gaze over the broad lands of his ancestors, and entrusted to his spouse, Mathilde de Garlande, the care of executing some work of piety by which to propitiate the Divine favour, and to insure his safe return. A Benedictine monastery, for the reception of twelve ladies of the Cistertian order, was accordingly erected, in imitation of the cathedral at Amiens, and by the same architect. Four centuries witnessed the gradual increase of the wealth and dignity of the foundation. Prelates of the houses of Sully and Nemours enlarged its privileges. Pope Honorius the III. authorized the celebration of the sacred office within its walls, even though the whole country should be lying under a papal interdict; and of the host consecrated on the profession of a nun, seven fragments might be solemnly confided to her own keeping, that, for as many successive days, she might administer to herself the holy sacrament. Yet how arrest by spiritual immunities the earthward tendency of all sublunary things! At the close of the reign of Henry IV., the religious ladies of Port-Royal had learned to adjust their 'robes à grandes manches' to the best advantage. Promenades by the margin of the lake relieved the tedium of monastic life. Gayer strains of music than those of the choir, might be heard from the adjacent woods; and if a cavalier from Paris or Chevreuse had chanced to pursue his game that way, the fair musicians were not absolutely concealed nor inexorably silent. So lightly sat the burden of their vows on those amiable recluses, that the gayest courtier might well covet for his portionless daughter the rank of their lady abbess.

Such at least was the judgment of M. Marion. He was advocate-general to Henry IV., and maternal grandfather of Jaqueline Marie Angelique and of Agnes Arnauld. Of the arts to the invention of which the moderns may lay claim, that of jobbing is not one. M. Marion obtained from 'the father of his 'people' the coadjuterie of the abbey Port-Royal for the high-spirited Jaqueline, then in her eighth year; and that of St. Cyr for the more gentle Agnes over whom not more than five summers had passed. The young ladies renounced at once the nursery and the world. A single step conducted them from the leading strings to the veil. Before the completion of her first decade, Angelique, on the death of her immediate predecessor, found herself, in plenary right, the abbess and ruler of her monastery; and, in attestation of her spiritual espousals, assumed the title and the name of the Mère Angelique, by which she has since been celebrated in the annals of the church.

To the church, however, must not be imputed this breach of ecclesiastical discipline. In the ardour of his parental affections, the learned advocate-general was hurried into acts for which he would have consigned a criminal of lower degree to the galleys. He obtained the requisite bulls from Rome by forged certificates of his grand-daughter's age; and to this treason against the holy see, Henry himself was at least an accessary after the fact. Hunting in the valley of Port-Royal, the gay monarch trespassed on the precincts of the sacred enclosure. To repel the royal intruder, a child, bearing in her hand the crosier, which bespoke her high conventional rank, issued from the gates of the abbey at the head of a solemn procession of nuns, and rebuked her sovereign with all the majesty of an infant Ambrose. Henry laughed and obeyed. Marion's detected fraud would seem to have passed for a good practical joke, and for nothing more. In the result, however, no occurrence ever contributed less to the comedy of life, or formed the commencement of a series of events more grave or touching. It would be difficult or impossible to discover, in the history of the church, the name of any woman who has left so deep an impress of her character on the thoughts and the conduct of the Christian commonwealth.

The family of Arnauld held a conspicuous station among the noblesse of Provence, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. In a later age, a member of that house enjoyed the singular honour of at once serving Catharine de Medicis as her procureur-general, and of defeating, sword in hand, at the head of his servants, the force sent to assassinate him on the day of St. Bartholomew. Returning to the bosom of the church, which had thus roughly wooed him, he transmitted his fortune and his office to his son, Antoine Arnauld, the husband of Catharine Marion. They were the happy parents of no less than twenty children. Of these the youngest was the great writer who has imparted to the name of Arnauld an imperishable lustre. Five of the daughters of the same house assumed the veil, in the abbey of Port-Royal. Their mother, Catharine Marion, was admitted in her widowhood into that society. Pomponne, the minister of Louis XIV.; Le Maitre, unrivalled among the masters of forensic eloquence in France; and De Saci, the author of the best version of the Holy Scriptures into the French language, were three of her grandsons. Before her death, the venerable matron had seen herself surrounded, in the monastery and the adjoining hermitages, by eighteen of her descendants in the first and second generations; nor until the final dispersion of the sisterhood, in the beginning of the seventeenth century, had the posterity of Antoine and Catharine Arnauld ceased to rule in the house of which the Mère Angelique had, seventy years before, been the renowned reformer.

To those who believe that the psychological distinction of the sexes may be traced to physical causes, and that, where they neither marry nor are given in marriage, those distinctions will for ever disappear, the character of Angelique is less perplexing than to the advocates of the opposite theory. Her understanding, her spirit, and her resolves, were all essentially masculine. She was endued with the various faculties by which man either extorts or wins dominion over his fellow-men;—with address, courage, fortitude, self-reliance, and an unfaltering gaze fixed on objects at once too vast to be measured, and too remote to be discerned but by the all-searching eye of faith. Among the Israelites of old, she would have assumed the office of Judge; or would have given out oracles in the forests of ancient Germany. Born in the reign, and educated near the court of a Bourbon, the lighter and more gentle elements of her nature found exercise even under the paralysing influences of an ascetic life; for Angelique was gay and light of heart, and St. Benedict himself might have forgiven or applauded the playful sallies of his votary. In scaling the heights of devotion, she could call to her own aid, and that of others, all the resources of the most plaintive or impassioned music. To flowers, and the glad face of nature, she gave back their own smiles with a true woman's sympathy. With such literature as might be cultivated within the walls of her convent, she was intimately conversant; and would have eclipsed Madame de Sevigné's epistolary fame, had it been permitted to her to escape from theological into popular topics. Concentrated within a domestic circle, and bestowed on a husband or a child, the affections which she poured out on every human being who claimed her pity, would have burned with a flame as pure and as intense as was ever hymned in poetry or dreamt of in romance. A traveller on the highways of the world, she must have incurred every peril except that of treading an obscure and inglorious path. Immured by superstition in a cloister, she opened the way at once to sublunary fame and to an immortal recompense; and has left an example as dangerous as it may be seductive to feebler minds, who, in a desperate imitation of such a model, should hazard a similar self-devotion.

Angelique, indeed, might be fitted for a nunnery; for such was the strength, and such the sacred harmony of her spirit, that while still a sojourner on earth, she seemed already a denizen of heaven. When a child, she understood as a child; enjoying the sports, the rambles, and the social delights which the habits of Port-Royal had not then forbidden. With advancing years came deeper and more melancholy thoughts. She felt, indeed, (how could she but feel?) the yearnings of a young heart for a world where love and homage awaited her. But those mysteries of our being, of which the most frivolous are not altogether unconscious, pressed with unwonted weight on her. A spouse of Christ; a spiritual mother of those who sustained the same awful character—her orisons, her matins, and her vesper chants, accompanied by unearthly music and by forms of solemn significance; the Gothic pile beneath which she sat enthroned; and the altar where, as she was taught, the visible presence of her Redeemer was daily manifested—all spoke to her of a high destiny, a fearful responsibility, and of objects for which all sublunary ties might well be severed, and a sacrifice wisely made of every selfish feeling. Nor need a Protestant fear to acknowledge, that on a heart thus consecrated to the service of her Maker, rested the holy influence, familiar to all who meekly adore the great source of wisdom, and reverently acquiesce in his will. As a science, religion consists in the knowledge of the relations between God and man; as a principle, in the exercise of the corresponding affections; as a rule of duty, in the performance of the actions which those affections prescribe. The principle may thrive in healthful life and energy, though the science be ill understood, and the rule imperfectly apprehended. For, after all, the great command is love; and He from whom that command proceeded, is himself Love; and amidst all the absurdities (for such they were) of her monastic life, Angelique was still conscious of the presence of a Father, and found the guidance of a friend.

When, at the age of eleven years, Angelique became the abbess of Port-Royal, few things were less thought of by the French ladies of the Cisterian order than the rule of their austere founder. During the wars of the League, religion, by becoming a watchword, had almost ceased to be a reality; civil war, the apology for every crime, had debased the national character; and the profligacy of manners which the last generation expiated by their sufferings, may be distinctly paid back to the age of which Davilla has written the political, and Bassompierre the social history. Society will still exert a powerful influence even over those by whom it has been abandoned. When Gabrielle d'Etrees reigned at the Louvre, beads were told and masses sung in neighbouring cloisters, by vestals who, in heathen Rome, would have been consigned to a living sepulchre. In a monastery, the spiritual thermometer ranges from the boiling to the freezing point with but few intermediate pauses. From the ecstacies of devotion there is but one step to disgust, and thence to sensuality, for most of those who dare to forego the aids to piety and virtue which divine wisdom has provided in the duties and the affections of domestic life.

While this downward progress was advancing at Port-Royal, it happened that a Capuchin friar sought and obtained permission to preach there. Of the man himself, the chroniclers of the house have left a scandalous report; but they gratefully acknowledge the efficacy of his sermon. Angelique listened, and was converted. Such at least, is her own statement; and unstirred be all the theological questions connected with it. How deep was the impression on her mind, may be gathered from her own words:—'Often,' she exclaims, 'did I wish to fly a hundred leagues from the spot, and never more to see my father, mother, or kindred, dearly as I love them. My desire was to live apart from every one but God, unknown to any human being, concealed and humble, with no witness but himself, with no desire but to please him.' Her dignity as abbess she now regarded as a burden. Even her projected reforms had lost their interest. To live where her holy aspirations would be thwarted, and where examples of holiness would not be found, was to soar to a more arduous, and therefore a more attractive sphere of self-denial. That such fascinations should dazzle a young lady in her seventeenth year, is, it must be confessed, no very memorable prodigy; but to cherish no ineffectual emotions was one of the characteristics of the Mère Angelique, as it is, indeed, of all powerful minds. To abdicate her ecclesiastical rank, and by breathing a tainted moral atmosphere, to nourish by the force of contrast the loftier Christian graces, were purposes ultimately executed, though for a while postponed. She paused only till the sisterhood of Port-Royal should have acquired, from her example or teaching, that sanctity of manners in which her creed informed her that the perfection of our nature consists. To the elder ladies, the prospect had few charms. But the will of their young abbess prevailed. They laid at her feet their separate possessions, abandoned every secular amusement, and, closing the gates of their monastery against all strangers, retired to that uninterrupted discharge of their spiritual exercises to which their vows had consigned them. Much may be read in the conventual annals, of the contest with her family to which the Mère Angelique was exposed by the last of these resolutions. On a day, subsequently held in high esteem as the 'Journée du Guichet,' her parents and M. D'Andilly, her eldest brother, were publicly excluded, by her mandate, from the hallowed precincts, despite their reproaches and their prayers, and the filial agonies of her own heart. That great sacrifice accomplished, the rest was easy. Poverty resumed his stern dominion. Linen gave place to the coarsest woollens. Fasting and vigils subdued the lower appetites; and Port-Royal was once more a temple whence the sacrifices of devotion rose with an unextinguished flame to heaven, thence, as it was piously believed, to draw down an unbroken stream of blessings to earth.

Far different were the strains that arose from the neighbouring abbey of Maubisson, under the rule of Mde. d'Etrees. That splendid mansion, with its dependent baronies and forests, resembled far more the palace and gardens of Armida, than a retreat sacred to penitence and prayer. She was the sister of the too famous Gabrielle, to whose influence with Henry she was indebted for this rich preferment. Indulging without restraint, not merely in the luxuries but in the debaucheries of the neighbouring capital, she had provoked the anger of the king, and the alarm of the general of the order. A visitation of the house was directed. Madame d'Etrees imprisoned the visiters, and well nigh starved them. A second body of delegates presented themselves. Penances, at least when involuntary, were not disused at Maubisson. The new commissioners were locked up in a dungeon, regaled with bread and water, and soundly whipped every morning. Supported by a guard, the general himself then hazarded an encounter with the formidable termagant. He returned with a whole skin, but boasting no other advantage. Next appeared at the abbey gates a band of archers. After two days of fruitless expostulation, they broke into the enclosure. Madame now changed her tactics. She took up a defensive position, till then unheard of in the science of strategy. In plain terms, she went to bed. A more embarrassing manœuvre was never executed by Turenne or Condé. The siege was turned into a blockade. Hour after hour elapsed; night succeeded to day, and day to night, but still the abbess was recumbent—unapparelled, unapproachable. Driven thus to choose between a ludicrous defeat and a sore scandal, what Frenchmen could longer hesitate? Bed, blankets, abbess and all, were raised on the profane shoulders of the archers, lifted into a carriage, and most appropriately turned over to the keeping of the Filles Penitentes at Paris.

And now was to be gratified the lofty wish of Angelique to tread in the paths where, unsustained by any human sympathy, she might cast herself with an undivided reliance on the arm which she knew could never fail her. From the solemn repose of Port-Royal, she was called, by the general of the order, to assume the government of the ladies of Maubisson. Thetis passing from the ocean caves at the Grecian camp, did not make a more abrupt transition. At Maubisson, the compromise between religious duties and earthly pleasures was placed on the most singular footing. Monks and nuns sauntered together through the gardens of the monastery, or angled in the lakes which watered them. Fetes were celebrated in the arbours with every pledge except that of temperance. Benedictine cowls and draperies were blended in the dance with the military uniform and the stiff brocades of their secular guests; and the evening closed with cards and dice and amateur theatricals, until the certain fell on scenes than which none could more require that friendly shelter. Toil and care might seem to have fled the place, or rather to have been reserved exclusively for the confessor. Even for him relief was provided. Considerately weighing the extent of the labours they habitually imposed on him, his fair penitents drew up for their common use certain written forms of self-arraignment, to which he, with equal tenderness, responded by other established forms of conditional absolution.

But the lady entered, and Comus and his crew fled the hallowed ground which they had thus been permitted to defile. She entered with all the majesty of faith, tempered by a meek compassion for the guilt she abhorred, and strong in that virgin purity of heart which can endure unharmed the contact even of pollution. 'Our health and our lives may be sacrificed,' she said to her associates in this work of mercy; 'but the work is the work of God:' and in the strength of God she performed it. Seclusion from the world was again established within the refectory and the domain of Maubisson. Novices possessing a 'genuine vocation' were admitted. Angelique directed at once the spiritual affairs of the convent.—All the details of a feudal principality, the education of the young, the care of the sick, the soothing of the penitents, the management of the perverse, the conduct of the sacred offices, alternately engaged her time; and in each she exhibited a gentleness, a gayety, and a firmness of mind, before which all resistance gave way. The associates of Madame d'Etrees retained their love of good cheer, and Angelique caused their table to be elegantly served. They sang deplorably out of tune, and the young abbess silently endured the discord which racked her ear. To their murmurs she answered in her kindest accents. Their indolence she rebuked only by performing the most menial offices in their service; and inculcated self-denial by assigning to herself a dormitory, which, to say the truth, would have much better suited the house dog. The record of the strange and even sordid self-humiliations to which she thought it right to bow, can hardly be read without a smile; but, whatever may have been the errors of her creed, a more touching picture has never been drawn of the triumphs of love and of wisdom, than in the record left by Madame Suireau des Anges of this passage of the life of Angelique Arnauld.

But Madame d'Etrees was not yet at the end of her resources. A company of young men, under the guidance of her brother-in-law Count de Sauzé, were observed one evening to loiter near the house of the Filles Penitentes. By the next morning she was under their escort at the gates of Maubisson. Burst open by main force, they again admitted the ejected abbess. The servant who opposed her entrance was chastised on the spot. Patients who now occupied as an hospital the once sumptuous chambers of the Abbatial lodge, instantly found themselves in much more humble lodgings. Cooks resumed their long neglected art, and Madame d'Etrees provided a dinner worthy of her former hospitality and her recent privations. But in the presence of Angelique, the virago was abashed. To intimidate or to provoke her rival proved alike impossible: it might be more easy to overpower her. De Sauzé and his confederates made the attempt. They discharged their pistols and flourished their drawn swords over her head, with unmanly menaces. She remained unmoved and silent. The screams which the occasion demanded, were accordingly supplied by the intrusive abbess. Clamour and outrage were alike ineffectual. At length Madame d'Etrees and her respectable confessor, aided by De Sauzé, laid their hands on Angelique, and thrust her from the precincts of the monastery. Thirty of the nuns followed her in solemn procession. Their veils let down, their eyes cast on the earth, and their hands clasped in prayer, they slowly moved to a place of refuge in the neighbouring town of Pontoise.

But alas, for the vanity of human triumphs!—waving banners, and burnished arms glitter through the advancing column of dust on the road from Paris to Maubisson. Scouts announce the approach of two hundred and fifty well appointed archers: Madame d'Etrees and her cavaliers escape by the postern. A desperate leap saves the worthless life of her confessor. Her partizan, the Mère de la Sure, 'a nun by profession, but otherwise resembling a trooper,' mounts through a trap door to a hiding-place in the ceiling, thence to be shamefully dragged by an archer whom she still more shamefully abused. Then might be seen through the gloom of night, a train of priests and nuns drawing near with measured steps to the venerable abbey; on either side a double file of cavalry, and in each horseman's hand a torch, illuminating the path of the returning exiles. Angelique resumed her benignant reign; but not in peace. Brigands led by De Sauzé, and encouraged by her rival, haunted the neighbouring forests, and though protected by the archers, the monastery remained in a state of siege. Shots were fired through the windows, and the life of Angelique was endangered. Strong in the assurance of divine protection, she demanded and obtained the removal of the guard. Her confidence was justified by the event. Madame d'Etrees was discovered, was restored to her old quarters at the Filles Penitentes, and in due time transferred—not without good cause—to the Chatelet; there to close in squalid misery, in quarrels, and intemperance, a career which might, with almost equal propriety, form the subject of a drama, a homily, or a satire.

For five successive years Angelique laboured to bring back the ladies of Maubisson to the exact observance of their sacred vows. Aided by her sister Agnes, the abbess of St. Cyr, she established a similar reform in a large proportion of the other Cistertain nunneries of France. All obstacles yielded to their love, prudence, and their self-devotion. A moral plague was stayed, and excesses which even the sensual and the worldly condemned, were banished from the sanctuaries of religion. That in some, the change was but from shameless riot to hypocritical conformity; that in others, intemperance merely gave way to mental lethargy; and that even the most exalted virtues of the cloister held but a subordinate and an equivocal place in the scale of Christian graces, is indeed but too true: yet assuredly it was in no such critical spirit as this, that the labours of Angelique were judged and accepted by Him, in the lowly imitation of whom she had thus gone about doing good. 'She has done what she could,' was the apology with which he rescued from a like cold censure the love which had expressed itself in a costly and painful sacrifice; nor was the gracious benediction which rewarded the woman of Bethany withheld from the abbess of Port-Royal. To that tranquil home she bent her steps, there to encounter far heavier trials than any to which the resentment of Madame d'Etrees had exposed her.

Accompanied by a large number of the nuns of Maubisson, Angelique returned to the valley of Chevreuse. They brought with them neither silver nor gold, though rich in treasures of a far higher price in the account of their devout protectress. Poverty, disease, and death, were however in their train. Rising from the marshes below, a humid fog hung continually on the slopes of the adjacent hills, and the now crowded monastery was soon converted into one great hospital. But for a timely transfer of the whole establishment to a hotel purchased for them by the mother of Angelique in the Faubourg Saint Jaques at Paris, their remaining history might all have been compressed into a chapter on the influence of malaria.

The restoration of the community to health was not, however, the most momentous consequence of the change. It introduced the abbess to the society and the influence of Hauranne de Verger, the abbot of St. Cyran, one of the most memorable names in the ecclesiastical annals of that age. When Richelieu was yet a simple bishop, he distinguished among the crowd of his companions one whose graceful bearing, open countenance, learning, gayety, and wit, revealed to his penetrating glance the germs of future eminence. But to an eye dazzled by such prospects as were already dawning on the ambitious statesman, those which had arrested the upward gaze of his young associate were altogether inscrutable. With what possible motive De Verger should for whole days bury himself in solitude, and chain down that buoyant spirit to the study of the Greek and Latin fathers, was one of the few problems which ever engaged and baffled the sagacity of M. de Lucon. They parted; the prelate to his craft, the student to his books; the one to extort the reluctant admiration of the world, the other to toil and to suffer in the cause of pietry and truth. They met again; the cardinal to persecute, and the abbot to be his victim. Death called them both to their account; leaving to them in the world they had agitated or improved, nothing but historical names, as forcibly contrasted as they had been strangely associated.

Great men (and to few could that title be more justly given than to Richelieu) differ from other men chiefly in the power of self-multiplication; in knowing how to make other men adopt their views and execute their purposes. Thus, to subjugate the genius of St. Cyran, the great minister had spared neither caresses nor bribes. The place of first almoner to Henrietta of England, the bishoprics of Clermont and Bayonne, a choice among numerous abbacies, were successively offered and refused. "Gentlemen, I introduce to you the most learned man in Europe," was the courteous phrase by which the cardinal made known the friend of his youth to the courtiers who thronged his levee. But human applause had lost its charm for the ear of St. Cyran. The retired and studious habits of his early days, had not appeared more inexplicable to the worldly-minded statesman than his present indifference. Self-knowledge had made Richelieu uncharitable. Incredulous of virtues of which he detected no type in the dark recesses of his own bosom, he saw in his former companion a treacherous enemy, if not a rival. There were secrets of his early life of which he seems to have expected and feared the disclosure. St. Cyran was at least the silent, and might become the open enemy of the declaration by which the parliament and clergy of Paris had annulled the marriage of Gaston Duke of Orleans, to pave the way for his union with the niece of the cardinal. To his long-cherished scheme of erecting the kingdom of France into a Patriarchate in his own favour, there could arise no more probable or more dangerous opponent. To these imaginary or anticipated wrongs, was added another, which seems to have excited still more implacable resentment. An aspirant after every form of glory, Richelieu had convinced himself, and required others to believe, that his literary and theological were on a level with his political powers. He was the author of a Catechism where might be read the dogma, that contrition alone, uncombined in the heart of the penitent with any emotions of love towards the Deity, was sufficient to justify an absolution at the Confessional. One Seguenot, a priest of the Oratory, maintained and published the opposite opinion. Rumour denied to Seguenot the real parentage of the book which bore his name, and ascribed it to St. Cyran. From speculations on the love of God to feelings of hatred to man, what polemic will not readily pass, whether his cap be red or black? Seguenot's errors were denounced by the Sorbonne, and the poor man himself was sent to the Bastile, there, during the rest of his great opponent's life, to obtain clearer views on the subject of contrition. Impartial injustice required that the real, or imputed, should fare no better than the nominal author; and St. Cyran was conducted to Vincennes, to breathe no more the free air of heaven till Richelieu himself should be laid in the grave.

Never had that gloomy fortress received within its walls a man better fitted to endure with composure the utmost reverses of fortune. To him, as their patriarch or founder, the whole body of the Port-Royalists, with one voice, attribute not merely a pre-eminence above all their other teachers, but such a combination of intellectual powers and Christian graces, as would entitle him not so much to a place in the calendar, as to a place apart from, and above, the other luminaries in that spiritual galaxy. Make every deduction from their eulogies which a rational scepticism may suggest, and it will yet be impossible to evade the accumulated proofs on which they claim for St. Cyran the reverence of mankind. Towards the close of the first of the four volumes which he has dedicated to the attempt, Claude Lancelot confesses and laments the difficulty of conveying to others by words any definite image of the sublime and simple reality which he daily contemplated with more than filial reverence. He describes a man moving through the whole circle of the virtues which the Gospel inculcates, with a step so firm as to indicate the constant aid of a more than human power, and with a demeanour so lowly as to bespeak a habitual consciousness of that divine presence. He depicts a moral hero, by whom every appetite had been subdued, and every passion tranquillised, though still exquisitely alive to the pains and enjoyments of life, and responding with almost feminine tenderness to every affectionate and kindly feeling—a master of all erudition, but never so happy as when imparting to little children the elementary truths on which his own heart reposed—grave, nay, solemn in discourse, but with tones so gentle, a wisdom so profound, and words of such strange authority to animate and to soothe the listener, that, in comparison with his, all other colloquial eloquence was wearisome and vapid—rebuking vice far less by stern reproof than by the contrast of his own serene aspect, at once the result and the reflection of the perfect peace in which his mind continually dwelt,—exhibiting a transcript, however rudely and imperfectly, yet faithfully drawn, of the great example to which his eye was ever turned, and where, averting his regard from all inferior models, it was his wont to study, to imitate, and to adore. In short, the St. Cyran of Lancelot's portraiture is one of those rare mortals whose mental health is absolute and unimpaired—whose character consists not so much in the excellence of particular qualities, as in the symmetry, the balance, and the well-adjusted harmonies of all—who concentrate their energies in one mighty object, because they live under the habitual influence of one supreme motive—who are ceaselessly animated by a love embracing every rational being, from Him who is the common parent of the rest, to the meanest and the vilest of those who were originally created in his image and likeness.

Nor was Lancelot a man inapt to discriminate. He was the author of the Port-Royal Grammars, Greek, Latin, and Italian, now fallen into disuse, but so well known to such of us as ploughed those rugged soils during the first ten years of the present century. His biographical labours are not without a tinge of his style as a grammarian;—a little tedious, perhaps, and not a little prolix and over-methodical, but replete in almost every page with such touches of genuine dignity in the master, and cordial reverence in the discipline—with a sympathy so earnest for the virtues he celebrates, and so simple-hearted a consciousness of his own inferiority—that, in the picture he undesignedly draws of himself, he succeeds more than in any other way in raising a lofty conception of the man by whom he was held in such willing and grateful subjugation. And he had many fellow-subjects. Richelieu himself had felt his daring spirit awed by the union, in the friend of his youth, of a majestic repose and unwearied activity, which compelled the great minister to admit that the heart of man might envelope mysteries beyond his divination. Pascal, Nicole, Arnauld, and many others, eminent in that age for genius and piety, submitted themselves to his guidance in their studies as well as in their lives, with the implicit deference of children awaiting the commands of a revered and affectionate father. He was a most voluminous writer; but of his published works, one only attained a transient celebrity, and of that book his authorship was more than doubtful. If he did not disown, he never claimed it. Of the innumerable incidents recorded of him during his imprisonment at Vincennes, few are more characteristic than the sale of a considerable part of a scanty collection of books he had brought there, to purchase clothes for two of his fellow-prisoners, the Baron and Baroness de Beau Soleil. "I entreat you," he says to the lady to whom he gave this commission, "that the cloth may be fine and good, and befitting their station in society. I do not know what is becoming; but, if I remember, some one has told me that gentlemen and ladies of their condition ought not to be seen in company without gold lace for the men, and black lace for the women. If I am right about this, pray purchase the best, and let every thing to be done modestly, yet handsomely, that when they see each other, they may, for a few minutes at least, forget that they are captives.' It is in the moral, rather than in the intellectual qualities of St. Cyran, that his claim to the veneration of posterity must now be rested. He occupies a place in ecclesiastical history as the founder of Jansenism in France.

Of that system of religious belief and practice, the origin is to be traced to the joint labours of St. Cyran and Cornelius Jansen, during the six years which they passed in social study at Bayonne. Returning to his native country, Jansen became first a Professor of divinity at Louvain, and afterwards Bishop of Ypres. There he surrendered himself to a life of unremitting labour. Ten times he read over every word of the works of Augustine; thirty times he studied all those passages of them which relate to the Pelagian controversy. All the fathers of the church were elaborately collated for passages illustrative of the opinions of the Bishop of Hippo. At length, after an uninterrupted study of twenty years, was finished the celebrated Augustinus Cornelii Jansenii. With St. Austin as his text and guide, the good Bishop proceeded to establish, on the authority of that illustrious father, those doctrines which, in our times and country, have been usually distinguished by the terms Calvinistic or Evangelical. Heirs of guilt and corruption, he considered the human race, and each successive member of it, as lying in a state of condemnation, and as advancing towards a state of punishment; until an internal impulse from on high, awakens one and another to a sense of this awful truth, and infuses into them a will to fly from impending vengeance. But this impulse is imparted only to the few; and on them it is bestowed in pursuance of a decree existing in the divine intelligence before the creation of our species. Of the motives of their preference not even a conjecture can be formed. So far as human knowledge extends, it is referable simply to the divine volition: and is not dependent on any inherent moral difference between the objects of it, and those from whom such mercy is withheld. This impulse is not, however, irresistible. Within the limits of his powers, original or imparted, man is a free agent;—free to admit and free to reject the proffered aid. If rejected, it enhances his responsibility—if admitted, it leads him by continual accessions of the same supernatural assistance to an acquiescence in those opinions, to the exercise of those affections, and to the practice of those virtues, which collectively form the substance of the Christian system. Such is the general result of the labours of Jansen. On the day which witnessed the completion of them, he was removed by the plague to a state of being where he probably learned at once to rejoice in the fidelity, and to smile at the simplicity of those sublunary toils. Within an hour of his death he made a will, submitting his work to the judgment of the Church of Rome, in the communion of which he had lived and was about to die. He addressed to Pope Urban the Eighth a letter, laying the fruits of his studies at the feet of his holiness, 'approving, condemning, advancing, or retracting, as should be prescribed by the thunder of the apostolic see.' Both the will and the letter were suppressed by his executors. Two years from the death of its author had not elapsed, before the Augustinus appeared in print. It was the signal of a contest which for nearly seventy years agitated the Sorbonne and Versailles, fired the enthusiasm of the ladies and the divines of France, and gave to her historians and her wits a theme, used with fatal success, to swell the tide of hatred and of ridicule—which has finally swept away the temporal greatness, and for a while silenced the spiritual ministrations, of the Gallican Church.

Having aided largely in the composition of this memorable treatise, St. Cyran exerted himself with still greater effect in building up a society for the maintenance and promulgation of the principles it established. Angelique Arnauld and the sisterhood of Port-Royal were now settled at Paris, but they were still the proprietors of the deserted monastery; and there were gradually assembled a college of learned men, bound by no monastic vows, and living according to no positive rule, Benedictine or Franciscan. They were chiefly disciples of St. Cyran, and under his guidance had retired from the world to consecrate their lives to penitence, to their own spiritual improvement, and to the instruction of mankind.

Of this number was Antoine Le Maitre. At the age of twenty-seven, he had been advanced to the rank of Councillor of State, and enjoyed at the bar an unrivalled reputation for learning and for eloquence. When he was to speak, even the churches were abandoned. Quitting their pulpits the preachers assisted to throng the hall of the palace of justice; and some of the most celebrated among them, actually obtained from their superiors a permanent dispensation from their ecclesiastical duties at such seasons, that they might improve in the arts of public speaking by listening to the great advocate. When he spoke, the delight of the audience broke out into bursts of applause, which the Judges were unable or unwilling to repress. 'I would rather be the object of those plaudits than enjoy all the glory of my Lord the Cardinal,' was the somewhat hazardous exclamation of one of his friends, as he joined, heart and hand, in the universal tumult. Far different was the estimate which his devout mother had formed of the prospects of her son. She was one of the sisters of Angelique Arnauld, and amidst the cares of conjugal life cherished a piety at least as pure and as ardent as ever burned in the bosom of a Carthusian. In the wealth and glory which rewarded his forensic eminence she could see only allurements, to which (so she judged) his peace on earth, and his meetness for a holier state of being beyond the grave, must be sacrificed. She mourned over his fame, and prayed that her child might be abased, that so in due season he might be exalted. It happened that his aunt Madame D'Andilly, in the last awful scene of life, was attended by her kindred, and amongst the rest by Le Maitre. Her fading eye was fixed on the crucifix borne in the hand of St. Cyran, as she listened to his voice, now subdued to its gentlest accents, and breathing hope, and peace, and consolation. It was as though some good angel had overpassed the confines of the earthly and the heavenly worlds, to give utterance, in human language, to emotions sacred as his own high abode, and to thoughts as lofty as his own celestial nature. The great orator listened, and wondered, and wept. An eloquence such as even his fervent imagination had never before conceived, enthralled and subdued his inmost soul. It was but a soft whisper in the chamber of death; but in those gentle tones, and to that weeping company, were spoken words, compared with which his own eloquence appeared to him trivial, harsh, and dissonant as the howlings of the forest. And when his dying relative's last sigh was heard, accompanied by the solemn benediction, 'Depart, O Christian soul! from this world, in the name of the Almighty God who created you,' Le Maitre felt that the bonds which attached him to that world were for ever broken. He yielded himself to the spiritual guidance of St. Cyran; resigned his office and his calling; and plunged into a retreat, where in solitude, silence, and continued penances, he passed the remaining twenty-one years of his life. By the advice of his confessor, the execution of this design was postponed till the close of the annual session of the courts. In the interval he resumed his ordinary employments, but the spirit which till then had animated his efforts was gone. He became languid and unimpressive; and one of the judges was heard to mutter, that, after all, the real power of Le Maitre was that of persuading to sleep. This was too much even for a penitent. Fixing his eye on the critic, he once more summoned his dormant strength, and pouring forth all the energies of his soul in one last and most triumphant speech, he for ever quitted the scene of his forensic glories. At Port-Royal he appropriately charged himself with the care of the proprietary interests of the house. A village judge in the neighbourhood was once attended by the illustrious advocate, on a question of the purchase of some bullocks. Astounded by his eloquence, (so runs the story,) the judge fell on his knees before the pleader, professing his unworthiness to preside in his presence, and imploring that they might exchange places. A more likely tale records that the booksellers had got up, during Le Maitre's retreat, an edition of his speeches full of interpolations and errors. At 'the request of friends,' though not with the consent of his confessors, the orator undertook a corrected edition. His spiritual guides interfered. They prescribed, as a new species of penance, that he should silently acquiesce in this inroad on his fame as a speaker. The penitent submitted, but not so the booksellers. They (worldly men!) talked loudly of violated promises, and of sheets rendered useless. He listened to discourses on the duty of mortifying these last movements of vain glory. Under the excitement of the dispute, his health, already enfeebled by his mode of life, gave way. A fever decided the question against the publishers; and Le Maitre was doomed at length to die the victim of the brilliant career he had so long and resolutely abandoned.

His brother Mons. de Sericourt was another of the converts of St. Cyran. De Sericourt had served with distinction under Condé. He was taken prisoner at the siege of Philipsberg, and effected his escape by leaping from the walls of the fortress at the imminent hazard of his life. Under the deep impression, which this incident left on his mind, of the protecting care of Providence, he returned to Paris, where his first object was to visit his brother, the report of whose retreat from the bar had filled him with astonishment. He found him (the words are Fontaine's) in a kind of tomb, where he was buried alive; his manner bespeaking all the gloom of penitence. De Sericourt was shocked, and in vain endeavoured to recognise Le Maitre in the person who stood before him. Immediately changing his demeanour, Le Maitre embraced his brother with looks full of gayety and spirit, exclaiming, 'Behold the Le Maitre of former days! He is dead to the world, and now desires only to die to himself. I have spoken enough to men. Henceforth I wish to converse only with God. I have exerted myself in vain to plead the cause of others. Now I am to plead my own. Do you intend to pay me the same compliment which I receive from the world at large, who believe and publish that I have gone mad!' Nothing could be more remote from the judgment of the soldier. Instead of regarding his brother as mad, he aspired to share his solitude, and succeeded. Under the direction of St. Cyran, he joined in the silence and austerities of the advocate. During the war of the princes he once more took up arms for the defence of Port-Royal; but his monastic life was soon brought to a close. Philipsberg had in reality been attended with less danger. At the age of thirty-nine, he died, a premature victim to fastings, vigils, confinement, and probably to ennui. Recruits for Port-Royal were but seldom drawn from the armies of the Most Christian King, and could hardly have been draughted from a less promising quarter.

In this memorable brotherhood there was yet a third, Louis Isaac Le Maitre de Saci. At the early age of fourteen he was placed by his aunt, the Mere Angelique, under the guidance of St. Cyran. From that prophetic eye the future eminence of his pupil was not hidden. 'God will restore him to you, for his death would probably be the greatest loss which the church could sustain'—was the prediction with which St. Cyran at once disclosed his own hopes and allayed the fears of De Saci's mother, as he watched over the sick-bed of her child. To ensure the fulfilment of those hopes, the mind of the boy was sedulously trained. Absolute, unhesitating submission to human authority, as representing the divine, was the cardinal principle of his education. Though himself one of the most conspicuous teachers of his age as a guide to others, he, on no single question, presumed to guide himself. If no other director could have been had, he would have placed himself under the direction of his valet, was the praise with which his friends expressed their admiration of his illustrious docility. By the advice or commands of St. Cyran, he accordingly, like his brothers, became one of the recluses of Port-Royal; and, like them, transferred to the support of the monastery all his worldly wealth. With them also he surrendered himself up to penitence, to solitude, and to silence; and in their company supplied his emaciated frame with food which rather mocked than satisfied its wants. Le Maitre thus describes one of the petits soupers of Port-Royal:—'It is, you know, but a slight repast which they serve up for us in the evening; but it engages my brother De Saci as completely as the most sumptuous meal. For my own part, such is the warmth of my temperament, the end of my good cheer follows so hard on its beginning, that I can hardly tell which is which. When all is over with me, and I have nothing left to do but to wash my hands, I see my brother De Saci, as composed and as serious as ever, take up his quarter of an apple, peel it deliberately, cut it up with precision, and swallow it at leisure. Before he begins, I have more than half done. When his little all is over, he rises from table as light as when he sat down, leaving untouched the greater part of what was set before him, and walks off as seriously as a man who had been doing great things, and who never fasted except on fast-days.' Poor Le Maitre! the gay spirit which had animated the palace of justice had its transient flashes even in his 'living tomb;' though the smile was in this case lighted up at an absurdity which had well nigh conducted his brother to that tomb where all life is extinct. Under these solemn parodies on what usually goes on at the dinner table, De Saci pined away; and was rescued, not without extreme hazard, from the effects of his suicidal abstemiousness. He returned from the gates of death with a spirit unsubdued and undaunted; for it was animated by hopes, and sustained by convictions which gave to that last enemy the aspect and the welcome of a friend. Admitted, in reluctant obedience to his confessor, to ordination as a priest, he assumed the office of director to the recluses of either sex at Port-Royal. Nature struggled in the bosom of Le Maitre against laying bare all the secrets of his soul to the inspection of his younger brother. But authority prevailed. Their mother led the way, by placing herself under the direction of her son. Blaize Pascal himself meekly took the law of his conscience from the same revered lips. Days of persecution followed; and De Saci was driven from his retreat, and confined for more than two years in the Bastile. There was fulfilled the prediction of St. Cyran. Fontaine, the bosom friend of De Saci, was the associate of his prison hours. They were hours of suffering and of pain. But they had been ill exchanged for the brightest and the most joyous passed by the revellers in the gay city beneath them. In those hours, De Saci executed, and his friend transcribed, that translation of the Holy Scriptures which to this moment is regarded in France as the most perfect version in their own or in any other modern tongue. While yet under the charge of St. Cyran, the study of the divine oracles was the ceaseless task of De Saci. In mature life, it had been his continual delight; in the absence of every other solace, it possessed his mind with all the energy of a master passion. Of the ten thousand chords which there blend together in sacred harmony, there was not one which did not awaken a responsive note in the heart of the aged prisoner. In a critical knowledge of the sacred text, he may have had many superiors, but none in that exquisite sensibility to the grandeur, the pathos, the superhuman wisdom, and the awful purity of the divine original, without which none can truly apprehend, or accurately render into another idiom, the sense of the inspired writers. Even the habitual prostration of his judgment to a human authority, believed to be divine, aided him as a translator. It forbade, indeed, the correction of errors, but it imparted freedom and confidence to the expression of all that he acknowledged as truth. Protestants may with justice except to many a passage of De Saci's translation; but they will, we fear, search their own libraries in vain for any, where the author's unhesitating assurance of the real sense of controverted words permits his style to flow with a similar absence of constraint, and an equal warmth and glow of diction.

Fontaine, the humble companion of his biblical labours, had also been one of the penitents of De Saci. He was a man of learning, and his 'Memoires sur M. M. de Port-Royal,' bespeak a nature gentle, affectionate, and devout. But to saturate his memory with the discourse of minds more exalted than his own, and to minister to them in collating or transcribing the books on which they were employed, limited his humble desires. He was successively the amanuensis of De Saci, and the secretary of the 'great Arnauld.' With the exception of Pascal, a name so great does not appear among the disciples of St. Cyran, or the inmates of Port-Royal.

Antoine Arnauld was the youngest child of the parents of the Mere Angelique: he was consequently the uncle of Le Maitre, De Sericourt, and De Saci. From his earliest years the reputation of his genius and learning had rendered him the object of universal notice and expectation. Richelieu himself is recorded to have stolen silently into his chamber, to enjoy the unpremeditated conversation of the young student. The cardinal had no apparent reason to dread that in this case his advances would be repulsed; for Arnauld possessed several rich benefices, dressed in the fashion, and even kept a carriage. But repulsed they were, and by the influence of the man to whom similar allurements had been presented in vain. In his dungeon at Vincennes, St. Cyran received a visit from the young abbe. That almost magical influence was again exerted with irresistible power. Arnauld renounced his preferments, assumed the garb of penitence, and became the companion of his nephews, Le Maitre and Sericourt, in their austere retirement. This abandonment of the world was not, however, so absolute, but that he still sought the rank of a socius or fellow of the Sorbonne. By the authority of Richelieu, his claims were rejected. But not even the cardinal could obstruct the advancement of so eminent a scholar and divine to the dignity of a doctor in divinity. 'To defend the truth, if necessary, to the death,' was in those days one of the vows of such a graduate—vows, it is to be feared, light as air with most men, but, in this instance, engraven as with a pen of iron on the soul of the new professor of theology. A year had scarcely elapsed since he had received from the lips of his dying mother an adjuration to be faithful in the defence of truth at the expense, were it possible, of a thousand lives. Touched with the coincidence of his academical oath and of this maternal precept, he thenceforward existed but to combat for what he at least esteemed the truth; and endured poverty, exile, and reproach, as he would have cheerfully submitted to death, in that sacred warfare. In controversy he found his vocation, his triumph, and perhaps his delight. The author of more than a hundred volumes, he was engaged in almost as many contests. His great work, La Frequente Communion, is essentially controversial. He warred with the Jesuits as a body; and with several of their most eminent writers, as Sirmond, Nouet, and De Bonis, he carried on separate debates. Apologies for St. Cyran, Jansenius, and for the ladies of Port-Royal, flowed copiously from his ever ready pen. He assailed the metaphysical meditations of Des Cartes, and Malebranche's theory of Miracles. Even with his friend and associate, Nicole, he contended, on an attempt to apply certain geometrical principles to the solution of some problems in divinity. Claude, Maimbourg, and Annat, were among his adversaries. The mere list of his works occupies twenty-six closely printed octavo pages. A rapid analysis of them fills a large volume. If that compilation may be trusted, (he would be a bold man who should undertake to verify it,) the vast collection of books which bear the name of Antoine Arnauld scarcely contains a tract, except those on mathematics, in which he is not engaged in theological or scientific strife with some antagonist. In the catalogue, of course, appears the celebrated treaties De la Perpetuite de la Foi sur l'Eucharistie, a work rewarded with higher applause than any other of his avowed writings. Twenty-seven Bishops and twenty Doctors prefaced it with eulogies on the learning, piety, talents, and orthodoxy of the illustrious authors. He dedicated it to Clement IX., and was repaid with the most glowing compliments. Perhaps a still more gratifying tribute to his success was the conversion to the Roman Catholic faith of Turenne, of which this book was the occasion; and yet nothing is more certain than that the real author was not Arnauld, but Nicole. In the title-page of a book, designed to refute the formidable Claude, the two friends judged the name of a Doctor of the church would avail more than that of a simple tonsure—a literary and pious fraud, which it is impossible to excuse; and, on the side of Nicole, an example of zeal for a man's cause triumphing over his love of fame, to which it would not be easy to find a parallel. Such, however, was the height of Arnauld's reputation, and such the affluence of his mind, that it is scarcely reasonable to attribute this disengenuous proceeding to selfish motives. Few men have been more enamoured of the employments, or less covetous of the rewards, of a literary life. For nearly threescore years he lived pen in hand, except when engaged in devotion, or in celebrating the offices of the church of Port-Royal on occasions of peculiar dignity. His was one of those rare natures to which intellectual exertion brings relief rather than lassitude; thus giving to feebler understandings the assurance, that the living spirit which is in man, if disunited from the burdens of mortality, would be capable of efforts commensurate with an immortal existence.

His book, De la frequente Communion, was the commencement of the seventy years religious war which ended in the destruction of Port-Royal. To restore the severe maxims of Christian antiquity respecting the spiritual qualification of communicants, and thus to raise a standard of church membership incomparably more exalted than that which prevailed in his own generation, was the avowed object of Arnauld.

His scarcely concealed purpose was to chastise the lax morality to which the Jesuits had lent their sanction; and to repel their attacks on the more rigid system of St. Cyran. Revised in his prison by that father of the faithful, and sheltered by the commendation of divines of every rank and order, the book—forbearing in style, lofty in sentiment, replete with various learning, and breathing an eloquence at once animated by unhesitating faith, and chastened by the most profound humility—broke like a peal of thunder over the heads of his startled antagonists. Such was the fury of their resentment, that the Marshal de Vihé sagaciously observed, 'There must be some secret in all this. The Jesuits are 'never so excited when nothing but the glory of God is at stake.' Though at first struck down by the censures of a conclave of Bishops, with Mazarin at their head, Nouet, the great advocate of the society, returned again and again to the assault. Pulpits fulminated, presses groaned. On the one side, the Sorbonne invoked the aid of the civil power, then in feeble hands; on the other, the Jesuits appealed to the Papal See, then rising in new vigour from the disasters of the preceding century. Arnauld was cited by the Pope, and required by the Cardinal minister of France to appear in his own defence at Rome. Against this infringement of the Gallican liberties, the university, the Sorbonne, and the Parliament of Paris remonstrated, but Mazarin was inflexible.

The Holy See took cognizance of the cause, though the person of the accused was beyond their reach. In his absence, that infallible tribunal decided not to let the world know whether, of the thirty erroneous opinions imputed to Arnauld, twenty and nine were heretical or not. Arnauld himself, however, was unable to stand his ground. For twenty-five years together, he was compelled to live in a voluntary concealment; which his enemies had not the power, nor perhaps the wish, to violate. His retirement was passed in the monastery of Port-Royal, or in one of the adjacent hermitages.

That ancient seat of their order had now been long deserted by his sister Angelique and her associates. Their residence at Paris had not been unfruitful of events. They had exchanged the jurisdiction of the general of their order for that of the archbishop of Paris. On the resignation of Angelique, the abbatial dignity had been made elective in their house. An ineffectual scheme of devoting themselves to the perpetual adoration of the Holy Eucharist, had deeply exercised their thoughts. Occasional miracles had awakened or rewarded their piety. An inspired litany (so it is believed) had fallen insensibly from the pen of sister Agnes, which eight Doctors censured, St. Cyran vindicated, and the Pope suppressed. From his prison at Vincennes, their great apologist directed their consciences, and guided them to the office of educating children of their own sex—a wise and happy project, which brought back into the sphere of ordinary duties, minds soaring with indefinite aims into the regions of mysticism, and wasting, in efforts for an ideal perfection, talents eminently fitted to bless and to improve mankind. To restore the sisterhood to the quiet valley where their predecessors had worshipped, was the next care of St. Cyran. True it threatened their lives; but 'is it not,' he asked, 'as well to serve God in an hospital as in a church, if such be his pleasure?' 'Are any prayers more acceptable than those of the afflicted?' Angelique's heart had a ready answer to such questions from such an enquirer. In that sequestered church where angels, and a still more awful presence, had once dwelt, they could not but still abide, (such was his assurance,) and she returned to seek them there. She came attended by a large proportion of the ladies of Port-Royal, hailed by the poor and aged, whom in former times she had cherished, and welcomed by her kinsmen and the companions of their religious solitude. It was their first and only meeting. Les Granges (a farm-house on the hill-side) became the residence of the recluses, the gates of the monastery closing on the nuns. Bound by no monastic vows, the men addressed themselves to such employments as each was supposed best qualified to fill. Schools for the instruction of youth in every branch of literature and science were kept by Lancelot, Nicole, Fontaine, and De Saci. Some laboured at translations of the fathers, and other works of piety. Arnauld applied his ceaseless toils in logic, geometry, metaphysics, and theological debate. Physicians of high celebrity exercised their art in all the neighbouring villages. Le Maitre and other eminent lawyers addressed themselves to the work of arbitrating in all the dissensions of the vicinage. There were to be seen gentlemen working assiduously as vine-dressers; officers making shoes; noblemen sawing timber and repairing windows; a society held together by no vows; governed by no corporate laws; subject to no common superior; pursuing no joint designs, yet all living in unbroken harmony; all following their respective callings; silent, grave, abstracted, self-afflicted by fastings, watchings, and humiliations—a body of penitents on their painful progress through a world which they had resolved at once to serve and to avoid. From year to year, till death or persecution removed them from the valley of Port-Royal, the members of this singular association adhered pertinaciously to their design; nor among their annals will be found more, we think, than a single name on which rests the imputation of infidelity, or fickleness of purpose. To the nuns, indeed, no such change was possible. Like the inhabitants of Les Granges, they employed themselves in educating the children of the rich and the poor, in almsgiving, and in other works of mercy. Their renunciation of secular cares was combined (no common alliance) with an entire superiority to all secular interests. Angelique, now the elected abbess, and in that character the ruler of the temporalities of the convent, exhibited a princely spirit of munificence—nourished and sustained by the most severe and self-denying economy. She and her sisterhood reserved for themselves little more than a place in their own list of paupers. So firm was her reliance on the Divine bounty, and so abstemious her use of it, that she hazarded a long course of heroic improvidence, justified by the event and ennobled by the motive; but at once fitted and designed rather to excite the enthusiasm of ordinary mortals, than to afford a model for their imitation. Buildings were erected both at Port-Royal de Paris, and Port-Royal des Champs; in the serene majesty of which the worshipper might discern an appropriate vestibule to the temple made without hands, towards which his adoration was directed. Wealth was never permitted to introduce, nor poverty to exclude any candidate for admission as a novice or a pupil. On one occasion twenty thousand francs were given as a relief to a distressed community; on another, four times that sum were restored to a benefactress, whose heart repented a bounty which she had no longer the right to reclaim. Their regular expenditure exceeded by more than sevenfold their certain income; nor were they ever disappointed in their assurance, that the annual deficiency of more than forty thousand francs would be supplied by the benevolence of their fellow Christians. What was the constraining force of charity, Angelique had learned from the study of her own heart, and she relied with a well-founded confidence in the same generous impulse in the hearts of others. The grace, the gayety, and tenderness of her nature, which might have embellished courts and palaces, were drawn into continual exercise to mitigate the anguish of disease, to soothe the wretched, and to instruct the young. Her hands ministered day and night to the relief of those whose maladies were loathsome or contagious, and her voice allayed their terrors. With playful ingenuity she would teach her associates how to employ the vestments, the furniture, and, when other resources failed, even the sacred plate of the monastery, in clothing the naked, though it left themselves in want, and in feeding the hungry, though it deprived themselves of all present resources. While distributing not merely to the necessities of the indigent, but to the relief of persons of her own rank in life, there was in the bosom of Angelique a feeling which revolted, not against dependence on alms, for her vows of poverty required it, but against soliciting aid even from her nearest kindred;—a feeling condemned as human, perhaps, in her stern self-judgment, but assuredly one of those emotions which the best of our race are the last to relinquish. And if it be true, as true it surely is, that to the culture and exercise of the benevolent affections as an ultimate end, all other ends of human life—knowledge, practical skill, meditative power, self-control, and the rest—are but subservient means, who shall deny to such a course of life as that of the nuns of Port-Royal, the praise of wisdom, however ill he may judge of the wisdom which established and maintained conventical institutions? Some affections, indeed, they could not cultivate. Two of the deepest and the richest mines of their nature, maternal and conjugal love, lay unwrought and unexplored. Yet they lived, as wisdom we are told ought to live, with children round their knees; training them for every office in life, if not with a mother's yearnings, with perhaps something more than a mother's prudence. Over this singular theocracy, male and female, presided St. Cyran, exercising from his dungeon a supreme authority; and under him ruled Antoine Singlin, the general confessor both of the recluses and the nuns. In the conduct of souls, (such is the appropriate style,) Singlin was supposed to excel all the professors of that most critical science. Pascal, De Saci, and Arnauld sat at his feet with childlike docility. Ministers of state, advocates, and bishops, crowded reverently round his pulpit; yet by the confession, or rather the boast, of his disciples, he was distinguished neither by learning, talents, nor eloquence. The mystery of his absolute dominion over intellects so incomparably superior to his own, is partly, at least, dispelled by what remains of his writings. They indicate a mind at once discriminating and devout, conversant alike with human nature and with the Divine, exerting all its powers to penetrate the labyrinth of man's heart, and recruiting these powers by habitual communion with the source of wisdom.

Guided by such pastors, the Port-Royalists were following out a progress more tranquil than that of John Bunyan's Pilgrim, when the wars of the Fronde rudely scattered the shepherd and the flock. Most of the nuns fled for refuge to Paris, but the recluses (they were Frenchmen still) appeared three hundred strong, in defence of their sequestered valley. Above their hair-shirts glittered coats-of-mail. As the last notes of the anthem died away, the trumpet summoned the worshippers to military exercises. Spears and helmets flashed through the woods—plumes waved over many a furrowed brow—intrenchments, which may still be traced, were thrown up; and the evening-gun, the watch-word, and the heavy tread of cavalry, broke a silence till then undisturbed, except by the monastic choir, or the half-uttered prayer of some lonely penitent. De Sericourt felt once again his pulse beat high as he drew out the martial column, and raised the long-forgotten words of peremptory command. But ere-long a voice more subdued, though not less peremptory, was heard to silence his. De Saci's heart mourned over this reliance on an arm of flesh. Watching the first pause in the new enthusiasm of his associates, he implored them to lay aside their weapons; and in long-suffering to submit themselves and their cause to the Supreme Disposer of events. At an instant the whole aspect of Port-Royal was changed. Students returned to their books, penitents to their cells, and handicraftsmen to their ordinary labours. It was a change as sudden and as complete as when, at the bidding of the Genius, the crowded bridge and the rushing river disappeared from the eyes of Mirza, leaving before him nothing but the long hollow Valley of Bagdad, with oxen, sheep, and camels grazing on the sides of it.

To one inmate of Port-Royal the terrors of an impending war had brought no disquietude. Angelique remained there, the guardian angel of the place. Hundreds of ruined peasants were daily fed by her bounty. 'Perhaps I shall not be able' (the quotation is from one of her letters written at the time) 'to send you a letter to-morrow, for all our horses and asses are dead with hunger. Oh! how little do princes know the detailed horrors of war. All the provender of the beasts we have been obliged to divide between ourselves and the starving poor. We have concealed as many of the peasants and of their cattle as we could, in our monastery, to save them from being murdered and losing all their substance. Our dormitory, and the chapter-house are full of horses;—we are almost stifled by being pent up with these beasts, but we could not resist the piercing lamentations of the starving and heart-broken poor. In the cellar we have concealed forty cows. Our court-yards and out-houses are stuffed full of fowls, turkeys, ducks, geese, and asses. The church is piled up to the ceiling with corn, oats, beans, and peas, and with caldrons, kettles, and other things belonging to the cottagers. Our laundry is filled by the aged, the blind, the maimed, the halt, and infants. The infirmary is full of sick and wounded. We have torn up all our rags and linen clothing to dress their sores; we have no more, and are now at our wits' end. We dare not go into the fields for any more, as they are full of marauding parties. We hear that the abbey of St. Cyran has been burned and pillaged. Our own is threatened with an attack every day. The cold weather alone preserves us from pestilence. We are so closely crowded, that deaths happen continually. God, however, is with us, and we are at peace.'

That inward peace which Angelique was thus enabled to maintain during the horrors of civil war, was soon to be exposed to a more arduous trial. To the baffled antagonists of Arnauld, Port-Royal was an abomination. There dwelt in safety their intended victim, plying his dreaded pen, surrounded by his kindred, his scholars, and his allies; and all engaged in the same contest with the casuistry, the theology, and the morals of the society of Jesus. Against these devoted enemies one Brisacier, a Jesuit, led the assault. His articles of impeachment bore that they despised the Eucharist, that they had neither holy water or images in their churches, and that they prayed neither to the Virgin nor the Saints. Vain the clearest refutation of calumnies so shocking to Catholic ears, and vain the archiepiscopal thunders which rebuked the slanderer. Father Megnier, of the same holy company, denounced to the astonished world a secret conspiracy against the religion of Christ, the leaders of which were the Abbot of St. Cyran and Antoine Arnauld—the Voltaire and the Diderot of their age. But human credulity has its limits, and Megnier had overstepped them. For a moment the assailants paused; but at last, the womb of time, fertile in prodigies, gave birth to the far-famed 'five propositions' of Father Coruet—a palpable obscure, lying in the dim regions of psychological divinity, and doomed for successive generations to perplex, to exasperate, and to overwhelm with persecution, or with ridicule, no inconsiderable part of the Christian world. That these five dogmas on the mystery of the divine grace, were to be found within the Augustinus of Jansenius, was not the original charge. They were at first denounced by Coruet as opinions drawn from the work of the Bishop of Ypres, by Arnauld and other Doctors of the Gallican Church, and by them inculcated on their own disciples. Innocent the Tenth condemned the propositions as heretical; and to the authority of the Holy See, Arnauld and his friends implicitly bowed. In a woodcut prefixed to this papal constitution by the triumphant Jesuits, Jansenius appeared in his episcopal dress, but accoutred with the aspect, the wings, and the other well-known appendages of an evil spirit, around whom were playing the lightnings of the Vatican. The man and the heresy thus happily disposed of, a single question remained,—Were the peccant propositions to be found in the Augustinus? Arnauld declared that he had studied the book from end to end, and could not find them there. That there they were nevertheless to be found, the Jesuits as strongly asserted. To have quoted by chapter and page the offensive passages, would have spoiled the most promising quarrel which had arisen in the Church since the close of the Tridentine Council. Still-born must then have perished the ever-memorable distinction of the droit and the fait—the droit being the justice of the papal censure, which all Catholics admitted—the fait being the existence, in the Augustinus, of the censured propositions, which all Jansenists denied. The vulgar mode of trial by quotation, being discarded, nothing remained but trial by authority. Annat, the King's Confessor, a Jesuit in religion, and Mazarin, the King's Minister, a Jesuit in politics, each, from different motives, found his account in humiliating the Port-Royalists. Selected by them, a conclave of Parisian Doctors decreed that the five propositions were in the book, and should be in the book. A papal bull affirmed their sentence, and then a second conclave required all the ecclesiastics, and all the religious communities of France, to subscribe their assent to the order which had thus affiliated these bastard opinions on poor Jansenius. That such a defender of the faith as Antoine Arnauld, should receive their mandate in silence, the authors of it neither wished nor expected. In words exactly transcribed, though not avowedly quoted, from Chrysostom and Augustine, he drew up his own creed on the questions of grace and free-will; and in good round terms acquitted the Bishop of Ypres of having written more or less. A third conclave censured the apologist, unconscious apparently that their fulminations would reach the holy fathers of Constantinople and Hippo. They at least reached the object at which they in reality aimed. 'Could the most Christian King permit that penitent recluses and young children should any longer assemble for instruction, under the influence of a man convicted of heresy on the subject of efficacious grace, and unable or unwilling to find in the Augustinus what the Pope himself had said might be found there?' Anne of Austria listened, Mazarin whispered, and she obeyed. Armed with her authority, her lieutenants appeared at Port-Royal to restore Les Granges and the forests around it to their ancient solitude; and then had for ever fallen the glories of that sacred valley, but for an incident so strange and opportune, as to force back the memory to the precipitate descent from Mount Ida of the Homeric Deities, to rescue, in the agony of his fate, some panting hero on the field of Troy.

Mademoiselle Perrier was the niece of Blaize Pascal. She was a child in her eleventh year, and a scholar residing in the monastery of Port-Royal. For three years and a half she had been afflicted with a fistula lacrymalis. The adjacent bones had become carious, and the most loathsome ulcers disfigured her countenance. All remedies had been tried in vain; the medical faculty had exhausted their resources. One desperate experiment remained—it was the actual cautery. For this the day was appointed, and her father had set out on a journey to be present at the operation. Now it came to pass that M. de la Potherie, who was at once a Parisian ecclesiastic, a great-uncle of Angelique and of Arnauld, and an assiduous collector of relics, had possessed himself of one of the thorns composing the crown of which we read in the Evangelists. Great had been the curiosity of the various convents to see it, and the ladies of Port-Royal had earnestly solicited that privilege. Accordingly, on the 24th of March, in the year 1656, the day of the week being Friday, and the week the third in Lent, a solemn procession of nuns, novices, and scholars, moved along the choir of the monastic church, chaunting appropriate hymns, and each one, in her turn, kissing the holy relic. When the turn of Mademoiselle Perrier arrived, she, by the advice of the school-mistress, touched her diseased eye with the thorn, not doubting that it would effect a cure. She regained her room, and the malady was gone! The cure was instantaneous and complete. So strict, however, was the silence of the abbey, especially in Lent, that, except to the companion who shared her chamber, Mademoiselle Perrier did not at first divulge the miracle. On the following day the surgeon appeared with his instruments. The afflicted father was present; exhortations to patience were delivered; every preparation was complete, when the astonished operator for the first time perceived that every symptom of the disease had disappeared. All Paris rang with the story. It reached the ear of the queen-mother. By her command, M. Felix, the principal surgeon to the king, investigated and confirmed the narrative. The royal conscience was touched. Who but must be moved with such an attestation from on high, of the innocence of a monastery divinely selected as the theatre of so great a miracle! Anne of Austria recalled her lieutenant. Again the recluses returned to their hermitages; the busy hum of schoolboys was heard once more at Port-Royal; and in his ancient retreat Arnauld was permitted to resume his unremitting labours.

Time must be at some discount with any man who should employ it in adjusting the 'balance of improbabilities' in such a case as this. But there is one indisputable marvel connected with it. The greatest genius, the most profound scholar, and the most eminent advocate of that age, all possessing the most ample means of knowledge, all carefully investigated, all admitted, and all defended with their pens, the miracle of the Holy Thorn. Europe at that time produced no three men more profoundly conversant with the laws of the material world, with the laws of the human mind, and with the municipal law, than Pascal, Arnauld, and Le Maitre; and they were all sincere and earnest believers. Yet our Protestant incredulity utterly rejects both the tale itself and the inferences drawn from it, and but for such mighty names, might yield to the temptation of regarding it as too contemptible for serious notice.—Why is this?—a question which volumes might be well employed to answer. In this place, a passing notice is all that can be given to it.

Antecedently to their investigation of the evidence, Pascal, Arnauld, and Le Maitre, may be supposed to have reduced their reasonings on the subject to the following syllogism:—The true Church is distinguished from all others by the perennial possession of miraculous gifts: but the Church of Rome is the true church. Therefore, when a miracle is alleged to have happened within her fold, the presumption is not against, but in favour of the truth of the statement; and therefore, aided by that presumption, credit is due in such a case to testimony which would be insufficient to substantiate the fact under any other circumstance. Negamus majorem. It is not in the spirit of paradox, far less in that of irreverence or levity, that we would maintain the reverse—namely, that a church, really distinguished by the permanent exercise of miraculous powers, would presumably be not a true church, but a false.

Probability is the expectation of the recurrence of usual sequences. Certainty is the expectation of the recurrence of sequences believed to be invariable. The disappointment of such an expectation may be the disclosure of some uniform sequence hitherto unknown; that is, of one of the laws of nature, or it may be a miracle—that is the disturbance of those laws by some power capable of controlling them.—He who alleges a miracle, alleges the existence of natural laws; for there can be no exception where there is no rule. Now, to ascribe the laws of nature to any power but that of God is atheism. To ascribe a habitual infringement of these laws to powers at once subordinate and opposed to the divine, is consistent alike with piety and with reason. The analogies of natural and revealed religion not only permit, but require, us thus to judge. For example; the moral law of God is love. That law is habitually infringed by human selfishness. Submission to the legitimate exercise of legitimate authority, is a law from Heaven. That law is habitually infringed by human self-will. That within the range of his powers of action, man should be a free agent, is the divine law. That law, as we learn from the Gospels, was habitually infringed in the case of demoniacs. That the blood of the dead should corrupt and not liquefy; that houses should be built and not fly; that diseases should be cured by therapeutics, or not at all, are all physical laws of nature—that is, of God. Those physical laws, we are told, are habitually infringed within the fold of the Roman Catholic Church. Be it so. But if so, what is the inference? That the Roman Catholic Church is the depository of divine truth, and the special object of divine favour?—We wot not. Where such truth resides, and such favour rests, there will be a harmony, not elsewhere to be found, with the general laws of the divine economy, and the general principles of the divine government. The law is higher than the anomaly. The rule is more worthy than the exception. That conformity to the eternal ordinances of Heaven, whether psychological or physical, should indicate the possession of truth and holiness in a church, is intelligible. That a systematic counteraction of any such ordinances should indicate the same, is not intelligible. If in any society any law of the divine government is habitually reversed, the inference would seem to be, that such a society is subject to the control of some power opposed to the divine. Will it be answered that every disturbance of the laws of God must proceed from the author of those laws, and attest his agency and approbation? Why so? His moral laws are violated every instant by rebel man, why not his physical laws by rebel angels? Moses and Paul, and that divine teacher to whom Pascal, Arnauld, and Le Maitre bowed their hearts, and desired to bow their understandings, all assure us that this is no impossible supposition. Or will it be answered that such reasonings impugn the miracles of Christ himself? If so, we at least abandon them as fallacious; for, sooner should our right hand forget its cunning, than be employed to write one word having that tendency. But the cases are utterly dissimilar. Assume the reality both of the series of miracles recorded in the gospels, and of the perennial series of miracles recorded in the Roman Catholic legends, and it is perfectly consistent to discern in the one the seal of truth, and in the other the impress of error. Our Redeemer's miracles blend in perfect harmony, though not in absolute unison, with those laws, physical and moral, which he established in the creation, and fulfilled in the redemption of the world. In their occasion—in their object—in their fulfilment of prophecy—in their attendant doctrine—and in their exceptional character, they are essentially distinguished from the perennial miracles of Rome. These are in absolute discord with the laws which the miracles of Christ fulfil. If compelled to believe them true, we should not be compelled to refer them to a divine original. But that the truth of such stories as that of the Holy Thorn should ever have commanded the assent of such men as Pascal, Arnauld, and Le Maitre, is, after all, a standing wonder, and can be accounted for only by remembering that they assumed as inevitable, and hailed as invaluable, an inference which, as it seems to us, is not to be drawn from the premises, even if established.

Judge as we may of the miraculous attestation to the innocence of Port-Royal, which commanded the assent of Pascal, sentence is irreversibly passed by mankind on the prodigies wrought, at the same time and in the same cause, by the pen of that wonder-working controversialist. In the whole compass of literature, ancient and modern, there is probably nothing in the same style which could bear a comparison with the 'Provincial Letters.' Their peculiar excellence can be illustrated only by the force of contrast; and, in that sense, the 'Letters of Junius' may afford the illustration. To either series of anonymous satires must be ascribed the praise of exquisite address, and of irresistible vigour. Each attained an immediate and a lasting popularity; and each has exercised a powerful influence on the literature of succeeding times. But here all resemblance ends. No writer ever earned so much fame as Junius, with so little claim to the respect or gratitude of his readers. He embraced no large principles; he awakened no generous feelings; he scarcely advocated any great social interest. He gives equally little proof of the love of man, and of the love of books. He contributed nothing to the increase of knowledge, and but seldom ministered to blameless delight. His topics and his thoughts were all of the passing day. His invective is merciless and extravagant; and the veil of public spirit is barely thrown over his personal antipathies and inordinate self-esteem. No man was ever so greatly indebted to mere style; yet, with all its recommendations, his is a style eminently vicious. It is laboured, pompous, antithetical—never self-forgetful, never flowing freely, never in repose. The admiration he extorts is yielded grudgingly; nor is there any book so universally read which might become extinct with so little loss to the world as 'The Letters of Junius.' Reverse all this, and you have the characteristics of the 'Provincial Letters.' Their language is but the transparent, elastic, unobtrusive medium of thought. It moves with such quiet gracefulness as entirely to escape attention, until the matchless perspicacity of discussions, so incomprehensible under any management but his, forces on the mind an enquiry into the causes of so welcome a phenomenon. Pascal's wit, even when most formidable, is so tempered by kindness, as to show that the infliction of pain, however salutary, was a reluctant tribute to his supreme love of truth. His playfulness is like the laugh of childhood—the buoyancy of a heart which has no burden to throw off, and is gay without an effort. His indignation is never morose, vindictive, or supercilious: it is but philanthropy kindling into righteous anger and generous resentment, and imparting to them a tone of awful majesty. The unostentatious master of all learning, he finds recreation in toils which would paralyse an ordinary understanding; yet so sublimated is that learning with the spirit of philosophy, as to make him heedless of whatever is trivial, transient, and minute, except as it suggests or leads to what is comprehensive and eternal. But the canons of mere literary criticism were never designed to measure that which constitutes the peculiar greatness of the author of the 'Provincial Letters.' His own claim was to be tried by his peers—by those who, in common with him, possess a mental vision purified by contemplating that light in which is no darkness at all, and affections enlarged by a benevolence which, having its springs in heaven, has no limits to its diffusion on earth. Among his ascetic brethren in the valley of Port-Royal, he himself recognised the meet, if not the impartial judges of his labours. They hailed with transport an ally who, to their own sanctity of manners, and to more than their own genius, added popular arts to which they could make no pretension. Perhaps they were taught by the excellent M. Singlin to regard and censure such exultation as merely human. That great spiritual anatomist probably rebuked and punished the glee which could not but agitate the innermost folds of Arnauld's heart, as he read his apologists exquisite analysis of the Pouvoir Prochain, and of the Graces Suffisantes qui ne sont pas efficaces. For history records the misgivings of Mademoiselle Pascal, how far M. Singlin would put up with the indomitable gayety which would still chequer with some gleams of mirth her brother's cell at Les Granges, even after his preternatural ingenuity had been exhausted in rendering it the most desolate and cheerless of human abodes.

Whatever may have been his treatment of his illustrious penitents, the good man was not long permitted to guide them through their weary pilgrimage. The respite obtained for Port-Royal by the Holy Thorn and the 'Provincial Letters,' expired with the death of Mazarin and with the authority of the Queen-mother. Louis began, as he believed, to act for himself—a vain attempt for a man who could never think for himself. The genius, such as it was, of the dead minister, had still the mastery over the inferior mind of the surviving monarch. Louis had been taught by the Cardinal to fear and to hate De Retz, Jansenism, and Port-Royal. Poor Singlin was therefore driven away, and in due time consigned to the Bastille. At the bidding of the King, a synod of the clergy of France drew up an anti-Jansenist test, to be taken by all ecclesiastics, and by all religious communities, male and female; fortified, of course, by effective penalties. They were all required to subscribe their names to a declaration that the 'five propositions,' in their heretical sense, were to be found in the Augustinus, with no exception in favour of those who had never seen the book, or of those who could not read Latin. Nor was this an ineffectual menace. Blow after blow fell on those who refused, and even on those who were expected to refuse, thus to condemn the Bishop of Ypres. Port-Royal was foremost among such obdurate recusants. Their schools, male and female, were dispersed. Arnauld and the other recluses were banished from the valley. The admission of novices and postulantes was interdicted to the abbess; and her ancient monastery was threatened with suppression as contumacious and heretical.

Angelique Arnauld was now sinking under the pressure of infirmity and of old age. Half a century had elapsed since the commencement of her reforms, and her tale of threescore years and ten had been fully told; but ere she yielded her soul to him who gave it, she rose from her dying bed to make one more effort for the preservation of the house, so long devoted, under her guidance, to works of mercy and to exercises of penitence and prayer. Surrounded by a throng of weeping children, and by her elder associates maintaining their wonted composure, she, for the last time, quitted Port-Royal des Champs, giving and receiving benedictions, and went to die at the convent of Port-Royal de Paris. She found the gates guarded, and the court-yards filled by a troop of archers, the executioners of the royal mandate for expelling the scholars, novices, postulantes, and other unprofessed inmates of the house. During eight successive days, one after another of these helpless women was torn from the place around which their affections had twined; and from the arms of the dying mother, whom they loved with the tenderness of children, and regarded with more than filial reverence. Seventy-five persons were thus successively separated from her, as from hour to hour she descended to the tomb, under bodily and mental sufferings described with fearful minuteness in the obituaries of Port-Royal. 'At length our good Lord has seen fit to deprive us of all. Fathers, sisters, disciples, children—all are gone. Blessed be the name of the Lord.' Such was her announcement to Madame de Sevigné of the emptying of this first vial of kingly wrath. To the Queen-mother, she addressed herself in a loftier, though not in a less gentle tone. At each momentary remission of her agonies, she dictated to Anne of Austria a letter, long and justly celebrated as a model of epistolary eloquence. It has no trace of debility, still less of resentment. Her defence is as clear and as collected, as though, in the fulness of health, she had been conducting the cause of another. Without a reproach or a murmur, she exposes the wrongs of her sisterhood, and the error of her persecutors. For herself she asks no sympathy; but, from the verge of the world she had so long renounced, and was now about to quit for ever, she invokes from the depositories of worldly power, the justice they owed to man, and the submission due to the ordinances of heaven. 'Now, my earthly business is done!' was her grateful exclamation as this letter was closed; and then commenced a mental and bodily strife, recorded, perhaps, but too faithfully by her biographers. These pages, at least, are no fit place for the delineation of a scene over which the sternest spectator must have wept, and the most hardened must have prayed fervently for the sufferer and for himself. From the dark close of a life so holy and so blameless, and from the hope, and peace, and joy, which at length cast over her departing spirit some radiance from that better state on the confines of which she stood, lessons may be drawn which we have no commission to teach, and which are perhaps best learned without the intervention of any human teacher. Yet, even in Port-Royal itself, there were not wanting some to whom this admonition of the vanity of human things was addressed in vain.

Among that venerable society, the Sœur Flavie Passart was unrivalled in the severity of her self-discipline, and the spendour of her superhuman gifts. As often as illness confined her to her bed, so often did a miracle restore her. The dead returned to her with messages from the other world. No saint in the calendar withheld his powerful influence in the court of heaven when she invoked it. Like many wiser folks, Sœur Flavie discovered at last, and doubtless to her own surprise, that she had become (there are none but masculine terms to express it) a liar and a knave. The same discovery was opportunely made by her associates, and arrested her progress to the elective dignities of the abbey. A penitent confession of her Jansenist errors, a denunciation of the more eminent ladies of Port-Royal as her seducers, and a retraction of her heretical belief in the innocence of Jansenius, might, however, still pave her way to the abbatial throne. So judged the Sœur Flavie, and so decided M. Perifixe, the then archbishop of Paris. She merely asked the imprisonment of twenty-six of her rivals. He cheerfully accorded so reasonable a boon. Repairing in pontifical state to the Parisian monastery, he again tendered the anti-Jansenist test. Angelique was gone; but her spirit and her constancy survived. The simple-hearted nuns thought that it would be a mere falsehood to attest the existence of 'five propositions' in a book which they had never seen, and could not read; and truth, they knew, was the command of God, let Pope, Cardinal, or Archbishop, say what they would to the contrary. Perifixe interdicted their admission to the holy sacrament. 'Well, my lord,' they replied, 'there is in heaven a Judge who reads the heart, and to him we commend our cause.' 'Ay, ay,' rejoined the exemplary prelate, 'when we get to heaven it will be time enough to consider that, and see how things go there.'

Eight days elapsed; and still no change of purpose, no subscription to the test. Preceded by his crosier, the mitre on his brows, his train borne by ecclesiastics, and followed by a long line of archers, the Archbishop reappeared. Much he discoursed respecting his own mildness, and much of the obduracy of the nuns. In proof of both, twenty-three of their number were conveyed to separate places of confinement. But the fruits of her treachery were not reaped by the Sœur Flavie. By the influence of the Archbishop, the Sœur Dorothée Perdreau was elected abbess. That lady established her residence at Paris; she effected a final separation of the two monasteries; and gave entertainments at the Parisian convent which might vie with the most brilliant of any which formed the boast of the neighbouring hotels. For ten months her exiled sisters remained in prison. Perifixe then ordered their return to Port-Royal des Champs, there to be excluded from the sacraments of the church, and to die unanointed and unannealed. The recluses of the valley were to be seen there no more. They lived in hiding-places, or pined away in dungeons. Singlin died of extremity of suffering in the Bastille. It must be admitted that if the existence of the 'five propositions' in the Augustinus was not verified by the attestation of a score or two of old ladies, Louis and his clergy have not to bear the responsibility of so great a misfortune to the church.

Twelve years before, the miracle of the Holy Thorn and the genius of Pascal had rescued Port-Royal from impending destruction. A person scarcely less unlike the common herd of mortals than the author of the 'Provincial Letters,' and whose elevation had been owing to events which some may think more miraculous than the cure of Pascal's niece, now interposed in their behalf, and with not inferior success.

Anne Genevieve de Bourbon was born in the year 1619, in the castle of Vincennes, where her father, Henry, Prince of Orleans, was then confined. The misfortunes of her family, and especially the execution of the Constable Montmorency, her maternal uncle, had predisposed in early youth, to serious thought, a mind distinguished to the last by an insatiable craving for strong emotions. To renounce the world, and to take the veil among the sisterhood of Carmelites of the Faubourg St. Jaques, were the earliest of the projects she had formed to baffle the foul fiend ennui. A counter-project, devised by her mother, was, that the young princess should present herself at a court ball. Maternal authority, perhaps inclination, on the one side, and conscientious scruples on the other, balanced and distressed the spirit of the high-born maiden. She betook herself for guidance to the Faubourg St. Jaques. A council on the arduous question was held with all the forms, conventual and theatrical, which the statutes of the order and the fancy of the nuns required or suggested. As presidents, sat two of their number, one impersonating the grace of Penitence, the other the virtue of Discretion. From the judgment-seat so occupied, went forth the sentence that Anne Genevieve de Bourbon should attend the ball, and should surrender herself 'de bonne foi' to all the dress and ornaments prepared for her; but that in immediate contact with her person she should be armed with the penitential girdle, commonly called a cilice. Above the talisman which thus encircled that young and lovely form, glowed the bright panoply of the marchande des modes. Beneath it throbbed a heart responsive in every pulse to the new intoxication. Penitence and Discretion took their flight, no more to return, till after the lapse of many a chequered year, the cilice was again bound over a heart, then, alas! aching with remorse, and bowed down with the contrite retrospect of many a crime and many a folly. At the Hotel de Rambouillet, she was initiated, with her brother, afterwards 'the great Condé,' into the Parisian mystery of throwing over the cold hard lineaments of downright selfishness, the fine woven draperies of polite literature, of sentimentality, and of taste. She had scarcely read any books; but she could discourse eloquently on all. Mistress of the histrionic art, all words fell bewitchingly from a voice with which every look, and gesture, and attitude, combined in graceful harmony. De Retz notices the exquisite effect of the sudden bursts of gayety which would at times dispel her habitual, but not inexpressive languor. Sarazin and Voiture were proud to receive their laurels from her hand, or to beg them at her feet. Statesmen and generals sought, or seemed to seek, her counsels. Even her mitred correspondents infused into their pastoral admonitions a delicacy and a glow of language, which reveal alike her skill to fascinate, and their desire to please.

Vows of celibacy no longer promised an escape from lassitude. At the age of twenty-three, she gave her hand to Henry D'Orleans, Duc de Longueville, who had already numbered forty-seven years. The Duke repaired as plenipotentiary to the conferences at Munster. The Duchess remained at Paris, the idol of the court. Unexplored, at least by us, be the scandalous chronicle of a scandalous age.—She rejoined him in time to shelter, if not entirely to save her reputation. As she floated down the Meuse in a royal progress, (for such it really was,) the sister of Condé was received with more than royal honours. Troops lined the banks; fortresses poured forth their garrisons to welcome her approach; the keys of Namur, then held by Spain, were laid at her feet; complimentary harangues hailed her arrival at Liege, Maestricht, and Ruremonde; and amidst the roar of cannon, and the acclamations of ten thousand voices, the triumphant beauty was restored to the arms of her husband. At Munster she exhibited the state and splendour of a crowned head. But her heart was depressed by ennui, if not agitated by more guilty emotions. Tours were undertaken, palaces built, wars of etiquette successfully waged with rival princesses; diplomatic intrigues twisted and untwisted; but gloom still settled in the spirits of her to whose diversion all other minds were ministering. She returned to Paris. Condé had exalted the glories of her house. Mazarin got up an Italian opera for her amusement. Benserade and Voiture referred to her award the question then agitating the whole Parisian world, of the comparative excellence of their rival sonnets. She became a mother. On every side the tedium of existence was assailed by new excitements; but melancholy still brooded over her. Relief was however at hand. The dissensions, the wars, the intrigues of the Fronde, filled the void which nothing else could fill. Her share in that mad revel is known to all the readers of De Retz, La Rochefoucalt, De Monspensier, and De Motteville. Her younger brother, the Prince de Conti, was but a puppet in her hands. With Condé, she quarrelled one day, and made it up the next. De Retz was alternately her ruler and her dupe. Marsaillac alone acquired a lasting influence over her mind. He flattered, amused, animated, and governed her, to whose government alone the factious and the frivolous were alike willing to bow. With her infant in her arms, she appeared on the balcony, at the Hotel de Ville, 'beautiful,' says De Retz, 'with her dress apparently, but not really, neglected, while at the Grève, from the pavement to the tiles, was a countless multitude of men shouting with transport, and women shedding tears of tenderness.' Never did mob-idolatry assume a more bewitching aspect. Hushed into affectionate silence were the harsh voices of the many-headed monster, as the peerless dame gave birth to 'Charles Paris,' her second son. Crowded even was that sick chamber with black-robed councillors, and plumed officers, soliciting her commands for the defence of the blockaded capital. Peace came, and she met almost on equal terms the haughty widow and mother of the kings of France. For her brother and her husband, she demanded and obtained the government of provinces; for herself, a state ball at the Hotel de Ville, with the presence of the queen mother to grace her triumph; for Marsaillac the entrée at the Louvre in his carriage; for his wife a tabouret. There are limits to human endurance. Against the entrée and the tabouret the whole nobility of France awoke in generous resentment. Astræa once more took her flight. Condé, Conti, and poor De Longueville himself, were conducted to Vincennes; our heroine fled to Normandy. Besieged in the castle of Dieppe, she escaped on foot, and, after a march of some leagues along the coast, reached a fishing boat, which lay at anchor there, awaiting her arrival. A storm was raging; but, in defiance of all remonstrances, she resolved to embark. In an instant she was struggling for life in the water. Rescued with difficulty, but nothing daunted, she mounted behind a horseman, and for fifteen days evaded the pursuit of her enemies, in mean and desolate hiding places.—At length, reaching Havre, an English vessel conveyed her to Rotterdam. From that disastrous eclipse she emerged with undiminished splendour. From Stenay, Turenne advanced to meet her at the head of all his forces. She became a party with him to the convention by which the King of Spain bound himself to maintain the war with France till the liberation of the three captive princes; and sixty thousand crowns were promised for the support of the table and equipages of Turenne and the Princesse de Longueville. That more tender bonds than those of war and treason did not unite them, is ascribed by her biographers to her preference for one La Moussaye, the commandant of Stenay. There she braved the denunciations of her sovereign, opposing one manifesto to another, and adding to her other glories the praise of diplomatic eloquence. Again the centre of all intrigue, the delirium, whether ambitious or voluptuous, of her heart, yielded for a while (and where beats the heart which is not enigmatical?) to remembrances, at once bitter and soothing, of the Carmelites of St. Jaques, with whom, in days of youth and innocency, she had joined in far different aspirations. But in the phantasmagoria at Paris, the scenes are again shifted. The Parliaments remonstrate, the Princes are enlarged, the Cardinal exiled, and a royal declaration attests the innocence of Mademoiselle de Longueville, 'Vous n'etes plus criminelle si ce n'est de lèse amours,' was the greeting on this occasion of her favourite Sarazin. She rewarded the poet with an embassy to the Spanish government; for the Duchess had now undertaken a negotiation for peace between the two crowns. Her second triumph, however, was still incomplete. She returned in all the pomp of a conqueror to Paris, and once more met on equal terms the majesty of France.

It may reasonably be doubted whether there exists at this day one human being who has found leisure and inclination to study, with exact attention, the history of the wars of the 'Fronde.' But that they disturbed the peace, and postponed the rising greatness of a mighty nation, they would have as little to commend them to serious regard, as the cabals one may suppose to distract the fair council presiding over the internal economy of Almacks. To assert, during the weakness of a long minority, some popular rights not otherwise to be maintained, and to restore the greater nobility to the powers of which Richelieu had dispossessed them, were indeed motives which gave some show of dignity to the first movements of the Frondeurs; but meaner passions, more frivolous questions, interests more nakedly selfish, or in themselves more contemptible, never before or since roused a people to war, or formed a pretext for rebellion. Cardinals, Judges, Monarchs, Princesses, Courtiers, and Generals, whirl before the eye in that giddy maze—intriguing, lying, jesting, imprisoning, and killing, as though Bacchus, Momus, and Moloch, had for a while usurped a joint and absolute dominion over the distracted land. Among the figurantes in this dance of death, none is more conspicuous than the Duchess de Longueville. In the third and last of those preposterous wars, the royal authority triumphed, and her star declined; but it now set to rise again in a new and far purer radiance. Like the wisest of the sons of men, she had applied her heart to see if there was any good thing under the sun; and, like him, she returned with a spirit oppressed by the hopeless pursuit, and proclaiming that all is vanity. 'I have no wish so ardent' (such is her confession to the Prioress of the Carmelites) 'as to see this war at an end, that, for the rest of my days, I may dwell with you, and apart from all the world besides. Till peace is concluded, I may not do so. My life seems to have been given me but to prove how bitter and how oppressive are the sorrows of this mortal existence. My attachments to it are broken, or rather crushed. Write to me often, and confirm the loathing I feel for this sublunary state.'

It was a weary way which the returning penitent had to retrace. Now rising towards the heaven to which she aspired, her fainting spirit would again sink down to the earth she had too much loved. Long and arduous was the struggle—tardy, and to the last precarious, the conquest. But the conquest was achieved. Gainsay it who will, the spirit of man is the not unfrequent, though the hidden scene of revolutions, as real as that which, from the seed corrupting in the soil beneath us, draws forth the petals, diffusing on every side their fragrance, and reflecting in every varied hue the light of heaven. He who, with disappointed hopes, and the satiety of all the pleasures which earth has to offer, seeks refuge in that sanctuary which in the heat and confidence of youth he had despised, may well expect that human judges will note the change with incredulity or derision: nor, perhaps, has he much right to complain. There ever must be some ground for others to doubt whether the seeming love of long-neglected virtues be more than a real distate for long-practised vices. That the rouee should pass into the ennuyee, and the ennuyee into the devotee, may appear as natural as that the worm should become a chrysalis, and the chrysalis a butterfly. To the wits be their jests, and to the mockers their gibes. To those who can feel for some of the deepest agonies of our common nature, such jests will be at least less welcome than the belief that, when innocence is gone, all is not lost; and the conviction, that over the soul blighted and depraved by criminal indulgence, may still be effectually brooding an influence more gentle than a mother's love, and mightier than all the confederate powers of darkness and of guilt. Few readers of the later correspondence of the Duchess of Longueville, will doubt that the change in her character was the result of such a renovating energy. At the age of thirty-four she finally retired from the cabals in which she had borne so conspicuous a part. Condé had now taken up arms against her native country, and Turenne commanded her armies. The Duchess mourned alike the success and the reverses of her brother. De Longueville, a kind-hearted man, hailed with unabated tenderness her return to the paths of wisdom and peace. She watched with true congenial care over his declining years, and even extended her kindness to one of his illegitimate daughters.

Touched by her altered conduct, the King and the Queen's mother admitted her not merely to their favour, but to a high place in their regard; nor are there many incidents in the life of Louis so amiable, as the affectionate gentleness of his demeanour to this once dangerous but now self-humbled enemy. On the death of her husband, she expended immense sums in the attempt to repair, in some degree, the calamities which the war of the Princes had inflicted on the peasantry. In a single year she restored to freedom, at her own expense, nine hundred persons imprisoned for debt; and had a list of no less than four thousand prisoners subsisting altogether on her bounty. The austere penances, which at least attested her sincerity, were combined on all becoming occasions with the princely magnificence due to her exalted station. Her eldest son, the Comte Du Dunois, a feeble-minded youth, turned Jesuit, took orders, escaped to Rome, and was placed under permanent restraint. The Comte St. Paul, her only other child, was a wild profligate. He enjoyed ecclesiastical benefices of the annual value of 50,000 crowns, which she compelled him to resign unconditionally to the disposal of the King. Louis revered and applauded such unwonted disinterestedness, and exerted all the magic of his flattery to win her back again to the court and to the world. But she had learned a salutary lesson of self-distrust. In the valley of Port-Royal she built a modest residence, where she found repose, if not serenity; and soothed with humble hopes a spirit too deeply contrite to be visited by more buoyant feelings. Her own hand has traced the history of her declining years; nor have the most pathetic preachers of that age of pulpit eloquence, bequeathed to us a more impressive admonition. Whoever would learn what are the woes of ministering, by reckless self-indulgence, to the morbid cravings of the heart for excitement; or how revolting is the late return to more tranquil pursuits; or how gloomy is the shadow which criminal passions, even when exorcised, yet will cast over the soul they have long possessed; or how, through that gloom, a light pure as its divine original, may dawn over the benighted mind with still expanding warmth and brightness—should study the Letters and the Confessions of Anne Genevieve, Duchesse de Longueville.

To explain what was the task she undertook, we must return a little in our former steps.

Such, and so conversant with the ways of the world was the diplomatist who at length appeared for the rescue of the ladies of Port-Royal. No less skilful hand could have unravelled the folds in which the subject had been wrapped by intrigue and bigotry.

The original anti-Jansenist test had been promulgated by a synod of the clergy of France, adopted by the Sorbonne, and enforced by Louis. To the remonstrances of the nuns against being required to attest by their signatures a matter of fact of which they had, and could have no knowledge, the King had answered only by reiterating the demand for a 'pure and simple' subscription. 'His Majesty,' observed the Princess de Guemene, 'is supreme. He can make princes of the blood, bishops, and archbishops. Why not martyrs also?' It was a branch of the royal prerogative which he was nothing loath to exercise. De Retz abdicated the see of Paris, and was succeeded by De Marca, the author of the Formulary. Availing themselves of so happy an occasion, the Jesuits at Clermont drew up a thesis, in which was propounded, for the acceptance of the faithful, the naked dogma of Papal infallibility, not only on points of Doctrine, but as to mere matters of fact. Arnauld and his friends protested. Their protest was refuted by the hand and the torch of one of the greatest polemics of that age—the public executioner. De Marca did not live long; and his death brought with it a truce in this holy war. His successor in the see of Paris, M. de Perifixe, resumed it, but with greater subtlety. He taught that it was enough if a matter of fact, asserted by the Pope, were believed not d'une foi divine, but d'une foi humaine. Whether, in the Virgilian elysium, the recompense awarded to the inventors of useful arts awaits the authors of useful distinctions, has not been revealed to us; but if so, De Perifixe may there have found his recompense. On earth it was his hard fate to be refuted by Nicole, to be laughed at by the Parisians, and to be opposed by the ladies of Port-Royal. They had no faith, divine or human, and they would profess none, as to the contents of a large folio written in a language of which they were entirely ignorant. 'Pure as angels,' said the incensed Archbishop; 'they are proud as devils!' How he punished their pride has already been recorded.

When a great dignitary has lost his temper, there is nothing which he should more studiously avoid than the being hooked into the sort of contemporary record which the French call a proces verbal. In the midst of the nuns of Port-Royal, De Perifixe had stormed and scolded more in the style of a poissarde than of an Archbishop of Paris; and when the chronicle of all his sayings and doings on the occasion stole into light, with all the forms of notarial certificates, he found himself, to his unutterable dismay, the hero of as broad a farce as had ever delighted that laughter-loving city. It was the single joke of which the nuns had ever been either the willing or the unintentional authors; and they soon found to their cost that it was no light matter to have directed the current of ridicule against an archi-episcopal, and, through him, against a royal censor.

The invincible opposition of the Port-Royalists to the test, had awakened a more extended resistance. Men had begun to deny the right of assemblies of the clergy, or of the King himself, to impose such subscriptions. To retreat was, however, no longer possible. Louis, therefore, by the advice of the Jesuits, desired the Pope himself first to draw up a Formula, which should declare his own infallible knowledge of matters of fact; and then to require the universal acceptance of it. Alexander the Seventh exultingly complied. Subscription to De Marca's test was now exacted by papal authority, with the addition that the subscribers should call on the Deity himself to attest their sincerity. To this demand the great body of the clergy of France submitted; but still the resistance of the nuns of Port-Royal was unsubdued. Four years of persecution—of mean, unmanly, worrying persecution—followed. The history of it fills many volumes of the Conventual Annals, exciting in the mind of him who reads them, feelings of amazement and disgust, of respect and pity, strong enough to carry him through what it must be confessed is but a wearisome task. From the poor remnant of earthly comforts which these aged women had retained, the mean-spirited king, his bigoted confessors, and his absurd archbishop, daily stole whatever could be so pilfered. From their means of preparing for the world where the wicked cease from troubling, every deduction was made which sacerdotal tyranny could enforce. But no tyranny could induce them to call on the God of Truth to attest a lie. One after another went down, with no priestly absolution, to graves which no priest would bless; strong, even amidst the weakness and the mortal agonies of nature, in the assurance, that the path to heaven could not be found in disobedience to the immutable laws which Heaven itself had established.

Among the bishops of France, four had been faithful enough to insist on the droit and the fait. In publishing the papal bull, they attached to it an express statement of their dissent from this new pretension of Rome. Of these prelates, one was a brother of the great Arnauld, and bore the same name. Alexander the Seventh was now on his death-bed; he had even received extreme unction. But at that awful hour he retained enough of human or of papal feeling to launch against the four prelates a brief, full of menaces, which it devolved on his successor, Rospigliosi, to execute. But Clement the Ninth was a man of a far greater and more Christian spirit. He had mourned over the distractions of the Church, and had made it his appropriate glory to mediate between the contending crowns of Spain and Portugal. To him the Duchesse De Longueville addressed herself on behalf of Port-Royal, in a letter of the most insinuating and impressive eloquence. His nuncio at Paris was made to feel all the powers of that fascinating influence which she still knew how to employ. At her hotel, and in her presence, a secret committee met daily for the management of this affair. It was composed of three bishops, aided by Arnauld and Nicole. Condé himself was induced by his sister to lend the weight of his authority to her projects. Even Le Tellier was circumvented by the toils spread for him by this great mistress of intrigue. For nearly eighteen months she laboured to overcome the obstacles which the pride of Rome and of Louis, and the ill-will of the Father Annat, his confessor, opposed to her. All difficulties at length yielded to her perseverance and her diplomatic skill. The four bishops were content to denounce the 'five propositions' as heretical, and to promise 'a submission of respect and discipline' as to the fact, declaring that 'they would not contest the papal decision, but would maintain an absolute silence on the subject.' One of them insisted on adding an express statement of the fallibility of the Church respecting such matters of fact as the contents of a book. Clement the Ninth was, however, satisfied. Peace was restored to the Gallican Church. Medals were struck, speeches made, and solemn audiences accorded by Louis to Arnauld and his associates. De Saci and his fellow-prisoners were set at liberty. Port-Royal was once more permitted to recruit her monastery, to open her schools, and to give shelter to her dispersed recluses. Among the events which signalised the pacification of Clement the Ninth, one demands especial notice. Malebranche had signed the Formulary. He now frankly avowed that he had condemned Jansenius without reading his book, and implored the pardon of God and of man for his guilty compliance. It may perhaps be consolatory to some, in our own times, to be informed, that in censuring as heretical the book of a professor of divinity, of which they knew nothing but the title-page, they might have pleaded the example of so great a man—a comfort, however, to which they will not be entitled, unless they imitate also the example of his repentance.

Ten years elapsed from this pacification before the close of the extraordinary career of the Duchess of Longueville; and they were years distinguished in the Chronicle of Port-Royal by little else than the peaceful lives and the tranquil deaths of many of the inhabitants of the valley. In their annals are to be found more than a century of names, to which their admirers have promised not only an eternal reward, but such immortality as the world has to bestow. Overburdened as we are by the ever increasing debt of admiration to the illustrious dead, these promises will hardly be fulfilled, at least by our busy age: nor is it easy even for one who has carefully travelled through the whole of these biographies, to select from among the female candidates for posthumous renown, those to whom such homage is especially due. Their portraitures have a strong resemblance to each other. To each, in her turn, is awarded the praise of passive virtue, of fervent piety, and of austerities from which nature shrinks. If a sense of the ludicrous will occasionally provoke a passing smile, or if a sigh must now and then be given to the melancholy superstitions of which they were the blameless victims, it is at least impossible to contemplate, irreverently or unmoved, the image of purity and peace, of mutual kindness and cheerful acquiescence in the Divine will, which discloses itself at each successive aspect of that holy sisterhood. The sternest Protestant cannot rouse himself at once from the influence of this course of reading; nor resume without an effort his conviction, that it is amidst the charities of domestic life that female virtue finds the highest exercises, and female piety the most sublime elevation. He knows, indeed, that exuberant as is the charter of his faith in models of every human virtue, and in precepts of wisdom under every varied form, it contains not so much as a single example, or a solitary admonition, from which the Confessors of Port-Royal could have shown that a retreat to such cloisters was in accordance with the revealed will of God. He knows also, that thus to counteract the eternal laws of nature, and the manifest designs of providence, must be folly, however specious the pretext or solemn the guise which such folly may assume. He is assured that filial affection, cheerfully, temperately, bountifully, and thankfully using the gifts of heaven, is the best tribute which man can render to Him who claims for himself the name and the character of a Father. But with all this knowledge, the disciple of Luther or of Calvin will yet close the vies edifi- eates and the necrologies of these holy women, not without a reluctance to doubt, and a wish to believe, that they really occupied the high and awful station to which they aspired; and stood apart from the world, its pollutions, and its cares, to offer with purer hearts than others, and with more acceptable intercessions, the sacrifice of an uninterrupted worship, replete with blessings to themselves and to mankind. Peace then to their errors, and unquoted be any of the innumerable extravagancies which abound in the records of their lives. To the Recluses who shared, without ever breaking their solitude, we rather turn for illustrations of the spirit which animated and characterised the valley of Port-Royal.

On the pacification of Clement IX., Louis Sabastian le Nain de Tillemont, who had been educated in the schools of Nicole and Lancelot, returned in the maturity of his manhood to a hermitage which he had erected near the court-yard of the abbey. Such had been his attainments as a boy, that the pupil had soon exhausted the resources of those profound teachers, and in his twentieth year had commenced those works on ecclesiastical history, which have placed him in the very foremost rank, if not at the head, of all who have laboured in that fertile though rugged field. To the culture of it, his life was unceasingly devoted. Though under the direction of De Saci he had obtained admission to holy orders, he refused all the rich preferments pressed on him by the admirers of his genius. Year after year passed over him, unmarked by any event which even the pen of his affectionate biographer, Fontaine, could record. 'He lived,' says that amiable writer, alone, and with no witness but God himself, who was ever present with him, and who was all in all to him.' It was only in a habitual and placid communion with that one associate, that he sought relief from his gigantic toils; and with a spirit recruited by that communion, he returned to the society of the Emperors, the Popes, the Fathers, and the Saints, who were to him as companions and as friends. To a man long conversant with the anxieties of a secular calling, the soft lights and the harmonious repose of such a picture may perhaps exhibit a delusive aspect; yet it can hardly be a delusion to believe, that for such colloquy with the minds which yet live in books, and with that Mind which is the source of all life, would be well exchanged whatever ambition, society, fame, or fortune, have to confer on their most favoured votaries.

So at least judged one, whom fame and fortune wooed with their most alluring smiles. Racine had been trained at Port-Royal, in the same schools and by the same masters as Tillemont. For the great dramatist, no sympathy could of course be expressed by the austere dwellers in the desert; and perhaps the friendship of Boileau may have consoled him for the alienation of his old teacher Nicole. But when, in his visionnaires, that devout and learned man denounced the writers of stage-plays as the Empoisonneurs publics des ames, Racine keenly felt and resented the reproach. Like most controversialists, he lived to repent the asperity of his language: but his repentance yielded fruits, the like of which have rarely been gathered from that bitter stem. The author of Andromaque not only sought the pardon, and regained the friendship of Arnauld and Nicole, but actually renounced the drama, exhorted his son to abandon poetry, and became the advocate and the historian of Port-Royal, and secured for his bones a resting-place in that consecrated soil. Happily for the world, a method was afterwards discovered of reconciling the exercise of Racine's genius with the severe principles which Nicole had instilled into him when a boy, and had revived with such decisive effect in his riper days. Esther and Athalie were allowed, even at Port-Royal, to be works not unseemly for a man whose single talent was that of writing verses, and who, if he could do nothing better, was at least acknowledged to do that well. But alas for human consistency! He who traced those majestic scenes where reliance on the Divine arm triumphs over all human regards and terrors, was doomed himself to pine away and to die of a hard saying of the hard master it was his ill fate to serve. His guilt was to have drawn up a Memoir on the means of relieving the starving poor at Paris. His punishment, the indignant exclamation of the great Louis, 'Because he is an all-accomplished versifier, does he presume that he knows every thing? Because he is a great poet, does he mean to become a minister?' Well might the sensitive spirit which such a feather could crush, wish with Wolsey that he had served his God as faithfully as his King, and repine amidst the pageantries of Versailles for the devout composure of Port-Royal!

And many were the eminent men who sought and enjoyed that repose. There dwelt the Prince de Conti, one of the heroes of the Fronde, and still more memorable for his penitence and restitutions; of whom it is recorded, that his young children were so impressed by his absolute devotedness to the Divine will, as to conceal from him the story of Abraham, lest the example of the sacrifice of Isaac should be imitated at their own expense. There, too, resided the Duc de Laincourt, on whom fortune had exhausted all her bounties, and who under the loss of them all, rose to the utmost heroism of a meek, unrepining, and cheerful resignation. Pontchateau, a noble, a courtier, an ambassador, and at length the apostolical prothonotary at Rome, brought all the strange vicissitudes of his life to an end, by becoming, under the name of Le Mercier, a common labourer in the gardens, and a devout worshipper in the church of Port-Royal. But this chronicle of worthies, spreading out into interminable length, must give place to a very brief account of the events which reduced to a desert the solitudes which they had cultivated and adorned.

Amidst the contentions of the Gallican Church, full proof had been given of the keen edge of those weapons which might be borrowed from the papal arsenals. It readily occurred to the sufferers, that the resource which the Jesuits had so successfully employed, might be turned against themselves. Pascal had startled the civilised world with the exposure of Molinist errors, hostile not merely to the Catholic creed, but to those principles of virtue which are the very cement of human society. They had imputed to Jansenius five heresies on the obscure subjects of divine grace and human freedom; but who could number the propositions in which Escobar and his associates had spurned the authority of the decalogue itself? The assiduity of the bishops of Arras and St. Pons collected sixty-five of these scandalous dogmas, and these they transmitted to Rome in a memorial of which Nicole was believed to be the writer, and known to be the translator. Righteous unqualified, and decisive was the papal condemnation of the morality of the Jesuits; but fatal to the repose of Port-Royal was this triumph of one of her brightest ornaments. The Duchesse de Longueville had lately died, and with her had disappeared the motive which had induced Louis to show some forbearance to the objects of her affectionate solicitude. Harlai now governed the See of Paris. He was a man of disreputable character, and the mere instrument of the king. Louis was in bondage to Madame de Maintenon, and she to the Jesuits. Their vengeance scarcely sought a pretext, and soon found its gratification.

In the exercise of his archi-episcopal authority, Harlai banished De Saci, Tillemont, and Pontchateau, from the valley of Port-Royal. Nicole and Arnauld sought shelter in the Netherlands from his menaces. The postulantes and scholars were once more expelled, and the admission of novices was again forbidden.

At this epoch, another lady of the house of Arnauld —a cousin and namesake of the Mère Angelique—was invested with the dignity of abbess. Her genius, her virtue, and her learning, are the subject of eulogies too indistinct to be impressive, and too hyperbolical to win implicit credence. Yet, if she was the writer of the memoir in defence of her monastery which bears her name, there was no apparent obstacle, but her sex and her profession, to her successful rivalry of the greatest masters of juridical eloquence in France. Ineffectual, however, would have been all the rhetoric which ever adorned the parliament of Paris, to avert the threatened doom of the stronghold of Jansenism. As he approached the tomb, Harlai's resentment became more deep and settled. He left it a fatal inheritance to his successor, the Cardinal de Noailles. A weak and obstinate, but not an unfeeling man, De Noailles owed his promotion to the See of Paris to his fixed hostility to Port-Royal, and his known willingness to hazard the odium of subverting that ancient seat of piety and learning. The apology soon presented itself.

Several years had elapsed since the dispute about 'Le Droit et le Fait de Jansenius' had apparently reached its close. Revolving this passage of bygone history, a priest had improved or amused his leisure, by drawing up, for the decision of the Sorbonne, 'a case of conscience,' which, it must be owned, was a hard problem for the most expert casuist. Of two infallible Popes, one had with his dying breath affirmed, as a momentous truth, a proposition, which the other had abandoned, if not retracted. What was it the duty of the faithful to believe on the subject? Forty doctors answered, that it was enough to maintain a respectful silence as to the 'fait de Jansenius.' Archi-episcopal mandaments, treatises of the learned, royal orders in council, and parliamentary arrêts, flew thick and fast through the troubled air, and obscured the daylight of common sense. Again the eldest son of the church invoked the authority of her spiritual father. In oracular darkness went forth from the Vatican, the sentence, that 'respectful silence is not a sufficient deference for apostolical constitutions.' This is what is called, in ecclesiastical story, the bull 'Vineam Domini Sabaoth.' Under shelter of an abstract theorem which no Catholic could deny, it ingeniously concealed the conflict of opinion of two infallible Pontiffs. Subscription of their unqualified assent to the bull 'Vineam' was demanded from the nuns of Port-Royal, and from them alone. They cheerfully subscribed; but with the addition, that their signature was not to be understood as derogating from what had been determined on the pacification of Clement IX. This was their final and their fatal act of contumacy. Decree after Decree was fulminated by De Noailles. He forbade the admission of any new members of their house. He prohibited the election of an abbess. He despoiled them of a large part of their estates. He interdicted to them all the sacraments of the church. He obtained a papal bull for the suppression of their monastery; and, in October 1709, he carried it into effect by an armed force, under the Marquis D'Argenson.

There is in Westminster Hall a tradition that an eminent advocate of our own times, addressed to the House of Peers during sixteen successive days a speech, in the course of which (such is the calculation) he employed all the words in Johnson's Dictionary, one with another, just thirty-five times over. Neither boasting the copiousness, nor presuming on the patience which were at the command of that great lawyer, we have compressed into a few sentences the history of a contest, which, if not so abridged, would have swollen to the utmost limits of that unparalleled oration. But to those who have leisure for such studies, and who delight in a well-fought forensic field, we can promise that pleasure in the highest degree from a perusal of the contest between the aged ladies of Port-Royal, and their royal, mitred, and ermined antagonists. Never was a more gallant struggle against injustice. After exhausting all the resources of legal defence, those helpless and apparently feeble women disputed every inch of ground by protests, remonstrances, and petitions, which, for the moment at least, held their assailants in check, and which yet remain a wondrous monument of their perseverance and capacity, and of the absolute self-control which, amidst the outpourings of their griefs, and the exposure of their wrongs, restrained every expression of asperity or resentment. Never was the genius of the family of Arnauld exhibited with greater lustre, and never with less effect.

In a gray autumnal morning, a long file of armed horsemen, under the command of D'Argenson, was seen to issue from the woods which overhung the ill-fated monastery. In the name of Louis he demanded and obtained admission into that sacred inclosure. Seated on the abbatial throne, he summoned the nuns into his presence. They appeared before him veiled, silent, and submissive. Their papers, their title-deeds, and their property were then seized, and proclamation made of a royal decree which directed their immediate exile. It was instantly carried into effect. Far and wide, along the summits of the neighbouring hills, might be seen a thronging multitude of the peasants whom they had instructed, and of the poor whom they had relieved. Bitter cries of indignation and of grief, joined with fervent prayers, arose from these helpless people, as, one after another, the nuns entered the carriages drawn up for their reception. Each pursued her solitary journey to the prison destined for her. Of these venerable women, some had passed their eightieth year, and the youngest was far advanced in life. Labouring under paralysis and other infirmities of old age, several of them reached at once their prisons and their graves. Others died under the distress and fatigues of their journey. Some possessed energies which no sufferings could subdue. Madame de Remicourt, for example, was kept for two years in solitary confinement; in a cell lighted and ventilated only through the chimney; without fire, society, or books. 'You may persecute, but you will never change Madame de Remicourt,' said the archbishop; 'for' (such was his profound view of the phenomenon) 'she has a square head, and people with square heads are always obstinate.' Last in the number of exiles appeared at the gates of the abbey, the prioress, Louise de St. Anastasie Mesnil de Courtiaux. She had seen her aged sisters one by one quit for ever the abode, the associates, and the employments of their lives. To each she had given her parting benediction. She shed no tear, she breathed no murmur, nor for a moment betrayed the dignity of her office, or the constancy of her mind. 'Be faithful to the end,' were the last words which she addressed to the last companion of her sorrows. And nobly did she fulfil her own counsels. She was conducted to a convent, where, under a close guard, she was compelled to endure the utmost rigours of a jail. Deprived of all those religious comforts which it is in the power of man to minister, she enjoyed a solace, and found a strength, which it was not in the power of man to take away. In common with the greater part of her fellow-sufferers, she died with no priestly absolution, and was consigned to an unhallowed grave. They died the martyrs of sincerity; strong in the faith that a lie must ever be hateful in the sight of God, though infallible popes should exact it, or an infallible church, as represented by cardinals and confessors, should persuade it.

Unsatiated by the calamities of the nuns, the vengeance of the enemies of Port-Royal was directed against the buildings where they had dwelt, the sacred edifice where they had worshipped, and the tombs in which their dead had been interred. The monastery and the adjacent church were overthrown from their foundations. Workmen, prepared by hard drinking for their task, broke open the graves in which the nuns and recluses of former times had been interred. With obscene ribaldry, and outrages too disgusting to be detailed, they piled up a loathsome heap of bones and corpses, on which the dogs were permitted to feed. What remained was thrown into a pit, prepared for the purpose, near the neighbouring churchyard of St. Lambert. A wooden cross, erected by the villagers, marked the spot where many a pilgrim resorted to pray for the souls of the departed, and for his own. At length no trace remained of the fortress of Jansenism to offend the eye of the Jesuits, or to perpetuate the memory of the illustrious dead with whom they had so long contended. The solitary Gothic arch, the water-mill, and the dovecot, rising from the banks of the pool, with the decayed towers and the farm-house on the slopes of the valley, are all that now attest that it was once the crowded abode of the wise, the learned, and the good. In that spot, however, may still be seen the winding brook, the verdant hills, and the quiet meadows, nature's indestructible monuments to the devout men and holy women who nurtured there affections which made them lovely in their lives, and hopes which rendered them triumphant in death. Nor in her long roll of martyrs has history to record the names of any who suffered with greater constancy, or in a nobler cause; for their conflict was with the very church they most profoundly revered, and their cause was that of devotedness to sincerity and the abhorrence of falsehood.

Amongst the interpreters of the counsels of Divine Providence in that age, there were not wanting many who found, in the calamities which overwhelmed the declining years of Louis, the retribution of an avenging Deity for the wrongs inflicted on Port-Royal. If it were given to man to decipher the mysterious characters engraven on the scroll of this world's history, it might not be difficult to find, in the annals of his reign, other and yet more weighty reasons for the awakening of Nemesis in France at the commencement of the eighteenth century. But of the mere chronological fact, there is no doubt. The deaths of the three Dauphins, and the victories of Eugene and Marlborough, followed hard on the dispersion of the nuns. With his dying breath, Louis cast the responsibility on the Jesuits who stood round his bed. 'If, indeed, you have misled and deceived me'—such was his last address to his confessors—'you are deeply guilty, for in truth I acted in good faith. I sincerely sought the peace of the church.' The humiliation of his spiritual advisers quickly followed. It was preceded by the retirement and death of Madame de Maintenon, who had both provoked and derided the sufferings of the Port-Royalists. The very type of mediocrity out of place, she is to our mind the least winning of all the ladies of equivocal or desperate reputation who in modern times have stood on the steps of European thrones. Her power was sustained by the feebleness of the mind she had subdued, and by the craftiness of those who had subjugated her own. Her prudery and her religiousness, such as it was, served but to deepen the aversion which her intriguing, selfish, narrow-minded, and bigoted spirit excite and justify; although, in her own view of the matter, she probably hoped to propitiate the favour of heaven and the applause of the world, by directing against the unoffending women of Port-Royal the deadly wrath of the worn-out debauchee, whose jaded spirits and unquiet conscience it was her daily task to sustain and flatter. De Noailles, the instrument of her cruelty, lived to bewail his guilt with such strange agonies of remorse, as to rescue his memory from all feelings of hatred, although it is difficult to contemplate, without some failure of respect, the exhibition of emotions which, however just in themselves, deprived their victim of all powers of self-control, and of every semblance of decorous composure. His howlings are described by the witness of them, to have been more like those of a wild beast or a maniac, than of a reasonable man.

If these slight notices of the heroes and heroines of Port-Royal, (slight, indeed, when compared with the original materials from which they have been drawn,) should be ascribed by any one to a pen plighted to do suit and service to the cause of Rome, no surmise could be wider of the mark. No Protestant can read the writings of the Port-Royalists themselves, without gratitude for his deliverance from the superstitions of a church which calls herself Catholic, and boasts that she is eternal. That the Church of Rome may flourish as long as the race of man shall endure, is indeed a conclusion which may reasonably be adopted by him who divines the future only from the past. For where is the land, or what the historical period, in which a conspicuous place has not been held by phenomena essentially the same, however circumstantially different? In what age has man not been a worshipper of the visible? In what country has imagination—the sensuous property of the mind—failed to triumph over those mental powers which are purely contemplative? Who can discover a period in which religion has not more or less assumed the form of a compromise between the self-dependence and the self-distrust of her votaries—between their abasement to human authority and their conviction of its worthlessness—between their awe of the divine power and their habitual revolt against the divine will? Of every such compromise, the indications have ever been the same—a worship of pomp and ceremonial, a spiritual despotism exercised by a sacerdotal caste, bodily penances and costly expiations, and the constant intervention of man, and of the works of man, between the worshipper and the supreme object of his worship. So long as human nature shall continue what it is, the religion of human nature will be unchanged. The Church of Rome will be eternal, if man, such as he now is, is himself eternal.

But for every labour under the sun, says the Wise man, there is a time. There is a time for bearing testimony against the errors of Rome, why not also a time for testifying to the sublime virtues with which those errors have been so often associated? Are we for ever to admit and never to practise the duties of kindness and mutual forbearance? Does christianity consist in a vivid perception of the faults, and an obtuse blindness to the merits of those who differ from us? Is charity a virtue only when we ourselves are the objects of it? Is there not a church as pure and more catholic than those of Oxford or Rome—a church comprehending within its limits every human being who, according to the measure of the knowledge placed within his reach, strives habitually to be conformed to the will of the common Father of us all? To indulge hope beyond the pale of some narrow communion, has, by each Christian society in its turn, been denounced as a daring presumption. Yet hope has come to all, and with her faith and charity, her inseparable companions. Amidst the shock of contending creeds, and the uproar of anathemas, they who have ears to hear, and hearts to understand, have listened to gentler and more kindly sounds. Good men may debate as polemics, but they will feel as Christians. On the universal mind of Christendom is indelibly engraven one image, towards which the eyes of all are more or less earnestly directed. Whoever has himself caught any resemblance, however faint and imperfect, to that divine and benignant original, has in his measure learned to recognise a brother wherever he can discern the same resemblance.*

* See on this subject a book entitled 'Catholic Christianity,' the anonymous work of the Rev. E. M'Vicar, now a minister of the Church of Scotland in Ceylon.

There is an essential unity in that kingdom which is not of this world. But within the provinces of that mighty state there is room for endless varieties of administration, and for local laws and customs widely differing from each other. The unity consists in the one object of worship—the one object of affiance—the one source of virtue—the one cementing principle of mutual love, which pervade and animate the whole. The diversities are, and must be, as numerous and intractable as are the essential distinctions which nature, habit and circumstances have created amongst men. Uniformity of creeds, of discipline, of ritual, and of ceremonies, in such a world as ours!—a world where no two men are not as distinguishable in their mental as in their physical aspect; where every petty community has its separate system of civil government; where all that meets the eye, and all that arrests the ear, has the stamp of boundless and infinite variety! What are the harmonies of tone, of colour, and of form, but the result of contrasts—of contrasts held in subordination to one pervading principle, which reconciles without confounding the component elements of the music, the painting, or the structure? In the physical works of God, beauty could have no existence without endless diversities. Why assume that in religious society—a work not less surely to be ascribed to the supreme Author of all things—this law is absolutely reversed? Were it possible to subdue that innate tendency of the human mind, which compels men to differ in religious opinions and observances, at least as widely as on all other subjects, what would be the results of such a triumph? Where would then be the free comparison, and the continual enlargement of thought; where the self-distrusts which are the springs of humility, or the mutual dependencies which are the bonds of love? He who made us with this infinite variety in our intellectual and physical constitution must have foreseen, and fore-seeing, must have intended, a corresponding dissimilarity in the opinions of his creatures on all questions submitted to their judgment, and proposed for their acceptance. For truth is his law; and if all will profess to think alike, all must live in the habitual violation of it.

Zeal for uniformity attests the latent distrusts, not the firm convictions of the zealot. In proportion to the strength of our self-reliance, is our indifference to the multiplication of suffrages in favour of our own judgment. Our minds are steeped in imagery; and where the visible form is not, the impalpable spirit escapes the notice of the unreflecting multitude. In common hands, analysis stops at the species or the genus, and cannot rise to the order or the class. To distinguish birds from fishes, beasts from insects, limits the efforts of the vulgar observer of the face of nature. But Cuvier could trace the sublime unity, the universal type, the fontal idea existing in the creative intelligence, which connects as one the mammoth and the snail. So, common observers can distinguish from each other the different varieties of religious society, and can rise no higher.

Why such a book should not have attained an extensive celebrity, or why such a writer should have been permitted to quit his native land, are questions to which we fear no satisfactory answer could be given by the dispensers of fame or of church preferment.

Where one assembly worships with harmonies of music, fumes of incense, ancient liturgies, and a gorgeous ceremonial, and another listens to the unaided voice of a single pastor, they can perceive and record the differences; but the hidden ties which unite them both escape such observation. All appears as contrast, and all ministers to antipathy and discord. It is our belief that these things may be rightly viewed in a different aspect, and yet with the most severe conformity to the divine will, whether as intimated by natural religion, or as revealed in holy scripture. We believe that, in the judgment of an enlightened charity, many Christian societies, who are accustomed to denounce each other's errors, will at length come to be regarded as members in common of the one great and comprehensive church, in which diversities of forms are harmonised by an all-pervading unity of spirit. For ourselves, at least, we should deeply regret to conclude that we were aliens from that great Christian Commonwealth of which the Nuns and the Recluses of the valley of Port-Royal were members, and members assuredly of no common excellence.

THE STRANGER AND HIS FRIEND.

"Ye have done it unto me."—Matt. xxv. 40.

A poor wayfaring man of grief
Hath often crossed me on my way,
Who sued so humbly for relief,
That I could never answer, "Nay;"
I had not power to ask his name,
Whither he went or whence he came,
Yet was there something in his eye,
That won my love, I knew not why.

Once, when my scanty meal was spread,
He entered;—not a word he spake;
Just perishing for want of bread,
I gave him all; he blessed it, brake,
And ate, but gave me part again;
Mine was an Angel's portion then,
For while I fed with eager haste,
The crust was manna to my taste.

I spied him, where a fountain burst
Clear from the rock; his strength was gone;
The heedless water mocked his thirst;
He heard it, saw it hurrying on:
I ran to raise the sufferer up;
Thrice from the stream he drained my cup,
Dipt, and returned it running o'er;
I drank, and never thirsted more.

'Twas night; the floods were out; it blew
A winter hurricane aloof;
I heard his voice abroad, and flew
To bid him welcome to my roof;
I warmed, I clothed, I cheered my guest,
Laid him on my own couch to rest;
Then made the hearth my bed, and seemed
In Eden's garden while I dreamed.

Stript, wounded, beaten, nigh to death,
I found him by the highway-side:
I roused his pulse, brought back his breath,
Revived his spirit, and supplied
Wine, oil, refreshment; he was healed;
I had myself a wound concealed,
But from that hour forgot the smart,
And Peace bound up my broken heart.

In prison I saw him next, condemned
To meet a traitor's doom at morn;
The tide of lying tongues I stemmed,
And honored him 'midst shame and scorn;
My friendship's utmost zeal to try,
He asked, if I for him would die?
The flesh was weak, my blood ran chill,
But the free spirit cried, "I will."

Then in a moment to my view
The Stranger darted from disguise,
The token in his hands I knew,
My Saviour stood before mine eyes:
He spake; and my poor name He named;
"Of Me thou hast not been ashamed;
These deeds shall thy memorial be;
Fear not, thou didst them unto Me."

MALARIA.

On the Spontaneous Evolution of Sulphuretted Hydrogen in the Waters of the Western Coast of Africa and elsewhere.

In the course of a lecture on this subject, delivered at the Royal Institution, by Professor Daniell, he observed, that it was curious that the impregnation of the waters of Western Africa with this deleterious gas had so long escaped attention. In water seaward forty miles its presence can be detected; and it exists in considerable quantity in the Volta, in Lopez Bay, in the Grand Bonny, &c.; it spreads over an area of 40,000 square miles, from about 8° north to 8° south latitude. The origin of this vast accumulation of sulphuretted hydrogen, Mr. Daniell attributes, not to volcanic action, not to the decomposition of pyrites, nor to the process of the decay of animal matter, but to the action and reaction of the vegetable matter carried down by the tropical rivers, and the sulphates always more or less present in sea-water. This, moreover, he has proved by experiment. Last winter he placed some fallen leaves in a jar of new river-water; also a similar proportion in a second jar, with three ounces of salt, and in a third, with a like quantity of the sulphate of soda—all closely stopped, and a card-board, with acetate of lead, over each. After having been kept three months in a warm closet he examined them. The first emitted the common smell of decayed leaves; the second that of a pleasant conserve; but the third, no words could convey the stinking odour, nauseous beyond all description. This of itself was sufficient to establish the generation of sulphuretted hydrogen; but further, the usual blackening of the lead of the card-board in this jar only left no doubt on the matter. Wherever, then, sea-water holding sulphates in solution mixes with fresh water and vegetable matter, this gas must be produced, and its effects on animal life are well known. It is a record in Italy, as well as in Essex, that where the sea has been prevented flooding the marshes, that locality, previously very sickly, had become perfectly salubrious. To sulphuretted hydrogen, therefore, Mr. Daniell ascribes the dreaded malaria, as also the deadly stinking miasma of Africa, producing languor, nausea, disgust, and death. The jungle-fever of India, also, he thinks attributable to its presence. The soil abounds with sulphates of magnesia and soda; must not, therefore, quantities of sulphuretted hydrogen be generated in the jungle-swamps? Besides the direful consequences to the health of man visiting the deadly shores of Africa, this sulphuretted hydrogen does him great injury in a commercial point of view. The copper-sheathing of vessels is rapidly destroyed. Mr. Daniell exhibited a sheet taken from the Bonetta in August 1840, on her return from the African station. Although new not many months before, it was eaten into holes, with a deposit on the one side of the protochloride of copper, and of the black sulphuret of copper on the other. A plate exhibited, taken from the Royal George, was in a good state in comparison with it. The latter had been acted on for sixty years by sea-water, but, be it remembered, by sea-water alone, not impregnated with sulphuretted hydrogen. On it there was no trace of a sulphuret. These, then, were the two principal and important points illustrated by Mr. Daniell; and the question put by him, and answered in the affirmative, was, Can science indicate a remedy for these evils? For the former, fumigation with chlorine. Chlorine and sulphuretted hydrogen cannot co-exist. Chemical action instantly takes place; sulphur is thrown down, hydrochloric acid formed, and malaria and miasma nowhere; the destroyer destroyed. For the latter, the destructive agent is not decomposed, but its action is directed to a less costly material. Copper is to be protected by zinc, for which sulphuretted hydrogen has the stronger affinity; and so long as the latter metal is present, the former is free from the attack of the gas in solution. This, it will be readily seen, is Sir H. Davy's principle, which involved the use of zinc or iron; but in the case of sulphuretted hydrogen, zinc and not iron must be employed. Mr. Daniell regretted that Davy's zinc-protectors had been so soon abandoned, and only because the copper, not acted upon by the muriatic acid, became a nucleus for earthy, vegetable, and animal matter, and the ship's bottom was in consequence fouled, as it is termed. The remedy for this, he said, was most simple. Let the protectors be so arranged that contact may be broken and renewed at will. The zincs and copper separated for a short time, the earthy deposits would soon be removed. In consequence of Mr. Daniell's report to the Admiralty, chlorine has been furnished the Niger Expedition, and no ship hereafter will proceed to the African station without that purifier in store, nor without zinc-protectors for her copper. It is to be hoped that all ship-owners will follow the example of the Admiralty Board in this respect.—Literary Gazette, No. 1272.

Additional evidence of the active agency of Salt Water, when in contact with decaying Vegetable Matter, in generating Miasma, in a hot climate, contained in a letter from Professor Daniell to the Editor of "The Friend of Africa."

My Dear Sir,—The evidence of the worst cases of malaria being connected with the decomposition of the sulphates in sea-water increases upon me every day, and I have now the pleasure to send you an abstract of a paper, which you will find at length in the 29th volume of the Annales de Chimie, p. 225, by Signor Gaetano Giorgini, which offers the strongest possible confirmation of my opinion. I trust that it may tend to give confidence to the African expedition; for if we rightly know the cause of the pestiferous exhalations upon the coast, the prevention of ill effects is obvious and easy:—Steam through the salt-waters as fast as possible, and while obliged to be on them make a plentiful use of chlorine fumigation, which instantly decomposes the sulphuretted hydrogen.—I am, &c.

J. F. Daniell.

Captain Washington, R. N.

"The observation of Signor Giorgini has been drawn to the state of the atmosphere in the neighbourhood of certain marshes on the borders of the Mediterranean; and by reference to historical data, and various documents, he has proved the great importance which attaches to the circumstance of their being at times in communication with the sea, so as to have a mixture formed between their waters and that of the sea. Both ancient and modern authors have announced the fatal effects produced in the neighbourhood of marshes by such mixture, and a local belief of the same is very common and strong.

"On the south of the Ligurian Apennines, is a marshy shore, bounded on the west for twelve miles by the Mediterranean, on the south by the river Serchio, and on the north by the river Frigido, a torrent commencing at the foot of the Apennines in the state of Massa di Carrara, running three or four miles over the land, and then falling into the sea. The plain is from two to four miles wide, and is traversed by a few short torrents or streams; among these are the rivers Camajore and Pietra Santa, which divide the plain into three separate basins. The rain and spring waters which flow into the three basins mentioned, are slowly discharged into the sea by natural or artificial canals, penetrating the sand-bank, which exist on the sea-side.

"The level of these stagnant waters is between that of high and low water in the neighbouring sea, there being but little difference between these two points in this part of the Mediterranean. In this state of things, formerly, when the waters of the sea arose from any circumstance (unless the waters of the marshes were very high,) they used to return up the ditches, fill the basins, and inundate the country to the foot of the mountains; and with a north-west wind the waves used to penetrate with force to the interior. The mixture of fresh and salt water thus formed, and which in summer was rarely changed, became corrupt, and spread infection over the neighbourhood of the most destructive kind.

"In this way the effects of the malaria were reproduced annually in the neighbouring country with all their peculiar horrors: the population, though small, presented feeble infants and diseased men, old age being unknown there. All attempts to avoid the scourge, by living on the hills, or in the interior, and frequenting the plains when the business of cultivation essentially required it, were vain; they fell victims to the extensive influence, and such being the effects upon the inhabitants of the country, much more rapidly did a stranger suffer from the deleterious atmosphere; one single night in the months of August and September causing inevitable death to the incautious traveller who should stay so long in this infested country.

"Such was the state of things till 1741. Previous to that time Gemignano Rondelli, Eustachio Manfredi, and Bernardino Zendrini had successively insisted upon the necessity of excluding the sea from these marshes; and in 1740-41 a sluice with folding-doors, competent to give emission to the waters of the marsh, but prevent the sea from entering, was constructed at the mouth of the Burlamacca. The most complete and unexpected success immediately followed upon, and has continued with, this work. The year after its completion there were no appearances of the terrible maladies which previously appeared every year. The inhabitants soon recovered health, and the land being very fertile, the population rapidly increased, and is increasing at this moment. Viareggio has become a considerable town; and so completely has all suspicion of its insalubrity disappeared, that the first families of the city of Lucca have for years built their summer seats there. Notwithstanding the success of the precautions taken at this part of the coast, the neighbouring parts were long left a prey to the destroying influence of the mixed marsh-waters; and the inhabitants around the basins of Motrone and Perotto were not considered until the year 1804. In the years 1809, 1810, 1811, similar means were taken with the best effects to the inhabitants of Montignoso and the vicinity; and in 1812 a sluice was constructed on the Cinquale, which perfected the arrangements in this part, and made a large portion of the country equally healthy with Viareggio. To complete the arrangement, it was now only required to guard the ditches of Montrone and Tonfalo with sluices; the former was finished in 1819, and the latter in 1821. Since that time the diseases of malaria have ceased so entirely at all points, that no other dangers are now incurred regarding the insalubrity at the atmosphere than such as may arise from neglect of these sluices, which the inhabitants of the country should regard as their palladium.—Friend of Africa.—No. 3.

The following beautiful lines were addressed to a little girl—an only child—in this city, who, in her sleep, repeated the passage she was accustomed nightly to utter before closing her eyes:

TO LITTLE MARY.

"I know that the angels are whispering to thee."
"God bless me and make me a good girl."—Amen.
[Little Mary's Prayer.]

Thou art so like a dream of Heaven,
That still thy visions seem Like that phenomenon of sleep,
A dream within a dream!
And pure the thoughts that memory brings,
To voice thy dreaming hour;
The butterfly has closed its wings,
Upon a lily flower!
"God bless me, and make me a good girl."—Amen.

Not such the dream by slumber thrown
When grief's rough swell is o'er,
The ebb of pain, its after moan!
The surge upon the shore!
Thy prayer is but the echoing
Of waking peace and love,
The rustling of the Spirit's wing!
The cooing of its dove!
"God bless me, and make me a good girl."—Amen.

The roses of the Persian field,
With all their wealth of bloom,
Are crush'd, though thousands may but yield
A drop of rich perfume,
And thus the heart with feeling rife,
Is crush'd, alas! by care:
Yet blest, if suffering wring from life,
Its other drop—of prayer.
"God bless me, and make me a good girl."—Amen.

Mother! sweet Mother! thou hast taught,
That infant soul to pray,
Before a rose leaf from its thought,
The world has blown away—
Prayer! on that lip that once was thine!
Thoughts, of thine own a part—
Dropp'd jewels, of thy spirit's mine,
Sleep scatters o'er her heart!
"God bless me, and make me a good girl."—Amen.

H. B. THE GREAT CARICATURIST.

An Illustrative Key to the Sketches of H. B., from No. 1 to 600. London: Thomas M'Lean, 1841.

This volume is what it professes to be, a descriptive and illustrative key to the caricatures produced by "H. B.," from the first hard and somewhat crude efforts of his pencil, to the full and perfect development of what, in his hands, may almost be said to be a new art. Indeed, to use the word caricature at all in reference to these sketches, is to do injustice to his genius, which scorns to descend to that point in order to work out his conceptions. We have had many great caricaturists, but never one who could so admirably draw caricatures, without caricaturing. The great difference between an ordinary caricaturist of the "Rowlandson" school, and the really illustrious unknown of the Haymarket, is that in the latter the reliance is on the wit of the conception, in the former, on the ludicrousness of the execution. The merit of "H. B." is, that as his sketches always embody some unique and tangible idea, they excite almost as much of our intense and gleeful admiration when described to us, as when seen. But he adds to this the most rare merit of all originators, the charm of the most perfect command of his pencil, the most wonderful power of transferring to the stone the identical idea which his mind has moulded into a picture in imagination. Were his hand a daguerreotype machine, it could not more faithfully and instantaneously impress on the recipient the rays of thought that emanate from his mind. Almost as soon as the idea has developed itself in characteristic form there, is it reproduced in actual and tangible matter.

What a field of thought do not these sketches open to us! "H. B." disdains to rely, as his predecessors have done, on ridiculing mere personal defects, or playing up to popular prejudices by absurd exaggerations. He works with an occult intelligence, creating combinations, and detecting similitudes, that no one else has ever before conceived; nothing comes amiss to him. If he draws Punch, Punch is not the mere deformity with nut-cracker physiognomy, but actual intelligent wood, and there is a leer in the eye. If he draws Lord Morpeth, he is not content with pencilling a mere overgrown schoolboy, with a goggle eye and a hanging nether lip—he watches him night and day, in the palace, in the street, or in the house, until he catches exactly that attitude and that aspect in which the noble lord appears preeminently ludicrous, without the artist being compelled to resort to personalities in order to render him absurd. If he gives us Lord Melbourne, full justice is done to his noble aristocratic mould of head; but there is not the less the easy, soul-less, poco-curante air, the regardless lounge, the half-defiant tilt of the hat, and the goat-like, half-peering leer of the eye, that show the noble viscount to be at least so far sincere, that he does not endeavour to conceal the bent of his character. So with all that he undertakes—the same spirit of good taste rules over all; and, as in the case of all men of genius, the most astonishing results are brought about by the most simple means.

There is one other peculiarity about the genius of this great artist. Though his jokes fly in the face of the prejudices of all parties, he is an universal favourite. Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, Daniel O'Connell, Mr. Roebuck, and Lord Brougham, might all be seen laughing at one and the same time at the same sketch. This may be attempted to be accounted for by the fact, that we always rather think the laugh is against our neighbour, than that it is against ourself. But we are inclined to place it to the account of the thoroughly English spirit that pervades every thing "H. B." produces. To this, perhaps, may be attributed the fact, that the balance of his humour is decidedly against the whigs.

If in running rapidly over the descriptive notices of the different sketches we have many a time re-enjoyed the hearty laugh, or the keen relish of the artist's wit in conception, wherewith we used to greet them as they severally appeared at the time of publication, the reader will not be sorry to revive some of his own impressions of the same sort. We have selected some two or three, more perhaps for their general political bearing, than as being the best specimens of the artist's power. Who can forget the admirable manner in which "H. B." seized hold of Lord Stanley's stinging satire of the

"THIMBLE RIG."

"Mr. Stanley's simile of the thimble rig" says the writer, "was one of the most happy hits of this period. Even at this distance of time it continues to keep its place among the stock allusions of newspaper leaders. As it forms the subject not only of this and the following sketch, but of some which will have to be explained in a future page, and, moreover, as any abridgment or alteration of the speaker's language would destroy its effect, it is considered best to give it entire:—

"My right honourable friend will excuse me for using such an expression, and if the committee will not think it descending too low for a comparison, I should say that I never witnessed any thing like the principle upon which his Majesty's Government appear to be proceeding in this matter, except among a class of persons who are not thought very well of in general—who are sometimes to be seen at country races—and the instruments of whose profession are a small deal board, four or five thimbles, and a pea. The art and dexterity which these professors exhibit is in asking you whether the pea is under this thimble, under that thimble, or under the other thimble; and in shifting the pea from one thimble to the other, until the final result is, that the deluded person who speculates upon their manœuvres is sure to lose his property. Now, literally, if the house will not think it too low an illustration, I pray it to observe how exactly my right honourable friend is following this plan. He stands with his bill before him—with the church pocket—with the state pocket—with the landlord's pocket—with the tenant's pocket—with the perpetuity fund, and with all other funds. He shifts it backwards and forwards. First it's the landlord—then it's the tenant—then it's the church—then it's the state—we have it under this thimble—no, it is not here! it is under that one—again it is not there, it is under the other; and the result is, that my right honourable friend, with great dexterity, removes all the thimbles, and we, who have been speculating on his proceedings, find that the property has disappeared."

To explain the sketch, the keeper of the table is

Mr. Littleton, the Irish Secretary. His accomplices are Lord John Russell (who pretends to offer a bet,) and Mr. Spring Rice, on the one side; and Lord Althorp on the other, with Lord Grey behind. John Bull is the person to be victimised, and he appears to be a very likely man for the purpose. Mr. Stanley, however, interposes to save him by a timely caution, which he seems well qualified to give, in consequence of having once kept a thimble rig himself; that is, belonged to the whig party. But the humour of the poor Irishman who appears desirous of laying a wager if he had but a shilling in his pocket to lay, and of Mr. O'Connell's affectation of taking care of him is very happy.

The value of the sketch and indeed of at least three-fourths of all H. B.'s, is, that it is as appropriate and as laughter-moving to-day, as it was on its first appearance. The next following sketch, "The Dispersion of the Thimble Rig," we remember as equally clever with the foregoing.

The following conveys a moral not yet, alas! applied by the unhappy dupes for whose benefit it is given:—

"SANCHO FEASTING AS GOVERNOR OF THE ISLAND OF BARATARIA.

If the wit of this sketch were not too refined for the senses of those to whom the lesson which it conveys would be most useful, it would teach the Irish peasant of modern days, and the great mass of the people of any other time or country, how few of those expectations which demagogues hold out to them are ever realised. Every reader of Don Quixote (and who is there that has not read Don Quixote!) will remember the consummation of Sancho's desires, by his obtaining the government of Barataria, and his dinner, or rather his attempt to dine, under the superintendence of the great Doctor Pedro Positive Bodewell, native of Snatchaway. What exquisite delicacies and what savoury morceaux are spoken of, and how his mouth waters to be at them! when lo! one by one, they are snatched from his lips, and at length he is compelled to make a meal on dry-bread and raisins, and to rise but half satisfied. The astonished and disappointed Sancho is here personated by an Irish peasant, as representative of his class; Mr. O'Connell is the doctor, and Lord John Russell is the waiter. Pat's looks betray at once his eagerness for the good things he has been taught to expect, and his mortification at their vanishing from his sight when he believes himself on the very point of enjoying them. The inexorable doctor, standing by, seems to say—

'Show his eyes and grieve his heart,
Come like shadows—so depart.'"

Another from the same quarry is:—

"VOLUNTARY TRIBUTE; OR, A PASSAGE FROM GIL BLAS TRANSLATED INTO IRISH.

At the period of the year when this sketch is dated, the newspapers generally contain statements of the collection of the tribute, or rent paid by the people of Ireland to Mr. O'Connell. The papers espousing the O'Connell side tell of the wonderful alacrity with which this rent is paid up by the whole of the people; but the opposition papers are filled with stories of the oppressive manner in which the tribute is levied, chiefly by means of the Irish priesthood. To humour these stories, H. B. has represented Mr. O'Connell soliciting his tribute after the manner of the beggar in Gil Blas:—"I looked about to see what was the matter, and perceived on the ground an old hat turned up, with a rosary of great beads in it; and, at the same time, heard a lamentable voice pronounce these words, 'Mr. Traveller, for God's sake have pity on a poor maimed soldier! drop, if you please, a few bits into the hat, and you shall be rewarded in Heaven!' I turned my eyes immediately on the side from whence the voice issued, and saw, at the root of a bush about twenty or thirty paces from me, a kind of soldier, who, upon two cross sticks, supported the barrel of a carbine, in my apprehension larger than a pike, with which he seemed to take aim at me. At this apparition, which made me quake for my money, I stopped short, and pocketing my ducats in a great hurry, took out some rials, and, approaching the hat, which was exposed for the reception of the extorted charity, dropped them into it."

In the edition of "Gil Blas" published in the "Novelist's Magazine," there is a print from which this sketch appears to have been copied. Poor Pat, dropping his contribution into the hat, displays as much genuine fear as the student of Oviedo. Mr. O'Connell, it will be observed, instead of a carbine, levels the pastoral crook of the Pope, in allusion to the use made of the priesthood for the purpose of aiding the collection of the O'Connell rent; and, with regard to the death's head and cross-bones, it remains to be told, that Mr. O'Connell was reported to have recommended that every man who did not vote for the popular candidate at some particular election, should have a death's head and cross-bones marked upon his door, to point him out to the enmity of his countrymen."

One of the best for irresistible graphic humour, was that entitled the

"SERPENT CHARMERS.

This sketch was suggested by the following passage in a speech of Sir George Sinclair, member for Caithness,) on the Irish Municipal Corporation Bill, 19th May, 1836. It was a charge against the ministers, often repeated by the opposition papers, that they obtained the support necessary to keep them in power, by tampering with the avowed enemies of the monarchy, the aristocracy, and the church, and thus exposed the institutions of the country, which they themselves professed to revere, to the danger of destruction from their declared enemies, if, by any unforeseen circumstances, it should happen that the power of this hostile party should become too great for control. Pursuing this train of invective, Sir George Sinclair said:—

"His Majesty's ministers reminded him of a body of Indian jugglers who exhibited in this city. They had a basket full of live snakes, which they opened during a part of their performance, and these reptiles crawled forth and wound themselves round their legs, thighs, and other parts of their body without injuring them. These men enjoyed perfect impunity with those noxious animals, which it were death for another to touch. So it was with his Majesty's ministers and the radicals."

The principal charmer is Lord John Russell, and the great serpent darting his tongue into his lordship's ear is Mr. O'Connell. Round the right arm of his lordship is a serpent with the head of Mr. Hume, opposite to which is a head resembling that of Mr. Shiel. That very spruce little charmer playing a pipe as he sits cross-legged on the ground, is Mr. Spring Rice, and the other who leans over the wall is Lord Morpeth.

The perfection of the ludicrous, as exhibited in the figures of Lord John and Spring Rice, stamped them in our mind at that time, so that, after the lapse of years, they are yet vivid as though the caricature were before us at the moment.

Another capital hit at the Lichfield House Compact, is embodied in the "POPULAR DANCE IN FETTERS.

In No. CCCCXXIV. we had a representation of "Servitude that hugs her chain;" but a hornpipe in fetters implies not merely a marvellous love of confinement, but a positive glory in it. The performer does not appear to be the only person who glories in his situation; for the owner of the small hat seems to enjoy the performances, and the bulky by-stander, with his hands in the pockets of his blue frock, has already put his feet into the right position, and only waits for a clear stage to take his turn at the figure.

The reader is, no doubt, too well acquainted with the "Beggar's Opera," to require to be told that the dancer is Filch, in the likeness of Lord John Russell; that Mr. O'Connell, on the left, represents Peacham; and Mr. Hume, on the right, Lockitt. Three of the group behind bear resemblance to Cabinet ministers; the second and third, on the left, look like Mr. Spring Rice and Lord Morpeth; and the bulky man, on the right, has the countenance of Lord Melbourne. This sketch merely follows up the often-repeated charge that ministers wore the chains of Mr. O'Connell."

The foregoing are selected for their bearing on the position of the whigs. There are hosts of them which are valuable from their intrinsic humour and for the admirable drawing. Among these who will forget that happy thought, "The Rivals?" Lord Morpeth in the fore-ground and Liston behind, present points of resemblance so acute, yet so entirely free from exaggeration or caricature, that we are not at all surprised at the wo-begone exclamation of the departing comedian, "That fellow will take the bread out of my mouth!" But perhaps the happiest hit at the personal peculiarities of Lord Morpeth is that in "A Ball-room Scene," wherein his harlequin lordship is presented, dancing with her Majesty. The constrained gracefulness, the terpsichorean endeavour, the agony of self-torture, presented in the countenance and attitude of the noble lord while bearing the painful honour of dancing with her Majesty, are perfection. Yet, though the whole is ludicrous in the extreme, there is nothing exaggerated in it. Lord Morpeth is frequently to be seen even in the House of Commons, attitudinising in a manner quite as absurd, and still less appropriate. Among others remarkable for humorous drawing are "Jaffier's (Lord Brougham) Introduction to the Conspirators," "The March of Silenus," (the same noble lord) wherein the leading radicals are hit off in the very finest style, as the different personages in his train. Again, the exquisite adaptation of Mulready's picture "The Wolf and the Lamb," to the relative position of Brougham and Melbourne, is above criticism. The same may be said of the sketch in which Lord John is represented as Medea, the murderer of all his political progeny. This figure indeed is perfect. Among the sketches devoted to individual portraits, one of the best is that of Sir William Molesworth, "a leading article in the Westminster Review." But to enumerate one-tenth of the first-rate sketches out of the 600 which this book records, would exhaust all the synonyms of praise—it has but one fault, that it stops at the crisis of the bed-chamber plot. Some of "H. B.'s" best have been since that period. The publication of the key, however, will no doubt induce many persons to form or complete sets of the drawings themselves. Money could not be better spent; as, apart altogether from their first-rate merit as works of art, they are absolutely necessary to the comprehension of the secret political history of the last ten years.—Britannia.

THE POET'S SPRING-TIDE.

I HEARD thee ask—What accident or mood
Controls the hour when wayward poets sing?
Yet hast thou seen a lark, whose humble wing
So lately brushed the lea, with life renewed
In music, rapid as a mountain spring,
Outsoar the golden clouds; at once pursued
By sweetest ecstasies that pant and thrill
In his full breast, and all the welkin fill!

Sprung from the grassy headland, tell me why
He wavered near, and oft delayed, before
Quivering, he rose to Heaven, rejoiced to soar,—
As if allured to earth, and urged on high
By the same passion?—still he flutters o'er
The chosen spot, with rising melody:
And is there nothing, save the flowers below,
That sways him thus: sweet querist! is it so?

Nay! and the spell those nodding blooms conceal,
That woos the bird to linger and aspire,
So rules the poet; silent, till the fire
Of love-lit eyes his melting lips unseal;—
Then will he sing—and men, perchance, admire
The strain he only asked one heart to feel!
Know, but for love that chorister would be Still mute:—and I, dear lady! but for thee!

HAMPSON'S MEDII ÆVI KALENDARIUM.

ARCHÆOLOGY, Medii Ævi Kalendarium; or Dates, Charters, and Customs of the Middle Ages: with Kalendars from the Tenth to the Fifteenth Century, and an alphabetical Digest of obsolete Names of Days: forming a Glossary of the Dates of the Middle Ages, with Tables and other aids for ascertaining Dates. By R. P. Hampson. In two volumes. Causton and Co.

A BOOK of so sterling a character as this, is not only a makeweight against a ton of the ephemeral trash which the press is continually pouring forth, but it does much towards supplying information for which we have hitherto been mainly indebted to the literature of France. It is impossible to place too high an estimate on the value of dates in all historical and antiquarian enquiries: dates are said to be "to history what the latitude and longitude are to navigation—fixing the exact position of the objects to which they are applied." From the great variety and endless complexity of dates in early charters and other instruments, both public and private, it is absolutely necessary to have tables and glossaries, &c. constantly at hand for converting those dates into the present mode of computation. Yet, while the French have long possessed such invaluable works as L'Art de Verifier les Dates, the Nouveau Traite de Diplomatique, and the Dictionnaire Raisonne de Diplomatique, it was only of late years that the attention of our own antiquaries was directed to the subject. That great national work the Fœdera, as well in the original edition as in the one undertaken at an enormous cost by the late Record Commissioner of disgraceful memory, wherein numerous documents are assigned to wrong years, is a lasting monument of the ignorance of English antiquaries of what our neighbours call "la science diplomatique."

The Notitia Historica, which appeared in 1824, was one attempt to supply information of this nature; but it was superseded in 1829, by the Chronology of History, of which a new and much improved edition appeared in 1838: and it is remarkable, that though Mr. Hampson alludes to the Notitia Historica, and has consulted most other works bearing on his labours, he seems ignorant even of the existence of the Chronology of History, and consequently does not know that the regnal years of the Kings of England are therein computed upon the recently-discovered principle, "that no interregnum has occurred from the decease of a king to the reign of his successor;" that it contains all the tables which, he says, are wanted "for the reduction of dates into modern terms;" and that it contains, though in an abridged form, much of the practical part of the information which he has himself now given to the public. The works of Mr. Hampson, and Sir Harris Nicholas are, however, very different from each other; for while that of the latter is an unreadable "hand-book," filled with tables and other data for the reduction of dates of all periods and countries into modern terms, the present volumes, and especially the first, are filled with facts explanatory of ancient customs, sports, and superstitions, compiled not merely from Brand, Strutt, and other well-known books, but also from original sources.

It is, however, desirable to point out more precisely the plan and contents of this valuable work. Mr. Hampson first treats, generally, "on Charters and Dates;" showing the extraordinary variety of dates, and laying down rules for ascertaining both the dates and the authenticity of early instruments. When the reader learns that he prescribes no fewer than thirty-one general and twenty-seven particular rules on the subject, besides nine additional ones in relation to English charters, he must believe that the art is somewhat more difficult than he may have imagined: but if he be still doubtful, let him read what Mr. Hampson says on the redundancy of dates.

"While many of the charters, granted during the middle ages, were without any indication of the time, an astonishing redundancy of dates appears in others. A charter of William the First is dated A. D. 1082, indiction 15, epact 29, concurrent 5, lunar cycle 19, and regnal year 16. We also find not only these terms, but the solar cycle, the golden number, paschal term, dominical letter, the moon's age, the position of the sun and moon in the signs of the zodiac, Easter-day, the kalends of the month, and even the hour of the day, crowded together in the same instrument. The early writers of annals and chronicles, though they could not agree in commencing the year from the same day, sometimes indulged in this profusion of dates. Taking a few cases almost at random, we find that the death of Edmund the Martyr occurred in the year of grace 870, of his age 29, and of his reign 16, on the 12th day before the kalends of December, the second day of the week, indiction 3, and in the 22d day of the moon's age. The capture of the Knights Templars, an important event, is loaded with dates—'In the year of our Lord 1306, and the first of Edward the Second, dominical letter A, the moon current 16 days, on Wednesday next after the feast of the Epiphany, and in the 4th year of Pope John, all the brethren of the Temple were seized in pursuance of the King's mandate and the Papal Bull.' In a chronicle quoted by Dr. Whitaker, the death of a monk is recorded thus—'In the year of our Lord 1309 from his incarnation, on the day of St. Vincent the Martyr, died our first abbot, indiction 8, the 2d year from leap year, dominical letter D, golden number XIX., and the 3d year of King Edward the Second.' A battle was fought between the Scots and English on Friday, 10th June, 1138; which, to modern ears, is thus obscured by the chronicler, John, Prior of Hexham—'This battle took place at Clitheroe, on the 6th feria or day of the week, the quinzime of the nativity of St. John the Baptist.' A ludicrously turgid date is employed by John Whethamstede to convey the information that the king arrived at St. Alban's about Easter 1458—The 7th year being completely passed, in the first term of the ensuing year, about that season in which our Lord Jesus rode upon an ass into Jerusalem, there to celebrate the Passover with his Disciples, came our Lord the King to the monastery, to eat his paschal lamb with his dukes, earls, barons and knights. In a similar style he designates the end of July as the time when the sabbath or solstice of the year is past, and the sun has gone further and further until he has nearly described all the degrees of the sign Leo.

"From a mistaken notion of the import of the six Persian gahan bars, or Zoroastrian thousands of light, an opinion early obtained that the world would terminate at the expiration of six thousand years; and in the tenth century it was every where believed that this period had nearly arrived. Theologians attempted to calculate the precise moment of the end of the world; and numerous charters of that age commence with the words 'As the world is now drawing to its close.' The terror inspired by this opinion seems not to have subsided in 1068, the date of a charter of William the Conqueror, which begins with the alarming annunciation.

"Events of national importance, and even the transactions of private persons, have been, from whatever motive, selected as the epochs of charters. A Saxon grant of manumission to a serf, in the reign of William the First, requires a minute acquaintance with ecclesiastical history to ascertain the date. So also a charter of Alice de Gant, in 1154, which is dated on the 5th day before the ides of June, in the reign of King Stephen, during the vacancy in the church caused by the death of Archbishop William, and while he lies unburied. Here all is particular, and yet, except the day of the month, obscure. The remarkable circumstance of the Archbishop's death and lying in state seems to have been uppermost in the mind of the clerical notary; who, no doubt, considered it to be a more memorable date than the regnal year of the prince or the year of the nativity. A charter of William de Romana was made A. D. 1172, on the kalends of April, at the abbey of St. Laurence, in the time of Abbot Hugh. Walter Fitz Gerard, impressed with the importance of the event, dates in that year in which died King Henry the younger, the son of Alianora and King Henry, and after the death of the same younger Henry, at the festival of St. Michael next ensuing. A charter of Owen de Bromfield is dated A. D. 1195, dominical letter A, on Sunday after the feast of St. Benedict. William the Conqueror has a magnificent date, taken from the completion of the Domesday Survey. A charter, conferring upon Alan, Count of Bretagne, all Earl Edwin's towns and lands in Yorkshire, which is ascribed to the same King, but believed by Spelman to be a forgery, is dated during the siege of the city of York. A charter of the year 1164 is dated on that Easter in which the King banished the relations of the Archbishop of Canterbury from the Feast of St. Michael after the consecration of H. Archdeacon of Canterbury as Bishop of Salisbury. The nativity of patrons of religious houses has been sometimes employed, probably from motives of gratitude, as a convenient point from which to compute the dates of the smaller monkish chronicles. Trevisa's translation of Higden's Polychronicon has a date of this kind. It was completed, he says, 18th April, 1387, 10th Richard the Second, 'the yere of my lord's age, sire Thomas Berkley, that made me make thys translation, fyve and thyrtty.' Perhaps the most singular of historical dates is contained in a charter of William Fitz Walter de Stanes, in 1193; it is taken from the regnal year and the year of his own marriage. Modern writers sometimes furnish dates of this kind, which would, unaccompanied by other materials, be attended with equal obscurity: thus the South Sea scheme, which ruined many hundred families, communicated its name to the year 1720, when the bubble was dissipated—

'What made Directors cheat in South Sea year.'

Dr. Maty, in 1751, mentions the 'year of the South' as a remarkable epoch of human weakness, in which sudden opulence threw more people into the madhouse than unexpected reverses."

The remarks on the use of the English language in England are extremely interesting.

"In consequence of the very great publicity with which the conferring of immunities and the erection or transference of a manor were transacted in early times, an opinion might be induced that a date was unnecessary in such cases; and in fact it is not now an essential requisite. The date being optional, some charters are found with and some without indications of the time of publication. The peculiar circumstances of the Saxon monks after the Conquest, might have led them to omit dates in the numerous Latin charters which they forged in order to secure themselves in their possessions. The practice, thus introduced, would be readily adopted by the Norman invaders, who employed every expedient to plunder them. The Normans were constantly demanding a sight of the written evidences of their lands; and the monks well knew that it would have been useless or impolitic to produce these evidences or charters, from which the former, besides being ignorant of the language, entertained a strong aversion. They abhorred the Saxon idiom, and administered the laws and statutes in French: even boys in schools were taught French and not English grammar; so that the English, that is the Saxon manner of writing, was lost, and the French manner used in all charters and books. The monks were therefore compelled to the pious fraud of forging their evidences in Latin; and great numbers, till lately supposed original, are still extant. It is not however to be supposed that English was totally neglected even under the Norman princes. Some of the charters of William the First himself are in Saxon; and St. Godric and Layamon composed their poems in their native language. A proclamation issued in the 43d of Henry the Third is extant in Somner, Hickes, Hearne, and the new edition of Rymer's Fœdera. It is certainly written in Normanno-Saxon, though Lord Lyttleton considers it to be "old English"—a very loose and indefinite description, for pure Saxon may be so denominated. Robert of Gloucester, in this reign, has a passage in which he says that the Normans could speak only their own tongue, and that the high men of the land, who sprang from their blood, held all that speech, which they received from them; for if a man could speak French he was well spoken of. But low men held to English, their native language. And he weens that there is no man in any country in the world, except England alone, that does not hold to his native speech. But well he wots that it is good to know both; for the more a man knows the more is he worth. The passage itself is a specimen of English at this period:

"And the Normans ne couthe speke tho bote her owe speche
As speke French as dude atom, & here chyldren dude al so teche.

HAMPSON'S MEDII ÆVI KALENDARIUM.

ARCHÆOLOGY, Medii Ævi Kalendarium; or Dates, Charters, and Customs of the Middle Ages: with Kalendars from the Tenth to the Fifteenth Century, and an alphabetical Digest of obsolete Names of Days: forming a Glossary of the Dates of the Middle Ages, with Tables and other aids for ascertaining Dates. By R. P. Hampson. In two volumes. Causton and Co.

A BOOK of so sterling a character as this, is not only a makeweight against a ton of the ephemeral trash which the press is continually pouring forth, but it does much towards supplying information for which we have hitherto been mainly indebted to the literature of France. It is impossible to place too high an estimate on the value of dates in all historical and antiquarian enquiries: dates are said to be "to history what the latitude and longitude are to navigation—fixing the exact position of the objects to which they are applied." From the great variety and endless complexity of dates in early charters and other instruments, both public and private, it is absolutely necessary to have tables and glossaries, &c. constantly at hand for converting those dates into the present mode of computation. Yet, while the French have long possessed such invaluable works as L'Art de Verifier les Dates, the Nouveau Traite de Diplomatique, and the Dictionnaire Raisonne de Diplomatique, it was only of late years that the attention of our own antiquaries was directed to the subject. That great national work the Fœdera, as well in the original edition as in the one undertaken at an enormous cost by the late Record Commissioner of disgraceful memory, wherein numerous documents are assigned to wrong years, is a lasting monument of the ignorance of English antiquaries of what our neighbours call "la science diplomatique."

The Notitia Historica, which appeared in 1824, was one attempt to supply information of this nature; but it was superseded in 1829, by the Chronology of History, of which a new and much improved edition appeared in 1838: and it is remarkable, that though Mr. Hampson alludes to the Notitia Historica, and has consulted most other works bearing on his labours, he seems ignorant even of the existence of the Chronology of History, and consequently does not know that the regnal years of the Kings of England are therein computed upon the recently-discovered principle, "that no interregnum has occurred from the decease of a king to the reign of his successor;" that it contains all the tables which, he says, are wanted "for the reduction of dates into modern terms;" and that it contains, though in an abridged form, much of the practical part of the information which he has himself now given to the public. The works of Mr. Hampson, and Sir Harris Nicholas are, however, very different from each other; for while that of the latter is an unreadable "handbook," filled with tables and other data for the reduction of dates of all periods and countries into modern terms, the present volumes, and especially the first, are filled with facts explanatory of ancient customs, sports, and superstitions, compiled not merely from Brand, Strutt, and other well-known books, but also from original sources.

It is, however, desirable to point out more precisely the plan and contents of this valuable work. Mr. Hampson first treats, generally, "on Charters and Dates;" showing the extraordinary variety of dates, and laying down rules for ascertaining both the dates and the authenticity of early instruments. When the reader learns that he prescribes no fewer than thirty-one general and twenty-seven particular rules on the subject, besides nine additional ones in relation to English charters, he must believe that the art is somewhat more difficult than he may have imagined: but if he be still doubtful, let him read what Mr. Hampson says on the redundancy of dates.

"While many of the charters, granted during the middle ages, were without any indication of the time, an astonishing redundancy of dates appears in others. A charter of William the First is dated A. D. 1082, indiction 15, epact 29, concurrent 5, lunar cycle 19, and regnal year 16. We also find not only these terms, but the solar cycle, the golden number, paschal term, dominical letter, the moon's age, the position of the sun and moon in the signs of the zodiac, Easter-day, the kalends of the month, and even the hour of the day, crowded together in the same instrument. The early writers of annals and chronicles, though they could not agree in commencing the year from the same day, sometimes indulged in this profusion of dates. Taking a few cases almost at random, we find that the death of Edmund the Martyr occurred in the year of grace 870, of his age 29, and of his reign 16, on the 12th day before the kalends of December, the second day of the week, indiction 3, and in the 22d day of the moon's age. The capture of the Knights Templars, an important event, is loaded with dates—'In the year of our Lord 1306, and the first of Edward the Second, dominical letter A, the moon current 16 days, on Wednesday next after the feast of the Epiphany, and in the 4th year of Pope John, all the brethren of the Temple were seized in pursuance of the King's mandate and the Papal Bull.' In a chronicle quoted by Dr. Whitaker, the death of a monk is recorded thus—'In the year of our Lord 1309 from his incarnation, on the day of St. Vincent the Martyr, died our first abbot, indiction 8, the 24 year from leap year, dominical letter D, golden number XIX., and the 3d year of King Edward the Second.' A battle was fought between the Scots and English on Friday, 10th June, 1138; which, to modern ears, is thus obscured by the chronicler, John, Prior of Hexham—'This battle took place at Clitheroe, on the 6th feria or day of the week, the quinzime of the nativity of St. John the Baptist.' A ludicrously turgid date is employed by John Whethamstede to convey the information that the king arrived at St. Alban's about Easter 1458—The 7th year being completely passed, in the first term of the ensuing year, about that season in which our Lord Jesus rode upon an ass into Jerusalem, there to celebrate the Passover with his Disciples, came our Lord the King to the monastery, to eat his paschal lamb with his dukes, earls, barons and knights. In a similar style he designates the end of July as the time when the sabbath or solstice of the year is past, and the sun has gone further and further until he has nearly described all the degrees of the sign Leo.

"From a mistaken notion of the import of the six Persian gahan bars, or Zoroastrian thousands of light, an opinion early obtained that the world would terminate at the expiration of six thousand years; and in the tenth century it was every where believed that this period had nearly arrived. Theologians attempted to calculate the precise moment of the end of the world; and numerous charters of that age commence with the words 'As the world is now drawing to its close.' The terror inspired by this opinion seems not to have subsided in 1068, the date of a charter of William the Conqueror, which begins with the alarming annunciation.

But well he wots that it is good to know both; for the more a man knows the more is he worth. The passage itself is a specimen of English at this period:

"And the Normans ne couthe speke tho bote her owe speche
As speke French as dude atom, & here chyldren dude al so teche.

So that heymen of thys lond, that of her blud com
Holdth alle thulke speche, that hii of hem nome.
Vor bote a man couthe French, me tolth of hym wel lute,
Ac lowe men holdth the Engligss, & to her kunde speche gute.
Ich wene ther ne be man in world contreyes non,
That ne holdath to her kunde speche, bote Engelond one,
Ac wel me wot vorto come bothe wel he ys
Vor the more a man con, the more worth he ys."

"Eight years after the Saxon proclamation of Henry the Third, the first French statute was enacted. Mr. Hallam notices a proclamation of Edward the First in Fœdera, where he endeavours to excite his subjects against the King of France, by imputing to him the intention of conquering the country, and abolishing the English language; which is frequently repeated in the proclamations of Edward the Third. It is still more singular that the preamble of the statute of 18th Edward III., st. 2, which is itself in French, alleges the very same imputation against the French King. However, in this reign we find the oldest English instrument known to exist; it bears the date of 1343; and in 1362, a statute, written in Norman-French, was passed, requiring that all pleas in courts of justice should be pleaded, debated, and decided in English. Rymer has inserted an instrument in English, dated 1385. Ralph Higden, about the latter part of the reign of Edward the Third, says that gentlemen's children are taught to speak French from the time they are rocked in the cradle; and uplandishmen, (i. e. countrymen, lower classes,) will liken themselves to gentlemen with great business for to speak French, for to be the more told of; which is the very remark made by Robert of Gloucester. Chaucer, in his Prologue to the "Prioress's Tale," notices the French taught in the schools at this time, with great contempt—

"And French she spake ful fetously
After the scole at Stratforde at Bowe,
For French of Paris was to her unknowe."

Sir John Cavendish, Lord Chief Justice, who was beheaded 5th Richard the Second, 1382, made his will partly in Latin and partly in French; assigning as the reason of his deviation from the first to the second, that the French language was more natural to himself, and was more common and better known than the Latin; but of English he takes no notice. The Rolls of Parliament do not contain more than three or four entries in English before the reign of Henry the Sixth; after whose accession the use of the language became common in these records; but French continued to be the language of the Court so lately as the reign of Henry the Eighth; and from an epigram of Sir Thomas More, quoted by Daines Barrington, it appears to have been no better than that of Stratford-le-Bow:

"Crescit tamen, sibique nimirum placet,
Verbis tribut si quid loquatur Gallice;
Aut Gallicis si quid nequit vocabulis,
Conatur id licet verbis non Gallicis,
Canore saltum personare Gallico."

An article in the Gentleman's Magazine, for the present month, shows that "French of Stratford at Bowe" meant, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, no French at all, but simply English; and that two English Envoys in 1404, informed the French Ambassadors with whom they were sent to treat, that they were as ignorant of French as of Hebrew.

The second book relates to "Popular Customs and Superstitions, connected with dates;" and we have seldom met with more curious or amusing matter. The third book is "on Ancient Kalendars;" and contains copies of several kalendars of early periods, used at different places. The second volume consists of a "Glossary" of Saints' Days, and of the terms used in dating ecclesiastical and other instruments; which exhibits learning and industry, and is the fullest and most complete glossary of the kind that we are acquainted with.

BIBLICAL RESEARCHES IN PALESTINE.

TRAVELS—Biblical Researches in Palestine, Mount Sinai, and Arabia Petræa: a Journal of Travels in the year 1838, by E. Robinson and E. Smith; undertaken in reference to Biblical Geography. Drawn up from the original Diaries, with Historical Illustrations, by Edward Robinson, D. D., Professor of Biblical Literature in the Union Theological Seminary, New York, author of a Greek and English Lexicon of the New Testament, &c. With new maps and plans, in five sheets. In three volumes. Murray.

THESE three elaborate and very bulky volumes are the result of a journey made in Palestine and part of Arabia during five or six months of 1838, by Dr. Robinson and Mr. Eli Smith. Dr. Robinson is well known to scholars for his Greek and English Lexicon of the New Testament; as the Professor of Biblical Literature in the Theological Seminary of New York he has trained up many of the American clergy, both pastors and missionaries; and from his earliest years he has regarded Palestine as the object of his hopes, and fed his mind with the idea of perchance seeing it. Mr. Smith was his pupil; and subsequently, as a missionary to the East, travelled through Asia Minor and Persia, acquiring a thorough acquaintance with Arabic, and much knowledge of the Oriental character. Circumstances in 1837 having enabled the friends to perform a journey together in the Promised Land, Dr. Robinson left New York, passed rapidly through England, made some stay in Germany to consult her scholars upon certain points in his intended researches, then went on to Trieste, and reached Egypt by the steamers. In Egypt Dr. Robinson met his friend, and they proceeded together to Mount Sinai; reached Jerusalem by Hebron, through a route rarely traversed, passing midway as it were through the Desert from the head of the Red Sea, leaving Edom on the right hand and the Mediterranean more distantly on the left. At Jerusalem they remained some time, making many investigations in its neighbourhood, and many excursions throughout Palestine; till, having exhausted their subject as far as time permitted, the travellers reached Vienna by Constantinople and the Danube.

Their mode of proceeding was this. To make notes of every object as they journeyed along; to digest these notes at the end of the day's journey, and write out the results, each party selecting such objects as struck him; but Mr. Smith alone attending to names of places, which depended upon accurate verbal communication with the natives. From these journals Dr. Robinson has composed the present work; using his own or his fellow-traveller's diary indiscriminately, excepting such remarks of Mr. Smith relating to points dependent upon language as he could not venture to alter, and the most elaborate of which are printed separately.

The Biblical Researches consist of narrative, disquisition, and history, varied according to the nature of the subject, with sometimes one predominating, sometimes another; but Dr. Robinson's general plan is to give an account of his journey, an enquiry into the identity of the places mentioned in Scripture, with a précis of their history since that period. To follow him through all his excursions at Jerusalem, Nazareth, Tiberias, the Dead Sea, and a long list of etceteras, would be unprofitably diffuse. A notion of the work will be conveyed by a skeleton of the section from Suez to Sinai: it contains—first, an account of the journey and the incidents of the way, with the occurrences during their sojourn in the convent, and a description of their visits to the holy places; second, a critical enquiry whether the popular opinion is correct, respecting the identity of Sinai, and if so, whether it has correctly assigned the localities; third, a history of the convent; fourth, a sketch of the Arab tribes in the vicinity.

The work is by an American, and it was composed in Berlin. We state this because it exhibits a curious mixture of German zeal in minute questions of scholarship with American enthusiasm and freshness respecting things not altogether new to Europeans. With many pleasant pictures of scenery and manners, rendered agreeable by an amiable and tolerant spirit when not very striking by intrinsic novelty, with much learning and much christian zeal, tempered by sense and a discriminating Protestant spirit applied to Scriptural antiquities, frequently productive of interesting discoveries—with a great deal of reading in the christian archæology of the primitive and middle ages, and a critical acumen brought to bear upon the exposure of monkish traditions—the publication is upon the whole rather a storehouse of materials than a finished work. The narrative of the journey is often too minute in detailing uninteresting particulars: the disquisitions would have been better if recast and compressed; and, if the subject of monkish history and tradition in Palestine has interest enough to support itself, it has not sufficient to impart variety and relief to the other sections. The defects we speak of would not, perhaps, have been so perceptible had each part stood alone, with unity of subject and a much greater brevity. As it is, the book consists of various topics requiring various frames of mind to attend to, and rarely having an equal degree of attraction for the reader. Neither do they always stand so entirely alone as to be easily separated without an examination. It must not be denied either, that the size of the book will be somewhat appalling to the general reader. For the religious world and the Biblical scholar the work will be one of high interest; but even for them, we think, it would have had greater attraction had the topography been separated from the travels, and more value compressed into less bulk.

In presenting quotations, we shall have an eye to what may be called the distinguishing features of the book, rather than to those which it possesses in common with every day travels. Here is an example of mingled criticism and description, in an account of the pilgrim's disappointments at the place which monkish tradition has assigned as the actual Mount Sinai.

"My first and predominant feeling while upon this summit, was that of disappointment. Although from our examination of the plain er-Râhah below, and its correspondence to the Scriptural narrative, we had arrived at the general conviction that the people of Israel must have been collected on it to receive the law, yet we still had cherished a lingering hope or feeling, that there might after all be some foundation for the long series of monkish traditions, which for at least fifteen centuries has pointed out the summit on which we now stood as the spot where the Ten Commandments were so awfully proclaimed. But Scriptural narrative and monkish tradition are very different things; and while the former has a distinctness and definiteness, which through all our journeyings rendered the Bible our best guide-book, we found the latter not less usually and almost regularly to be but a baseless fabric. In the present case, there is not the slightest reason for supposing that Moses had any thing to do with the summit which now bears his name. It is three miles distant from the plain on which the Israelites must have stood, and hidden from it by the intervening peaks of the modern Horeb. No part of the plain is visible from the summit, nor are the bottoms of the adjacent valleys; nor is any spot to be seen around it where the people could have been assembled. The only point in which it is not immediately surrounded by high mountains, is towards the S. E., where it sinks down precipitously to a tract of naked gravelly hills.

In the course of the day's excursion, however, the pilgrims stumbled upon a promising place, and made the discovery of

THE TRUE MOUNT SINAI.

While the monks were employed in lighting tapers and burning incense, we determined to scale the almost inaccessible peak of es-Sufsâfeh before us, in order to look out upon the plain, and judge for ourselves as to the adaptedness of this part of the mount to the circumstance of the Scriptural history. This cliff rises some five hundred feet above the basin; and the distance to the summit is more than half a mile. We first attempted to climb the side in a direct course, but found the rock so smooth and precipitous, that after some falls and a few exposures, we were obliged to give it up, and clamber upwards along a steep ravine by a more northern and circuitous course. From the head of this ravine we were able to climb around the face of the nothern precipice and reach the top, along the deep hollows worn in the granite by the weather during the lapse of ages, which give to this part, as seen from below, the appearance of architectural ornament.

The extreme difficulty and even danger of the ascent, was well rewarded by the prospect that now opened before us. The whole plain er-Râhah lay spread out beneath our feet, with the adjacent Wayds and mountains; while Wady esh-Sheikh on the right, and the recess on the left, both connected with and opening broadly from er-Râhah, presented an area which serves nearly to double that of the plain. Our conviction was strengthened, that here or on some one of the adjacent cliffs was the spot where the Lord "descended in fire" and proclaimed the law. Here lay the plain where the whole congregation might be assembled; here was the mount that could be approached and touched, if not forbidden; and here the mountain-brow, where alone the lightnings and the thick cloud would be visible, and the thunders and the voice of the trump be heard, when the Lord "came down in the sight of all the people upon Mount Sinai." We gave ourselves up to the impressions of the awful scene, and read with a feeling that will never be forgotten, the sublime account of the transaction and the commandments there promulgated, in the original words as recorded by the great Hebrew legislator.

Jerusalem rather exceeded the expectations of our travellers: they did not find it so dirty or so sordid as previous descriptions led them to expect. Nor did they experience any interruption in their examination and surveys—less, in fact, than they would have done at home. The degradation of the Christian ceremonies at Jerusalem, however, answered all that they had read of,—that is, of the Catholic church, for the Greek they did not go to see.

EASTER AT JERUSALEM.

The different sets of christians who have possession of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre had of course been compelled to alternate in their occupancy of it, and in the performance of their religious ceremonies. On this last "high day" of the festival, the Greeks held their grand mass at the Sepulchre before the break of day; and the Latins followed at nine o'clock. I looked in for a few moments, with my friend Mr. Homes, upon this latter ceremonial. Few persons were present except those engaged in the service. These few were all below in the body of the church; in the galleries there were no spectators. The reputed sepulchre, as is well known, stands in the middle of the spacious rotunda, directly beneath the centre of the great dome, which is open to the sky. The high altar was placed directly before the door of the sepulchre; so that we could not enter the latter. The ceremonies we saw consisted only in a procession of the monks and others marching around the sepulchre; stopping occasionally to read a portion of the gospel; and then again advancing with chanting and singing. I was struck with the splendour of their robes, stiff with embroidery of silver and gold, the well-meant offerings probably of Catholics out of every country of Europe; but I was not less struck with the vulgar and unmeaning visages that peered out from these costly vestments. The wearers looked more like ordinary ruffians than like ministers of the cross of Christ.—Indeed, there is reason to believe that the Latin monks in Palestine are actually, for the most part, ignorant and often illiterate men, chiefly from Spain, the refuse of her monks and clergy, who come or are sent hither as into a sort of exile, where they serve to excite the sympathies and the misplaced charities of the Catholics of Europe. There was hardly a face among all those before us that could be called intelligent. A few fine looking French naval officers, and one or two Irish Catholics, had joined the procession, but seemed quite out of place, and as if ashamed of their companions.

I make these remarks merely as relating a matter of fact, and not, I trust, out of any prejudice against the Romish Church or her clergy. I had once spent the Holy Week in Rome itself; and there admired the intelligent and noble countenance of many of the clergy and monks congregated in that city. For this very reason the present contrast struck me the more forcibly and disagreeably. The whole scene indeed was, to a Protestant, painful and revolting. It might perhaps have been less so had there been manifested the slightest degree of faith in the genuineness of the surrounding objects; but even the monks themselves do not pretend that the present sepulchre is any thing more than an imitation of the original. But to be in the ancient city of the Most High, and to see these venerated places, and the very name of our holy religion profaned by idle and lying mummeries, while the proud Mussulman looks on with haughty scorn—all this excited in my mind a feeling too painful to be borne, and I never visited the place again.

PROTESTANT WORSHIP AND MISSIONS AT JERUSALEM.

We now repaired to the house of Mr. Whiting, where, in a large upper room, our friends had long established regular divine service in English every Sunday; in which they were assisted by Mr. Nicolayson, the able missionary of the English Church, sent out hither by the London Missionary Society for the Jews. We found a very respectable congregation, composed of all the missionary families, besides several European travellers of rank and name. It was, I presume, the largest Protestant congregation ever collected within the walls of the Holy City; and it was gratifying to see Protestants of various names here laying aside all distinctions, and uniting with one heart to declare by their example, in Jerusalem itself, that "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." The simplicity and spirituality of the Protestant worship was to me affecting and doubly pleasing, in contrast with the pageant which we had just been spectators.

Early in the afternoon, we were also present at the service in Arabic, which the same missionaries had established in the house of Mr. Lanneau, and which was then regularly attended by some twenty or thirty Arab Christians of the Greek rite. These were men of respectable appearance, merchants and others, and seemed to yield attention to the things which they heard.

It may not be out of place here to remark, that the object of the American missions to Syria and other parts of the Levant, is not to draw off members of the Oriental churches to Protestantism, but to awaken them to a knowledge and belief of the gospel truth in the purity and simplicity of its original scriptural form. To this end all the efforts of the missionaries are directed, in the hope that individuals thus enlightened, and remaining, if they choose, within the pale of their own churches, may by degrees become instrumental in infusing into the latter life and vigour, and a love of the truth, before which the various forms of error and superstition will of themselves vanish away. The missionaries would seem thus to have taken the proper course, in going forward simply as preachers of the gospel, and not as the direct assailants of specific errors; striving to overcome darkness by diffusing light, and not by denouncing it as gross darkness. True, in this way they make less noise; for the mere presentation of truth excites less opposition than the calling in question of long cherished error; but, with the blessing of God, they are likely to reap a more abundant harvest, and exert a larger and more lasting influence in the moral regeneration of the East.

We will close with a few extracts of a miscellaneous character, as specimens of the narrative of the travels.

ARAB SALE OF PROVISIONS.

The poor kid was now let loose, and ran bleating into our tent as if aware of its coming fate. All was activity and bustle to prepare the coming feast; the kid was killed and dressed with great dexterity and despatch; and its still quivering members were laid upon the fire, and began to emit savoury odours, particularly gratifying to Arab nostrils. But now a change came over the fair scene. The Arabs of whom we had bought the kid had in some way learned that we were to encamp near; and naturally enough concluding that the kid was bought in order to be eaten, they thought good to honour our Arabs with a visit, to the number of five or six persons. Now the stern law of Bedawin hospitality demands, that whenever a guest is present at a meal, whether there be much or little, the first and best portion must be laid before the stranger. In this instance, the five or six guests attained their object, and had not only the selling of the kid, but also the eating of it; while our poor Arabs, whose mouths had long been watering with expectation, were forced to take up with the fragments. Beshârah, who played the host, fared worst of all; and came afterwards to beg for a biscuit, saying he had lost the whole of his dinner.

ARAB TOPOGRAPHERS.

We found that our guides of to-day and yesterday, both old and young, knew very little of distant mountains and objects; while they were familiarly acquainted with those near at hand. It was only after long and repeated examination and cross-questioning, that my companion could be sure of any correctness as to more remote objects; since at first they often gave answers at random, which they afterwards modified or took back. The young man Sâlim was the most intelligent of the whole. After all our pains, many of the names we obtained were different from those which Burckhardt heard; although his guides apparently were of the same tribe. A tolerably certain method of finding any place at will is to ask an Arab if its name exists. He is sure to answer yes, and to point out some spot at hand as its location. In this way, I have no doubt, we might have found Rephidim or Marah, or any other place we chose; and such is probably the mode in which many ancient names and places have been discovered by travellers, which no one has ever been able to find after them.

BEDAWIN LAW.

The following are some of the peculiarities of the Bedawin law—a law not of statute but of prescription, and as binding as the common law of England. If a Bedawy owes another, and refuses to pay, the creditor takes two or three men as witnesses of the refusal. He then seizes or steals, if he can, a camel or something else belonging to the debtor, and deposits it with a third person. This brings the case to trial before the judge; and the debtor forfeits the article seized. The Bedawin in their quarrels avoid beating each other with a stick or with the fist, as disreputable; this being the punishment of slaves and children, and a great indignity to a man. If it takes place, the sufferer is entitled to very high damages. Their code of honour allows blows to be given only with the sword or with a gun; and by these the sufferer feels himself far less aggrieved. In a quarrel of this kind where swords have been used, if the case be brought to trial, a fine is imposed on the party least wounded large enough to counterbalance the excess of blows or injury received by the other party. The degree of offence, or provocation, or claim, is of no account; it being taken for granted that nothing can justify a quarrel, and that all such occurrences must be tried on their own simple merits.

BEDAWIN RELIGION.

The Muhammedanism of all these sons of the desert sits very loosely upon them. They bear the name of followers of the False Prophet; and the few religious ideas which they possess are moulded after his precepts. Their nominal religion is a matter of habit, of inheritance, of national prescription; but they seemed to manifest little attachment to it in itself, and live in the habitual neglect of most of its external forms. We never saw any among them repeat the usual Muhammedan prayers, in which other Muslims are commonly so punctual; and were told, indeed, that many never attempt it, and that very few among them even know the proper words and forms of prayer. The men generally observe the fast of Ramadân, though some do not; nor do the females keep it. Nor is the duty of pilgrimage more regarded; for, according to Tuweiled, not more than two or three of all the Tâwarah had ever made the journey to Mecca. The profaneness of the Bedawin is excessive, and almost incredible. "Their mouth is full of cursing," and we were hardly able to obtain a single answer that did not contain an oath.

THE GIRL AND THE PHILOSOPHER.

As Kate went tripping up the town
(No lassie e'er looked prettier,)
An "unco chiel" in cap and gown
(No mortal e'er looked grittier)
Accosted Kitty in the street,
As she was going to cross over,
And robb'd her of a kiss—the cheat,
Saying, "I'm a Philosopher!"
"A what!" said Kitty, blushing red,
And gave his cap a toss over;
"Are you? Oh, phi!" and off she sped,
Whilst he bewail'd the "los-oph-er!"

CONTINENTAL POLITICS.

Paris, Wednesday, July 14.

My budget for this week is small, for the English elections still engross the almost exclusive attention of our politicians. Upon the whole men of all parties here seem to rejoice exceedingly at the defeat and discomfiture of the whigs. "Come what may," say the French liberals, "we cannot have a more rabid hater of France than Lord Palmerston." The conservatives, or rather the conservateurs (forgive me the use of the French term, for there is a vast distinction between French and English conservatives) are delighted that the whigs will soon be out of office—"those treacherous whigs," who hate the French alliance. The royalists rejoice that a party is coming into power in Great Britain, which respects ancient institutions, although they can scarcely forgive us yet for the prompt recognition of the July revolution. The republicans, perhaps, are the most discontented at the triumph of the conservatives in England; not from the slightest respect entertained for the whigs, but because, in the defeat of the latter, they see a further remove from the establishment of democracy or chartism, the reaction of which they hoped would have its effect in this country. Certainly never did a party manage to bring down upon itself such collected contempt and hatred as the disgraced whigs. Mixing amongst men of all nations in this capital of every shade of political opinion, I have in vain sought for an expression of sympathy for a fallen party; for, to speak frankly, I am somewhat annoyed to hear so much vituperation poured forth on men who are, at all events, my fellow-countrymen, and who I really would be glad to defend, if it were possible in a foreign country, not for themselves individually, but from a principle of nationality. I was silenced the other evening in my apologetic strain for the whig-radical cabinet, as I was urging something to diminish the humiliating sarcasms of a German diplomatist, by the quaint quotation, "In statesmen, faults are crimes." I have, however, the consolation, that the speedy coming into office of the able and patriotic men destined to hold the reins of power in England, may remedy in time, the blunders of their predecessors, and restore our tarnished reputation on the continent; for, depend upon it, that although British valour and determination are appropriately appreciated abroad, our diplomacy, as evinced in the eastern question, is held at a very cheap rate. What is now asked is "Cui bono the treaty of July?" To preserve the integrity of the Ottoman Empire?—Why, it is tumbling to pieces. To depose the Pacha of Egypt?—He remains stronger than ever; for the discordant elements of Syria have been taken away from him, and he has a powerful fleet and army, which nobody believes he intends to diminish. Then, if Lord Palmerston consents with Russia, to allow France to re-enter the European concert, by the signing of the convention relative to the Dardanelles and Bosphorus, as ardently desired by Austria and Prussia, it will be to fall back on a state of things analagous to that prior to the signing of the treaty of July, with this essential difference—that France then was incapable of going to war, and therefore did not; but that now she is prepared, and, if permitted to go on arming, will shortly be able to throw down the gauntlet of defiance to more than one power, having effectually managed to detach Austria and Prussia from the Quadruple Alliance. This is the precious Palmerstonian legacy of which he bragged so much at Tiverton, where, by-the-bye, he was guilty either of the highest indiscretion or of the foulest designs against the foreign secretary who is to replace him. Was it prudent for him to utter what he did respecting the war in Africa, however true, at a moment when the relations with France had not been restored to their former footing, or was it simply to produce exasperation here, to embarrass the minister who will have to treat with the present cabinet? M. Guizot, to whom some person was addressing warm remarks at the language of Lord Palmerston, quiety replied, "Il nous fait ses adieux." This was both cutting and in good taste; but I would much rather that a British minister had not exposed himself to a contemptuous retort in this manner.

The emeutes at Toulouse, consequent upon the harsh fiscal regulations of the new minister of finance, the fortifications, and the question of electorial reform, have been the principal points of domestic interest. In respect to the former, the telegraphic despatch in this morning's Moniteur proves that they were more serious than at first stated. After announcing for two days consecutively that order was perfectly restored, we are now told that, on the 12th, the house of the obnoxious prefect was attacked, but that the insurgents were repulsed. "Energetically," says one account, which means at the loss of life. We are told, also, that this attack emanated from the secret societies, meaning, I presume, the republicans. Toulouse is a rich city, the population of which is nearly equally divided into royalists and republicans. The Louis Phillippist party in the town is very small. The legitimatists are the persons of rank and influence, and have been remarkably careful in abstaining from any violent demonstrations. The present disturbances have, therefore, resulted from the republicans. But now remains the question which time will show.—Was this movement a premeditated one, or was it provoked by the police? I have strong suspicions that these troubles and disorders have been the work of incendiary agents. It is an infernal policy (of which M. Guizot is totally incapable,) but it is nevertheless notorious, that, for the last ten years a power higher than the cabinet, having at its disposal a police of its own, has resorted to the instigation of riots for the purpose of an exhibition of strength. This secret and powerful action has, without a doubt, been resorted to in many emeutes; and, what renders the transactions at Toulouse so mysterious is, that the republican leaders in Paris who are in active correspondence with the chiefs in the departments, profess to be totally ignorant of the rioters who began the disturbances. I have frequently mentioned that, since the July treaty, new tactics had been pursued here by the revolutionists, and that the mot d'ordre has been to avoid emeutes, and to prevent any collision with the authorities. How perfect this organisation has been was established at Napoleon's funeral, and on the fête days, but more recently and strikingly at the interment of Garnier Pagès.

The agitation for electoral reform is actively going on, and the government has been alive to its danger, for it knows that the parliamentary revolution now progressing would be more fatal than a hundred emeutes. The other day one of the inferior courts had to try several persons for belonging to the Communist Societies (of which Darmès, the regicide, was asserted to be a member,) and to—what is more important—associations to procure a change in the electoral law. The court acquitted the accused on the ground (although not stated in the judgment) that these associations were not illegal. The very unusual occurrence of an appeal of the advocate-general against this sentence was made to the Cour Royale, and this tribunal has reversed the decision of the correctional police, declared the societies and associations illegal, ordered their suppression, and sentenced the prisoners to various terms of imprisonment. A further appeal has been lodged by the condemned to the Court of Cassation against the judgment of the Cour Royale; but from the composition of the former I regard the confirmation of the latter's verdict as very probable. I foresee, therefore, that this is a great blow aimed at electoral reform, for if organised associations and committees are put down, the getting up of petitions, Arago tours of agitation in the departments, reform banquets, &c., will soon be suppressed.

As to the wordy warfare on the fortifications, the complaint still being that the detached forts are rearing their crests, and the enceinte continue is but in a partial state of erection, we shall have ample opportunities of discussing this matter hereafter, when the affair assumes, as it will assume, a more serious aspect. The liberal fools! to imagine for a moment that these fortifications were ever intended for foreign invasion. The revolutionists are properly punished, but the full measure of their asinine stupidity has yet to be completed.

A NEGRO BOY IN THE WEST INDIES.

The negro boys there are the most cunning imps I have ever had to do with. I recollect on my last voyage to Jamaica, while my vessel was lying in St. Anne's bay, I had to go to Port Maria to look for some cargo; and on my way thither, near Ora Cabeça, I came to one of the numerous small rivers that empty themselves into the little bays along the coast—I think it was the Salt Gut. When at some distance, I had observed a negro boy belabouring a mule most heartily; but before I got up he had left off his thumping and dismounted, and now appeared in earnest talk with his beast, which, with fore-legs stretched out firm, and ears laid down, seemed proof against all arguments to induce him to enter the water. Quashie was all animation, and his eyes flashed like fire-flies.

"Who—o! you no go ober? Berry well—me bet you fippenny me make you go—No! Why for you no bet?—why for you no go ober?" Here the mule shook his ears to drive off the flies, which almost devour the poor animals in that climate. "Oh! you do bet—berry well—den me try."

The young rascal (he was not more than ten years old) disappeared in the bush, and returned in a few seconds with some strips of fan-weed, a few small pebbles, and a branch of the cactus plant. To put three or four pebbles in each of the mule's ears, and tie them up with the fan-weed, was but the work of a minute. He then jumped on the animal's back, turned round, put the plant to his tail, and off they went, as a negro himself would say, "like mad, massa." Into the water they plunged—the little fellow grinning and showing his teeth in perfect ecstasy. Out they got on the other side—head and ears down—tail and heels up—and the boy's arms flying about as if they did not belong to him; and I lost sight of him as he went over the rocky steep at full gallop, where one false step would have precipitated them into the sea beneath, from whence there would have been but small chance of escape. No, no, a butcher's boy is nothing to a negro boy—the one may ride like the deuce, but the other is the very deuce himself riding.

"Did you see any more of him, sir?" enquired a young lady opposite.

"Yes, madam, about two hours afterwards I reached Port Maria, and in an open space near the stores, there sat, or rather lay, young Quashie eating cakes; and there also stood the mule, eating guinea-grass, and looking much more cheerful than when I first saw him at the Salt Gut. 'Well, Quashie,' I said, 'you have got here I see, but which of you won!'—'Quashie win, massa—Quashie never lose.' —'But will he pay?' I enquired.—'Quashie pay himself, massa. You see, Massa Buccra, massa gib Quashie tenpenny-bit for grass for mule. Quashie bet fippeny him make him go ober de Gut—Quashie win—Quashie hab fippenny for cake, muld hab fippenny for grass.'" Omnibus.

THE GRAVE OF THE SUICIDE (WHO THOUGHT BETTER OF IT.)

My eye grew as dull as a half-scallop'd oyster,
And soon would my death in the Times have rejoiced her;
So to Battersea-fields, for no meadows are moister,
I hurried to drown both myself and my woes.
Down life's sunny stream many seasons I'd floated
Till pleasures now bored me, on which I had doted;
So I vowed that my death should by lovers be quoted
Where the pale, sentimental asparagus grows.

Alas! I exclaim'd, with a half-broken hiccup,
The soft crumbs of comfort no more can I pick up;
My sorrows are mix'd as it were in a tea-cup,
Without any sugar to take off the taste.
But sorrows are often inflicted to try us;
Kind fortune, invisibly, often stands by us;
And now on the roof of the famous eel-pie house
The blinker-eyed goddess was luckily placed.

She kindly assured me my views were mistaken,
That really by Betty I wasn't forsaken;
So I walk'd back to town and got into the Fakenham coach, to return to my Betty again.
Four lovers already had tried to divert her
Attentions from me, but their eagerness hurt her;
She said that she knew that I wouldn't desert her,
And now is the suicide gayest of men!

MRS. NOBLE'S NARRATIVE OF HER CAPTIVITY AND SUFFERINGS IN PRISON IN CHINA IN 1840-1, IN A LETTER TO A FRIEND.

Ningpo Prison, Feb. 19, 1841.

My ever dear Friend,—On Sunday, the 14th, I received your kind letter, containing the glad tidings of peace, and the joyful hope of a speedy release from prison; and in which you so sweetly and affectionately offer a home to the homeless. The Almighty alone, who searcheth the heart, knows how deeply grateful I feel for all your abundant goodness towards me in my great afflictions, but, as my last letters were sent publicly, I could not express my feelings; I sincerely hope you have not thought me ungrateful. As I may now do so with safety, I will try to write to you the sad particulars of the dreadful wreck of the Kite, and of following events, as far as memory and the few notes I have been able to make from time to time will enable me to do. May the Almighty in mercy strengthen me for the truly melancholy duty. Amen. And I feel sure, my dear friend, you will make due allowance for the state of mind in which I write.

I shall infer that you know all our affairs up to, I think, the 10th of September, when the Kite was again on her way to Chusan; all went well to the 15th, and we then hoped to reach Chusan in two days. Alas for earthly prospects, they are indeed fallacious! About twelve o'clock in the forenoon the vessel struck on an awful quicksand, not laid down in the chart. The shock was as sudden as it was dreadful; all efforts at the moment were used, but in vain, and in a few moments—almost before we could think, or speak, or, alas! even have time to fetch my sweet child from the cabin—the vessel went over with a tremendous crash on her broadside, and every creature on board (except my dear child) was precipitated with great violence into the sea. The moment was so dreadful I saw nothing, and, whether my beloved husband, who was giving orders till the last moment, ran to the cabin to save his darling child, or whether he fell with the rest, I know not; but alas! he was never seen nor heard of more. His last words to me were, "Hold on, Anne!"—never, never, shall I forget them. My sweet child must have perished in his cradle. I tremble to think of the sufferings of both. Oh! how often have I wished I had shared the same grave, yet the will of God was otherwise, and I know it is very wicked, but when you know my almost unparalleled suffering you will not wonder at it. To return to the wreck. After struggling under water for some time I caught hold of one of the iron bars that held the boat on the quarter, to which I clung, my body being still in the water, and the breakers coming over me with great force. A poor little dog saved itself on my breast for some time, but at last I was obliged to put it off; oh! had it been my darling child, I would have died rather a thousand times. Lieutenant Douglas arose close by me, and although for a time he could not help me, yet I shall ever remember with the deepest gratitude the kind manner in which he stood by me, doing all in his power to soothe me, and, by his orders, to save the lives of all. Oh! could I picture to you the scene at this moment—the vessel on her broadside, her masts and sails in the water, numbers of persons rising, and clinging to the wreck, the horror of every countenance, and the dreadful noise of the breakers; but it is too much even to tell you I saw it all—never, never shall I forget the sight. Lieutenant Douglas, with Mr. Witts, the chief officer, who now kindly came forward to my aid, did all in their power to save me, and they were, by the blessing of God, the means of preserving my unhappy life. These two gentlemen, with the poor cabin boys, got into the boat. I had just strength to raise my foot, of which one of the gentlemen took hold, drew the boat to, and lifted me in. The boat being nearly full of water, and the breakers still coming over it every moment, the gentlemen were obliged to cut the rope to prevent her sinking. The current immediately took her, and nothing could prevent her from leaving the wreck. The people had now got on the upper side of the vessel. I strained my eyes in vain to find those so dear to me. I saw all but them. I tore my hair in despair, and called till they could hear me no longer, telling them to seek my husband and child. Hour after hour the wreck was seen; at last we lost sight of it entirely. You will fancy me weeping and screaming all this time; I assure you no. My trouble was too overwhelming; I could not shed a tear, although my heart was fit to break; I sat more like a statue, my eyes seeking in vain for the wreck. The boat's little kedger was thrown out, and the water rushing by was almost like a wall on either side of our boat. We saw many things washed from the wreck pass us. About four o'clock the current turned in our favour, and after some hours of anxiety we came in sight of the wreck. As we drew near, we found the vessel had sunk in the sand, and only her maintop was now in sight, to which all the poor sufferers clung for life. Efforts were made to reach the wreck, but it was impossible. Lieutenant Douglas spoke to the men and told them to make a raft, hoping on the morrow to be able to render them some assistance. We now again left the wreck, and night began to set in; the gentlemen lay down on the bottom of the boat, and I sat and kept watch by the stars. It was a beautiful moonlight night, but I need not say it appeared very long, and often did I speak to Lieutenant Douglas who slept very little.

On the 16th we again passed the wreck early, and, as before, strove in vain to reach the poor crew. A few words were spoken until we were carried away by the current. In the afternoon we passed the wreck for the last time; every thing possible was done to reach it, but to no purpose; and after speaking a few words, once more we had to endure the trial of being carried past. What our feelings were, none but those in a like situation can conceive. It was now again night, and, as before I kept my melancholy watch. After this we could not find the wreck, and we were obliged to come to the dreadful conclusion that all the crew must have perished, or have been taken from the wreck by the Chinese. I now felt almost sure that I was a widow, and all alone in the world; but yet I think I hoped even against hope, and Lieutenant Douglas, who was most kind to me, led me to believe such happiness possible. Oh! could I only tell you all the kindness I received from that dear gentleman. One remark he made when I felt myself almost heart-broken, was, "Depend on it, my dear Mrs. Noble, the Almighty has preserved you for a future and a better purpose." Thus did he at all times, in the most kind and soothing manner, try to cheer my truly sad heart. Picture for a moment our situation—five of us in a small boat, with little clothing—the gentlemen but thinly clad, and myself in a thin morning gown, no bonnet, no shawl, and no shoes, the latter having been washed off; no food, no water, no sail, only two oars, and near an enemy's country. On this day we went on board a fishing-boat; the men were kind to us, and gave us a little dry rice, some water, and an old mat to try to make a sail of. Soon after we thought we saw a small English sail; never shall I forget the excitement we felt; but, after a long time, found we were mistaken. Towards evening we picked up a small pumpkin, of which I took a little, the first food I had taken since the wreck. Whilst we were thus driven about from place to place, again we thought we saw a steamer, and we did all in our power to make them observe us, raising a signal of distress on one of our oars, and once more we were as before disappointed. On Wednesday night the breakers came over our little boat with such violence, that we thought we should have sunk; it washed away one of our oars, and we were all wet through, but still the Almighty preserved us, glory be to his holy name! Lieutenant Douglas and myself had a prayer together, in which we thanked God for all his past mercies, and asked his future protection; we were very cold, but felt comforted. Thursday the 17th, we boarded another boat and asked them to take us to Chusan, which they promised to do, but to which the master of the party would not accede. However, they took us up a canal and told us, that was the way. It now began to rain a little, and at night we found ourselves in a small creek, with numbers of Chinamen round us. They appeared kind, and brought us a little boiled rice. Wonderful to say, although we had been so long without food, not one in the boat complained of hunger, and of the rice now brought very little was eaten; the rain now fell fast, and we all lay down in the bottom of the boat, and laid the old mat over the top. About 12 o'clock I thought I heard footsteps, and on looking up saw about twenty Chinamen round our boat, carrying gay lanterns. I awoke Lieutenant Douglas in alarm; however, they still appeared kind and gave us more food. In the morning, it being very wet, we went barefooted to a Chinaman's house. After sitting a short time, they told us that they would get us something to eat, and then take us to Chusan. We followed; they took us to a temple for shelter from the rain. One of the party now left us, and we began to suspect that all was not right, and set off to regain our boat. Alas! it was too late. We had scarcely ascended the bank, when, on looking behind, we saw a large party of soldiers, a mandarin, and numbers of Chinese pursuing us. We saw at once we were betrayed; flight was impossible, resistance as vain. I was leaning on Lieutenant Douglas's arm; he stood boldly in my defence, but it was of no use, for they struck me several times. They then put chains around our necks, hurrying us along a path, not half a yard in breadth, to a large city, through every street of which they led us. The people thronged by thousands to stare, so that we could scarcely pass. Their savage cries were terrific. From this they led us to a temple full of soldiers, and one of the wretches stole my wedding ring from my finger, the only thing I treasured. Alas! that I was not to keep that one dear pledge of my husband's affection. They then set a table and wrote Chinese, asking whether we understood it. Never shall I forget that temple, their fierce grimaces and savage threats. Hitherto Lieutenant Douglas had been my only friend, and, I think I may say that we have been a mutual comfort to one another throughout our sufferings. But we were now to part. The soldiers bound Lieutenant Douglas's hands behind him and tied him to a post, and in this situation I was forced from him. We took an affectionate leave of one another, as friends never expecting to meet again, until we met in Heaven. He gave me his black silk handkerchief to tie round my waist, which I shall ever treasure as a remembrance of that truly sad moment. We anticipated death in its most cruel form, and I think, I could say, surely the bitterness of death is past. I now felt indeed alone. Mr. Witts, one of the boys, and myself were now again dragged through the rain, and my feet being bare slipped at every step, and they were at last obliged to bring me a pair of straw sandals. I was obliged to hang to the coat of a tall man who held me by the chain. We must have looked wretched in the extreme, our clothes being much covered with dirt as well as drenched with rain. My hair hung dishevelled round my neck. In this state we must have walked at least twenty miles, and passed through numberless cities, all the inhabitants of which crowded around us; their hooting and savage yells were frightful. We twice passed through water nearly up to our waist. After having reached a temple, we were allowed to rest ourselves on some stones. They gave us here some prison clothes and food. At night they laid down some mats and a quilt, on either side of a large temple. Mr. Witts and the boy took one side, and after a short prayer to my Almighty Heavenly Father I lay down, but not to sleep; the chain round our necks being fastened to the wall. Would that I could describe to you the scene;—the temple beautifully lighted up with lanterns, or miserable beds and more miserable selves, all the dark faces of the frightful-looking Chinese (of whom I think there were eight) the smoke from their long pipes;—the din of the gongs and other noises which they kept up all night were indeed horrid. Long, very long, did this night appear. Morning at last dawned, and the keepers brought us a little water to wash with, which was a great comfort; after which they led us to an open court, to be exposed to the public gaze of numberless spectators to come throughout the day. Here they took our height, the length of our hair, and noted every feature in an exact manner, and then made us write an account of the wreck of the Kite. In the evening I was taken to see the mandarin's wife and daughters, but although my appearance must have been wretched in the extreme they did not evince the least feeling towards me, but rather treated me as an object of scorn. This I felt the more, as I was unable to make them understand that I had lost both my dear husband and child in the wreck. We remained here two days and three nights, derided and taunted by all around us. On the morning of Monday, the 21st, they took the end of our chains and bade us follow them. They put our coats and quilts into small cages, just such as we should think a proper place to confine a wild beast in; mine was scarcely a yard high, little more than three-quarters of a yard long, and a little more than half a yard broad. The door opened from the top. Into these we were lifted, the chains round our necks being locked to the cover. They put a long piece of bamboo through the middle, a man took either end, and in this manner we were jolted from city to city, to suffer insults from the rabble, the cries of whom were awful; but my God had not forsaken me, and even then, although a widow and in the hands of such bitter enemies, and expecting death at every moment, I could remember with delight, that Christ my Saviour had said—"I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth on me, though he were dead yet shall he live;" and through the blessing of the Almighty, I was enabled to sing praises to God aloud. I need not tell you, my dear and much loved friend, how much I thought of my sweet and once happy home, and my dear fatherless child, and how fervently I prayed to that God of mercy and goodness, who had so wonderfully upheld me in all my sufferings, to bless her also. Death was nothing to me; I longed to be with my Saviour to praise him for ever, and to meet again my affectionate husband and sweet child, who were more than life to me. Oh my dear friend, how often do my feelings at this and many other times of my sufferings shame me, when I feel myself cold in my duty towards my Redeemer. In body I was now very weak, having scarcely eaten any thing since the wreck, but my spirit was strong in the Lord. We again stopped at another city and were taken out of our cages, having heavy irons put on our legs, and a chain half a yard long. Mr. Witts and the boy had also irons on their wrists; although I saw mine, they did not put them on at that time. The former were carried on board one boat, and I myself put into another, and thus we proceeded two days and three nights on a canal, during which time I did not taste any food, as they would not permit me to get out of my little cage on any account. You may judge what my sufferings were. I believe it was Wednesday the 23d, that we arrived at Ningpo. You may imagine my happiness in finding my dear friend Lieutenant Douglas, and my delight to hear that he had been treated rather better than myself, and had arrived here a short time before. I also heard with gratitude and joy, that all the Kite's crew had been taken from the wreck by the Chinese and were prisoners in the city. But alas, alas! with all this good news my worst fears were confirmed, that all I treasured lay buried in the ocean. What can I say—my dear child could not have lived in an open boat and suffered as I had done, and my devoted husband, being of a warm and most affectionate temper, would not have lived to have seen me suffer as I have suffered, and how would it have torn my heart to have seen those, ten thousand times dearer to me than my own life, endure so much. I humbly pray to be enabled to say, "thy will be done!" God has, I believe, in goodness and mercy taken my treasures, who was able to do for them more than I could even ask or think. And although I am left destitute and alone, and far from home, yet in his mercy he has raised you up, my truly Christian friend, with many others, for my comfort on my account, of which I shall praise the Saviour both in time and eternity, and want whatever I may, may I ever possess a thankful heart.

At Ningpo I was sorry to find another prisoner, Captain Anstruther of the Madras artillery, who has since proved to me a most kind and true friend; there was also the compradore, whom I think you have some knowledge of. My most cruel sufferings were now at an end, and of course I felt more deeply my sad loss; yet I knew that I still enjoyed many blessings. Captain A.'s prison was next door to mine, and I had the pleasure of seeing him often. The mandarins gave me some Chinese cloths of the gayest colours; distressing as it was to my feelings, I was obliged to wear them, and I was put into what the keeper styled a clean prison with a woman to attend on me in my captivity. After breakfasting with Lieutenant Douglas at the mandarin's I went to my lonely cell,—a small dirty room, two sides of which were a mere grating, in many places day-light appeared through the rafters, and it was scarcely fit to live in, its only furniture being my cage (in which I still slept at night, and into which I was put whenever I went to any of the mandarins,) a lamp, an old table, and a stool. For the first time after the wreck, I was enabled to undress myself and arrange my hair. I could not but rejoice when a large room was prepared for the three gentlemen to reside together in—Lieutenant Douglas having been hitherto obliged to endure all the discomforts of the common prison,—although it deprived me of the company of my friend. Subsequently we met only when we visited and dined at the mandarins, which we did at first frequently, but after their curiosity was satisfied I seldom saw them. When at their house, they amused themselves by questioning us about her Britannic Majesty and her government, the number of her navy and army, and the rank and income of the officers. Often I had to repeat my sad tale, particularly on the arrival of other officers; this I thought a great trial, especially when alone. Their enquiries about our respective families were most minute; particularly what relatives we were to Queen Victoria, and whether I myself was not her sister, which, notwithstanding what was said to the contrary, I was declared to be. But it would be endless to repeat all the foolish questions they asked; however, they made notes of all our replies. Captain A. was generally employed drawing, and I am sure his great talent, as well as the patience he exhibited, often insured us kindness. I dwell with gratification on those bright shades of my then dreary life. It was always with deep regret I saw the arrival of my little cage. I had the pleasure of receiving from the gentlemen's prison a note almost daily. The compradore lived near me, and showed me many and great acts of kindness.

Two days after the removal of the gentlemen from the common prison, all the remaining captives were taken to a distant jail under the pretence of better accommodations, excepting two who were sick. I had the melancholy satisfaction of seeing them passing my door, but was not allowed to speak to them; it made my heart bleed to observe their distressed looks and haggard countenances.

It was October the 8th that Captain Anstruther received some supplies from Chusan, with letters that held out hopes of release. He kindly sent me a large share of his clothes. The compradore was now taken away from us, which distressed me greatly, as I had now not a creature to whom to speak. They now gave me a bedstead, which I found a great luxury, having hitherto lain on a dirty floor. I was sometimes allowed to see and converse with the sick prisoners, and I almost felt a consolation in dwelling upon the dreadful past. Frequently my heart was sadly torn, on account of different reports about my late dearly beloved husband and child. I was once told that he was seen going to his cabin to rescue his child, and was afterwards seen dead with the baby on his bosom. Many were the sleepless nights that such accounts gave me, but I found subsequently—when meeting all the prisoners at the mandarin's, and minutely examining into the fact, that this rumour was unfounded, for they had never seen the captain after the ship had heeled over.

On the 8th of October I was far from well; two days afterwards I suffered much from violent pain, and was not able to lie down during the whole night on account of the pain. This I felt deeply, not being able to speak to a creature, and being threatened to have irons put on my wrists; they had let them off only one night on account of my being so ill. On the 9th I was only too glad to see the compradore return, who had been sent to Chinhae in order to ascertain whether the British delegate was really Captain Elliot, and if this was not the case, the individual who dared to appear under an assumed name was to be taken.

On the 14th, they sent another woman to wait on me, with a little cross boy about four years old, who cried the whole day long. This I felt a great trial, as I could not have a moment to myself, and what distressed me most, my communion with God was interrupted. The other old woman brought also her girl, so that there were now four dirty creatures in my dirty hovel. This was scarcely endurable, but after many entreaties and the lapse of a considerable time, both the children were removed. On Sunday the 18th, I heard the melancholy tidings of one of our sailors being removed by the hand of death. I had seen the poor boy several times, and as I felt sure he could never recover, the few moments we were allowed to speak were spent in dwelling upon solemn subjects. Though he was a mere skeleton and weak as a child, still he wore his irons to the last. A day or two before his death, he told me he knew that he would never be well again, but his mind was calm, and I fervently hope that the Saviour was present with him. As we parted for the last time, he said with much earnestness, "God bless you, mistress;" these words I still remember, they have been fulfilled, and God has remembered me. The two sick marines were much distressed at the death of the poor boy, and I was delighted to afford them some comfort, temporal as well as spiritual.

On the 26th we were all summoned by the superior mandarins. I felt much grieved on my way, being entirely alone, not thinking what joy was in store for me. Clothes and letters had arrived from Chusan, clothes in abundance for myself and also for my dear boy, which I had not the least reason to expect, but for which, as I subsequently heard, I was indebted to dear Mrs. Proudfoot. The sight of clothes intended for my dear lost one was overwhelming. May the Almighty reward the kind donor, and by his gracious and merciful providence, ever protect her from requiring such a comfort as she bestowed upon me. Among the above, I received a very kind note with an acceptable present of shoes, from my friend Captain Baily. The gentlemen received large supplies of clothes, wine, ale, and other articles, with 300 dollars from Admiral Elliot; and all the prisoners had clothes given to them. All the Englishmen, except the two sick, were present, and to our great satisfaction our fetters were struck off; we were also informed, that we should be free within five or six days for a certain. Gladness then pervaded every breast, but, as usual, mine was mixed with bitter grief—to think how short a time since a happy wife and a joyful mother, and that I must now return desolate and alone. However, I could but be thankful to be freed from my fetters, having worn them, as I imagine aright, for 32 days; and on our way home—if our wretched prisons deserve such a name—our hearts were much lighter and we began to put confidence in the glad tidings. Little did I then think that we should be obliged still to drag on four long months of our existence in the dreary abode. I now worked very diligently to provide myself with comfortable clothing, which I was soon enabled to do. On the arrival of letters, &c., I was usually the first person sent for by the mandarins to make known their contents. The gentlemen supplied me liberally with money, to provide myself with mourning and other necessaries, as also with comforts for the sick.

About the 1st of November, it was reported publicly that I should be sent to Chusan alone, and that the gentlemen would be sent to Canton. On the strength of this account, they wrote letters for their friends, which I was to have taken, but, like the many rumors we had before heard, this proved groundless. Sometime afterwards the two marines already mentioned were removed to the other prison. I felt sure that one of them was then dying, and I greatly feared that he would never reach the prison. His weakness was so excessive, that he once fell down on his way, though supported by a Chinaman. After a few days, the news of his death was brought to me. Notwithstanding all the representations of Lieutenant Douglas, irons were not taken off this poor man until he breathed his last. The prison was so excessively small that they could not turn around without squeezing each other, and though their commander remonstrated and insisted upon their being allowed to walk about and enjoy the fresh air, they were never permitted to take any exercise in the court. I frequently wrote a few lines to the lads, for whom I felt most deeply, as well as for the crew in general. Lieutenant Douglas was now able to provide them with money, and once only, during the four months' imprisonment, was he permitted to visit his men; for, on seeing the deep interest he took in their welfare, and his great anxiety to better their condition, they never permitted him to see them any more. I was delighted to observe the noble feelings evinced by Lieutenant Douglas towards the crew of the Kite, who suffered great hardships.

Our joy was inexpressible, when a channel of private communication with our friends at Chusan was opened, and when I received from you, my dear friend, the first letter (Dec. 29,) which afforded me very great consolation. Before this we heard of the death of another marine, which affected us all deeply, and especially his master. Death has made sad havoc amongst us, and the Almighty alone knows the reason why he afflicted us, and I fervently hope that these many solemn warnings may be sanctified to us.

January the 9th.—I had again the unspeakable happiness of receiving two letters from you, from one of which I learnt our then contemplated rescue, which at that time gave me great uneasiness, as I trembled at the idea of any of my dear countrymen running the risk of such sufferings as I myself had undergone.

Your first letter was accompanied by a copy of the Holy Bible, an inestimable treasure for which I had so long and earnestly prayed; but, to avoid discovery, I had to read it during the night, so that it was in truth a secret treasure, and henceforth my constant companion. It is wonderful how often we heard of our speedy release, and were often disappointed, still for the time being our spirits were kept up by these good news. On Tuesday the 2d of February, I heard that the gentlemen had been summoned by the mandarins to receive clothes and letters, and with an anxious heart I watched the whole afternoon, expecting every moment a visit from them. However, I was obliged to continue in suspense till the next day, when I was called to appear before the mandarins to obtain another most affectionate letter from you, my dear friend, with abundant store of clothes and every comfort I could desire. Grateful and thankful as I felt for them, my spirits became deeply affected, inferring as I did that so many things would not have been sent if my captivity was not to be prolonged; yet the linguist cheered me by the assurance that I should be free within three weeks or a month. At this time they treated me with great kindness, and I went to see the mandarin's lady, who gave me some fruit and artificial flowers, the first mark of kindness I have received from a lady. They allowed me to remain until the evening, and I was once more gladdened in meeting my dear countrymen, and, after staying some time, we all went to my prison to write answers to our letters.

February the 8th I had the pleasure of a visit from some Chinese naval officers, who told me that we were to leave Ningpo within a fortnight. We thought there was truth in the news, but we were not certain until the 14th, when I received the glad tidings from yourself. It would be impossible to describe what our feelings were on that occasion. I had thought that the gentlemen had known it the day before, so that our meeting, at the first moment, was not so joyful as it otherwise would have been, but they had no sooner read my letter, than our mutual congratulations were warm and most sincere, and I again had the happiness of welcoming them to my poor prison, where we wrote answers to our friends. —Nothing was now spoken of but the surety of our speedy relief; as for myself I could scarcely believe it till I was on my way to Tinghae.

On the 22d of February, before I arose, my attendant came to my bedstead, saying, "Chinhae, Chusan, get up!" and immediately the compradore called to me, saying that we were indeed to go to Chinhae. Alas! poor fellow, he little thought that he was not to form one of the party. I am sure you will believe me, when I tell you, that I knew not which thing to do first. Numbers of people came round my prison, and I was obliged to shut the door to keep them out. After my morning devotions, with the comprador's aid I got all my boxes packed. While thus engaged, he was sent for by the mandarins, who told him that he was not like the other English prisoners, and therefore they would not allow him to accompany them, but send him down to Canton. This threw an immediate gloom over my spirits, and I felt deeply when, a few minutes afterwards, I saw him locked up in his prison—as he had long been my friend in adversity. I now with difficulty got through the crowd to the gentlemen's prison, where I received a hearty welcome and warmest congratulations, and was forbidden to speak of past troubles. Captain Anstruther now insisted upon seeing the compradore to give him money, and, after many entreaties made to the mandarin, whom he had greatly offended by withholding a picture for some unkindness shown, he at last succeeded in beating his way through the crowd. We walked a great while in the prison yard, until by dint of perseverance and much pushing among the immense crowd, we got into our palanquins. We had a guard to escort us, and, having crossed the river in our conveyances, I looked back and was astounded at the dense mass of spectators. Mandarins of every grade were in attendance. Indeed, the excitement at Ningpo was indescribable. Our road to Chinhae led principally along the river side, and our travelling was any thing but comfortable, the pass being so bad that I feared our palanquin-bearers would slip. When near Chinhae, one of my bearers tumbled and the palanquin thumped on the ground. I struck my head, but the alarm was more than the injury. I thought my troubles would not be at an end, until I reached Chinhae. On the road we met several emissaries urging on the bearers to use all speed, to the mutual gratification of both parties. At last we arrived safely at Chinhae, where we were received with honour by the mandarins. We had not breakfasted, and when the gentlemen asked for food, a filthy fellow came in with an apron full of cakes. Afterwards they brought us each a bason of meat.

Captain Anstruther was now taken to see Commissioner E., and after remaining a little while, he returned, telling us that we should soon be sent for to hear the same story told him—namely, that we should not have come to Chinhae if the admiral had not sent us, and that we must now return and tell the commanding officer, he must get the ships away with all speed, and with his compliments say, that a great many soldiers were waiting to enter Chusan as soon as the English evacuated it; but at the same time, he entreated us to labour under no apprehension, for they had no hostile intentions. At first it was concluded that Lieutenant Douglas was to accompany me to Chusan, while Captain Anstruther could remain and see all the men embark; but when we were with E., Lieutenant Douglas told him that Captain Anstruther had nothing to do with the people, and begged that he might be allowed to remain with his crew, and that Captain Anstruther might accompany me. It was at length determined that both the gentlemen should stay behind, and only Mr. Witts accompany me. I made every enquiry for my only bonnet and other things, which the mandarin had previously sent for to inspect, but in vain, as the officer kept them and would not restore the same. Soon after, I took leave of the gentlemen and re-entered my palanquin, which conveyed me to the waterside, where the linguist presented me with a fan. On the mandarin's premises I had the pleasure of meeting all my fellow prisoners, which relieved my mind, as I was not before aware that they had come down from Ningpo, and had not seen them for several months. I spoke a few words to them as my sedan passed. On our way we were taken to the soldier's tents; it being a late hour, and quite dark, I could see but little of them, but they appeared to be numerous, and occupied a very large space. Every attention was now shown me; they carried me close to the boatside and fixed a chair in the sampan for my comfort. The mandarin who accompanied me showed every attention. For some hours our boat lay at anchor, to enable the other prisoners to embark, and during the night proceeded on our way to Chusan. About seven o'clock in the morning of the 26th I was once more gladdened by the sight of an English vessel. Soon after we were boarded by two naval officers, and Mr. Johnson was the first to welcome me to freedom. In a short space of time, we saw several other vessels which lay at the outer anchorage; a few moments more, and the whole fleet was before us. I thought I saw as great a change on Chusan as on myself; the tents were no longer on the hills; and to me at least all things looked strange, but perhaps the alteration was in me alone. As the boat drew near, Captain Bourchier, of the Blonde, sent his gig to convey me on board, and glad indeed was I to step into it, and thus quit forever a people, at whose hands I had received such bitter wrongs. When safely arrived on the deck of the Blonde, I received the warmest congratulations of Captain Bourchier and the many friends to whom I was then introduced. What my feelings were at that moment none but one so long in captivity can conceive. Every one seemed a participator in my enjoyment, and each countenance wore the smile of heartfelt sympathy. I once more sat down to a comfortable breakfast, but my joy was too exquisite to allow me to partake. I remained on board the Blonde until the arrival of my fellow prisoners, whom I was most anxious to see once more. Lieutenant Douglas and Captain Anstruther soon joined us, and it heightened my pleasure greatly to see those I so much esteemed restored to their usual comforts and warm friends. Ere long the European part of the crew came safely on board. I was much distressed at seeing their wasted frames and pale countenances, yet it was a cheering certainty that every kindness would now be shown them. It is to be hoped that, by the blessing of God, they will soon regain their wonted strength, and I trust the sad lesson they so dearly learned will never be erased from their memories. Being most anxious to see you, my dear friend, and Dr. Lockhart being in waiting to accompany me, I lost no time in hastening to the ship Blundell, where you had so carefully provided for my comfort. My dear friend, Lieutenant Douglas did not leave me, until I was safely on board; and no sooner had I reached the deck, than I received the loud and hearty cheers of the whole crew, which not being anticipated, was completely overwhelming, combined as it was with the cordial welcome of Captain Trail, and his officers. To describe our meeting would be needless—it is too indelibly engraven on the heart of each, ever to be forgotton; but I would not conclude without a sincere, solemn, and heartfelt ascription of praise and thanks to the Almighty Father and Gracious Saviour, and the all-sustaining Spirit, who has so truly fulfilled his promise, "I will not leave thee, nor forsake thee."

THE TERRIFIC LEGEND OF THE KILKENNY CATS.

O'FLYN she was an Irishman, as very well was known,
And she lived down by Kilkenny, and she lived there all alone,
With only six great large tom-cats as knew their ways about,
And ev'ry body else besides she scrup'lously shut out.
Oh, very fond o' cats was she—(and whisky too, 'tis said,)
She didn't feed 'em very much, but she comb'd 'em well instead;
As may be guess'd, these large tom-cats, they didn't get very sleek
Upon a combing once a-day, and a "ha'porth" once a-week.

Now on one dreary winter's night, O'Flyn she went to bed,
The whisky-bottle under her arm, (the whisky in her head,)
The six great large tom-cats they sat all in a dismal row,
And horridly glared their hungry eyes—their tails wagg'd to and fro.

At last one grim graymalkin spoke in accents dire to tell,
And dreadful were the words which in his awful whisper fell—
When all the other five tom-cats in answer loud did squall,
"Let's kill her—and let's eat her—body and bones and all!"

Oh horrible! oh terrible! oh deadly tale to tell!
When the sun shone in the window-hole all there seem'd still and well;
The cats they sat and lick'd their paws, all in a merry ring,
But nothing else within the place look'd like a living thing;
Anon they quarrell'd savagely, and spit, and swore, and hollo'd,
Till at last these six great large tom-cats they one another swallow'd;
And nought but one long tail was left in that once peaceful dwelling,
And a very tough one too it was—it's the same as I've been telling.

A LATE VISIT TO THE VOLCANO OF KIRAUEA, IN HAWAII, ONE OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

BY ASSISTANT-SURGEON REES, R. N.

From the squadron on the west coast of South America, a vessel is annually detached to visit the principal islands of Polynesia included in the Pacific station. H. M. S. Sparrowhawk being selected for this interesting service, in 1839, sailed from Valparaiso, for the Sandwich Islands, in July. Six weeks of strong and steady N. E. trade brought her to an anchor in Byron's Bay, Hawaii. The day of our arrival was busily passed in preparing for a journey to the volcano; and early the following morning, a party of five officers pushed off from the brig. They steered for a part of the beach where a troop of brawny natives had already repaired to meet them. With a light heart did we all eagerly leap on shore; and each person having entrusted his bundle of four days' provisions to the native whose physiognomy and muscle promised the best service on the journey, the whole cavalcade moved briskly along, much to the admiration of the village through which we had immediately to pass. Our way led, the former part of the first day, through a country well wooded; and we particularly admired the various kind of gigantic ferns that skirted the path, and the beautiful trees of the candle-nut and bread-fruit. Whilst in the wood, we passed several spots of cleared ground, cultivated with the kalo; one of which was crowded with labourers—it being a day on which the whole district had to work for their chief. Having passed through about seven miles of wood, the country became more clear, and began to assume something of a mountainous character. The path, almost throughout, rose with a gentle elevation, at first over ground of soft peat, but for the rest of the journey over a thin and churlish crust of soil, which imperfectly covered the beds of lava of which the entire island is composed. We passed the more oppressive hours of the first day in the grateful shade of a spacious hut, the property of a chief, who hospitably regaled us with a pig, cooked in the native manner—the animal having been baked entire in a hole in the ground, enveloped in heated stones, the whole being covered over with leaves and earth. Having accomplished more than half the journey, we yet reached, in good time, the huts where we had been recommended to pass the first night. As we came up to these huts, slow, silent, and one by one, no person would have recognised us as the brisk party that strutted, so erect and confident, through the village in the morning. The next day our party was stirring "with the crowing of the cock;" but the fleas and moschettoes must share in the credit of our early rising. Four miles from the volcano, our path commenced a gradual descent; and, soon after, a stream of smoke sweeping across our path before the N. E. trade, announced our approach to the regions of fire. This, on nearer observation, we found to consist of thick columns of vapour, rising from holes and crevices in the ground: to leeward of which we were glad to find, collected in small pools, and formed by the condensation of the steam, a plentiful and opportune supply of good water. Our path conducted us, with the same gradual slope, some distance yet, when it commenced abruptly to descend, over a broken ledge of rock, into the extensive table plain in which the volcano is situated. As we halted on this ledge, the volcano of Kirauea broke abruptly on our view: massive clouds of smoke rolled dark and thick from the leeward parts of the volcano, and the gloomy edge of the "Great Crater" stood not a mile distant:—

Sed horrificis juxta tonat Ætna ruinis.

Too great was the excitement now to stand long here, or to travel any longer in company. Each broke forth on his own way towards the edge of the crater. But such was the nature of the ground, that we arrived almost together, and at the same spot, where we stood long indeed, gazing in mute astonishment on the unparalleled scene below. And long was the time before the mind could recover the sudden and overwhelming shock of this wondrous spectacle, —before it could examine in detail the several objects of surpassing interest that composed the grand and wonderful whole.

With hesitation I shall now try some bare and naked description of the grand view of the entire volcano which presented itself from the high cliffs or edge of the crater: of a complete and connected picture I shall not attempt the vain and rash folly. At the depth of a thousand feet, the floor of the "Great Crater" spread before us, in something of an oval figure, with a circumference of twelve or fourteen miles. It appeared as if it had sunk in one mass suddenly down from the surrounding plain. The walls of the crater, nearly throughout, were precipitous, and almost everywhere of the same elevation. So much for the extent, depth, and figure of the "Great Crater." The attention first seized on the numerous conical elevations that rose to the average height of fifty feet, and at irregular intervals, from the floor of the "Great Crater," all of which proved to be distinct craters, whilst several of them were at that moment in a state of eruption, disgorging rapidly from their summits red-hot lava. With these conical craters the numerous lakes and ponds of boiling lava soon began to share the attention. These appeared sunk, at irregular depths, in the floor of the "Great Crater," all in a state of agitation, some boiling violently,—others were moved with a more moderate ebullition. The lava, though liquid throughout these ponds and lakes, was luminous during the day only where active ebullition was going on. Besides from the conical craters, lakes, and ponds, smoke issued in a thousand places from holes and crevices in the floor and walls of the "Great Crater;" and noises like those of powerful steam machinery, and distant artillery, or thunder, were other accompaniments of this grand volcanic display.

On the edge of the crater, near the spot where we first arrived, we found a temporary hut, which the attention of the Chief of the island had put up for the accommodation of visiters to Kiranea. Here we were glad to despatch our frugal breakfast, and about eleven in the forenoon we sallied forth to descend into the "Great Crater." Our bold and experienced native guide led now along the edge of the crater towards the left; and we soon commenced to thread our descending path over a succession of sloping ledges of volcanic rock. Before stepping on the floor of the crater, we had to scramble over masses of recent lava, which had been piled up high against the walls of the "Great Crater." It appeared to have been dashed up, in a liquid state, and in the manner of the surf on the sea-beach. Having now gained the floor of the crater, we paused to look around,—to accustom ourselves a little to our then strange and precarious situation. Then, also, was arranged the plan of our further proceedings: and our guide was instructed to steer a straight course across the floor of the crater to the "Great Lake," whilst we also prepared ourselves attentively to examine all objects of interest we might reach without stepping far from the straight line. The lava we had to walk over whilst in the crater being all recent, and much of it consisting of thin and brittle flakes, thrown over holes and crevices, it was necessary to try the solidity of the ground before we could safely step forward. This we did, by constantly beating the lava on our path with the end of a long pole, with which each was provided.

Trunca manum pinus regit et vestigia firmat.

Having traversed about three hundred yards of the crater, passing over lava of the wave-like appearance of a lake frozen whilst agitated by strong wind, our party halted to examine two conical craters, between which we had to pass. Each cone was about fifty feet high, and a hundred in circumference at the base; and both in an active state of eruption,—rapidly spitting and disgorging red-hot lava from wide mouths at their summits. The heat of the lava under foot increasing as we advanced, the fear of getting within the range of those molten ejections prevented any nearer approach to either of these cones than about thirty yards. From observations on the spot, and subsequent reflection, I shall hazard an opinion of the probable manner in which these conical craters may have been constructed. The molten mass of lava below increasing in volume, from causes I shall not here discuss, relieves itself by jetting or flowing out, in quantities according to the propelling force, through holes and crevices in the floor of the crater. When flowing out in large torrents, and with much force, it will spread far and wide, as, when in such a large body, sufficient caloric is present to retain it long in a fluid state: but when flowing out in a small stream, or jetting with little force and in small quantities, it soon becomes solid, forming a kind of embankment all round the hole or crevice of exit. Under these circumstances a cone would be rapidly built. In the two cones our party were halted to examine, the lava frequently was not ejected with sufficient force to clear the base. Falling, therefore, on the surface of the cone, and becoming consolidated before it could run down its side, accession of matter was thus received. But if formed on such principles, when would the growth of a cone cease? The process would be thus arrested. Beyond a certain elevation, which is perhaps about fifty feet, the lava, under ordinary circumstances, cannot be propelled. Any cone, therefore, having arrived to that certain elevation, would then become quiescent, whilst others of less elevation would increase in activity, or the lava would force an exit through some part of the side of the cone, which had actually taken place in one of the cones described before our return from the Great Lake. This cone no longer discharged lava from its summit, but from a mouth at its side, and about the middle. As we proceeded on our journey, after passing between these two conical craters, we traversed lava of a much rougher surface, appearing, in some places, heaped together without order, in flat and broken masses. We also traversed such as must have become solid whilst in the act of flowing in a broad stream. From the specimens I hastily collected, I can describe the lavas of this volcano as of various appearance and texture,—some of them being black, vitreous, —others, of the same colour, vitreous, and containing numerous and large amygdaloid cavities,—whilst another variety was curiously composed of fibres of vitreous lava, so arranged as to give the appearance of a kind of network. In some localities the same specimens had a thin coating of sulphur. But the most curious lava is what we found in bunches, resembling hair in appearance, and consisting of fine-drawn threads of vitreous lava. I can relate a circumstance that will, in some degree, go to explain the formation of this. As I raised the end of my pole from the boiling matter in one of the ponds, I observed the lava to run off in a fine-drawn thread, of sufficient lightness to be carried away by the breeze. Of such fine, light, and glossy threads the curious lava in question is composed; and is probably formed by the rush of steam that often accompanies the discharge of lava from the cones. This curious species of lava is aptly called by the natives, Pele's hair, Pele being the goddess of the volcano. This dreaded Vulcan of Hawaiian mythology has reigned, time out of mind, in Kirauea. By her were brought about all the calamities that befel the Sandwich Islander. When much offended she would shake the whole island with earthquake, or inundate entire districts with torrents of lava, on which the goddess herself would sometimes rush forth, riding on the wave of lava, like the islanders on their surf-board. In her train were the high-sounding titles of King of Thunder, Husband of the Wind, and many other such high-titled personages. To propitiate the goddess, fat pigs, kalo, bread-fruit, and other acceptable sacrifices, were thrown into the volcano. Pele had also her priests and annual celebrations.

But to resume the journey across the floor of the crater towards the "Great Lake." As we proceeded along, after passing between the two conical craters above described, several small and superficial ponds of boiling lava were approached and examined.—When arrived about the middle of the journey, and near the centre of the "Great Crater," we stepped aside to examine a large cavernous mouth in the side, and near the base, of a cone. Although opposed by the burning gusts of sulphurous vapours it emitted, we yet boldly advanced to the very edge of the cavern, and succeeded to obtain a passing glimpse of its roomy and glowing interior. One of the party rashly returned to the brink of this cavern even a third time, but without the satisfaction of obtaining a deep look into the "fiery furnace;" its vaulted roof, glowing with the most intense white heat, could alone be seen. The advanced time of day, and the increasing impatience of the guide, obliged us now to push more hastily on, and we began rapidly to thread our way—here avoiding a pond of boiling lava—there a hole or crevice in the floor of the crater; and, having scrambled up a rising ground of massive heaps of lava, we at last suddenly stood on the borders of the "Great Lake" itself. This immense caldron was of irregular, but something of an oval shape, a mile long, and at its narrower part about three quarters of a mile across, and bounded nearly throughout by precipitous walls about three hundred and fifty feet high. The surface of the lake appeared as if sunk down from the surrounding floor of the crater, as that appeared sunk from the surrounding plain above. In various parts the molten contents of the huge caldron were in a violent and tumultuous state of ebullition; and splendid was the effect of the red and brilliant sprays of lava dancing and leaping on the bosom of this fiery deep. When ebullition happened to burst forth near the shore, waves and sprays of lava were literally rolled and dashed against the walls of the lake, like the surf on a rocky beach. Standing on the cliffs above, we contemplated the "Great Crater" with impressions, general, confused, and overwhelming. As we stood here, on the margin of the "Great Lake," impressions more distinct and concentrated were conveyed, with painful intensity, to the mind. Although the whole mass of lava was at no time agitated with ebullition, yet no part of the lake was stagnant, as the ebullition going on at different parts, and the irregular distribution of caloric, established currents and counter-currents, throughout the whole molten mass. Also where ebullition was going on, or where these currents and counter-currents flowed rapidly along, the lava appeared of a deep and vivid red; but where it was not agitated, or where it flowed but slowly, it presented the opaque and dull appearance of melted lead, an appearance produced by the crust of scoriæ, which so readily forms on the surface of lava when submitted, in an undisturbed state, to the action of the air.

It was now about four o'clock in the afternoon, our journey back to the hut, on the edge of the cliffs above, would be long and laborious; and we reluctantly indeed turned away from this great phenomenon; but not without having anxiously sought to determine the spot on the edge of the "Great Crater," whence we might best overlook the operations of the lake at night. No longer supported by the same excitements as had hitherto borne us along, we arrived at the hut not a little fagged and jaded with the toilsome ascent from the crater; but we were soon much refreshed with a few cups of hot tea, which also served to whet our appetites for dinner, and we made a hearty meal on the very edge of the Great Crater, and in full view of the sublime scene below.

But the labour of that eventful day was not yet over; the cliffs overhanging the "Great Lake" were two miles off, and our party were again soon on the march. Before it was yet night, and after having shifted several times from spot to spot, we had safely perched ourselves on the very point of the cliffs that best commanded a view of the "Great Lake." Fortunately a wide gap in the walls of the lake, on the side next to us, laid open to our view almost the entire surface of the caldron. As the night approached, the volcano appeared to become more active,—the cones disgorged more rapidly, and lava of more vivid redness; the ponds also boiled more actively, and became luminous to a greater extent; but like Jove his satellites, did the "Great Lake" outshine all other objects. It was now agitated by a more tempestuous ebullition than during the day, sportively throwing red and brilliant sprays of lava high into the air; whilst, in the course of the currents and counter-currents described, luminous streams were observed beautifully to stripe the entire surface of the lake. At some distance on our right, a cone was discharging from a mouth in its side a broad river of lava, which, as it divided and subdivided into lesser streams, displayed such exquisite beauty as could not be entirely eclipsed by the "Great Lake" itself. All these operations did not proceed with an unvarying rate of activity; the "Great Lake," for example, once or twice became almost quiescent, but quiescent to break forth again with redoubled fury. We also noticed that the "Great Lake," ponds and cones, became active or quiescent simultaneously, a circumstance that will suggest their mutual dependence on the same great laboratory below.

We were yet to be astonished with a phenomenon still more wonderful than any thing we had hitherto contemplated. At a moment when the "Great Lake," and all the cones, had become unusually quiet, the exclamation from one of the party of "Good God, look here!" called our attention to the floor of the "Great Crater" immediately below and before us. Here an awful eruption of lava had just broke forth. From the spot where it had burst out, the lava spread in an enlarging circle to the circumference of three miles, and with the rapidity of a mountain torrent; the whole mass glowing with the splendour of the sun. We shrunk back, terrified and dazzled with this overwhelming sight; yet we were safely perched on cliffs a thousand feet above the scene of this eruption, and no great strangers at that time to the wonders of the volcano. The lava, whilst in motion, continued to glow with the utmost splendour; but the instant it ceased to spread, it commenced to lose its brilliancy, and, in a few minutes it had become opaque, excepting at the central part, where it continued to glow and boil for some time longer. The light, also, emitted by the lava, was most intense, and being thrown powerfully on the cliffs where we stood, it enabled the natives at the hut, two miles off, to see us with the greatest distinctness. This eruption taking place so suddenly, without any premonitory signs, and in a situation hitherto so tranquil, disclosed the great danger to which we were exposed in our journey across the floor of the crater to the "Great Lake." As well might a similar eruption have burst forth under our feet as in this particular place: but the caldron that would have engulphed an army deemed our little party too insignificant a prey.

The keen night air, our unsheltered situation, and considering this grand burst as the crowning effort of Pele in her volcanic performance of that night, induced us about eleven o'clock to think of returning to the hut, where we arrived at midnight, tired enough to sleep soundly in our cold and dangerous situation on the brink of the "Great Crater."

The following morning we found the volcano still in high action. The cones especially were in a much more active state than the morning before; by which Pele, it was supposed, sought to induce the party to remain longer in her dominions; or, perhaps, as others with as much reason maintained, the goddess had stirred up her fires to scare the intrusive strangers from her dangerous abode.

Where the slumbering earthquake
Lies pillowed in fire,
And the lakes of bitumen
Rise boilingly higher.

Be that as it may, the time has now arrived to return to the ship, and about 10 A. M. we reluctantly cast a long and last look at the great and wonderful volcano of Kirauea.

Formerly, according to tradition, the eruptions from Kirauea were so frequent as to keep the natives in a state of constant alarm. In the present generation they have not been repeated: but the floor of the crater since 1829, when it was first visited by Europeans, has been known gradually to rise,—perhaps from the discharge of lava from the cones; and we are forced to apprehend the repetition, at no distant time, of former devastations,—

And ebbs but to reflow!---Renew thy rainbow, God!

GREAT ERUPTION OF THE VOLCANO OF KIRAUEA.

Though my letter is already long, I cannot close it without saying a word respecting the late volcanic eruption in Puna, on this island. At the time this eruption took place we were all absent from Hilo to attend the general meeting at Oahu, a circumstance which I much regret, as it deprived us of a view of the most splendid and awful part of the scene. Since our return from Oahu I have made a pretty thorough exploration of the tract of country where the eruption occurred, having found its source, and traced the stream through most of its windings, to the sea.—Some of the principal facts which have been collected from credible testimony, and from personal observation, I will now give you. For several years past the great crater of Kirauea has been rapidly filling up, by the rising of the superincumbent crust, and by the frequent gushing forth of the molten sea below. In this manner the great basin below the black ledge, which has been computed from three to five hundred feet deep, was long since filled up by the ejection and cooling of successive masses of the fiery fluid. These silent eruptions continued to occur at intervals, until the black ledge was repeatedly overflowed, each cooling, and forming a new layer from two feet thick and upwards, until the whole area of the crater was filled up, at least fifty feet above the original black ledge, and thus reducing the whole depth of the crater to less than nine hundred feet. This process of filling up continued till the latter part of May, 1840, when, as many natives testify, the whole area of the crater became one entire sea of ignifluous matter, raging like old ocean when lashed into fury by a tempest. For several days the fires raged with fearful intensity, exhibiting a scene awfully terrific. The infuriated waves sent up infernal sounds, and dashed with such maddening energy against the sides of the awful caldron, as to shake the solid earth above, and to detach huge masses of overhanging rocks, which, leaving their ancient beds, plunged into the fiery gulf below. So terrific was the scene that no one dared to approach near it, and travellers on the main road, which lay along the verge of the crater, feeling the ground tremble beneath their feet, fled and passed by at a distance. I should be inclined to discredit these statements of the natives, had I not since been to Kirauea and examined it minutely with these reports in view. Every appearance, however, of the crater confirms these reports. Every thing within the caldron is new. Not a particle of lava remains as it was when I last visited it. All has been melted down and re-cast. All is new. The whole appears like a raging sea, whose waves had been suddenly solidified while in the most violent agitation.

Having stated something of the appearance of the great crater, for several days previous to the disgorgement of its fiery contents, I will now give a short history of the eruption itself. I say short, because it would require a volume to give a full and minute detail of all the facts in the case.

On the 30th of May the people of Puna observed the appearance of smoke and fire in the interior, a mountainous and desolate region of that district.—Thinking that the fire might be the burning of some jungle, they took little notice of it until the next day, Sabbath, when the meetings in the different villages were thrown into confusion by sudden and grand exhibitions of fire, on a scale so large and fearful as to leave them no room to doubt the cause of the phenomenon. The fire augmented during the day and night; but it did not seem to flow off rapidly in any direction. All were in consternation, as it was expected that the molten flood would pour itself down from its height of four thousand feet to the coast, and no one knew to what point it would flow, or what devastation would attend its fiery course.—On Monday, June 1st, the stream began to flow off in a northeasterly direction, and on the following Wednesday, June 3d, at evening, the burning river reached the sea, having averaged about half a mile an hour in its progress. The rapidity of the flow was very unequal, being modified by the inequalities of the surface over which the stream passed. Sometimes it is supposed to have moved five miles an hour, and at other times, owing to obstructions, making no apparent progress, except in filling up deep valleys, and in swelling over or breaking away hills and precipices.

But I will return to the source of the eruption. This is in a forest, and in the bottom of an ancient wooded crater, about four hundred feet deep, and probably eight miles east from Kirauea. The region being uninhabited and covered with a thicket, it was some time before the place was discovered, and up to this time, though several foreigners have attempted it, no one, except myself, has reached the spot.—From Kirauea to this place the lava flows in a subterranean gallery, probably at the depth of a thousand feet, but its course can be distinctly traced all the way, by the rending of the crust of the earth into innumerable fissures, and by the emission of smoke, steam, and gasses. The eruption in this old crater is small, and from this place the stream disappears again for the distance of a mile or two, when the lava again gushed up and spread over an area of about fifty acres. Again it passes under ground for two or three miles, when it re-appears in another old wooded crater, consuming the forest, and partly filling up the basin. Once more it disappears, and flowing in a subterranean channel, cracks and breaks the earth, opening fissures from six inches to ten or twelve feet in width, and sometimes splitting the trunk of a tree so exactly that its legs stand astride at the fissures. At some places it is impossible to trace the subterranean stream, on account of the impenetrable thicket under which it passes. After flowing under ground several miles, perhaps six or eight, it again broke out like an overwhelming flood, and sweeping forest, hamlet, plantation, and every thing before it, rolled down with resistless energy to the sea, where, leaping a precipice of forty or fifty feet, it poured itself in one vast cataract of fire into the deep below, with loud detonations, fearful hissings, and a thousand unearthly and indescribable sounds. Imagine to yourself a river of fused minerals, of the breadth and depth of Niagara, and of a deep gory red, falling, in one emblazoned sheet, one raging torrent, into the ocean! The scene, as described by eye witnesses, was terribly sublime. Two mighty agencies in collision! Two antagonist and gigantic forces in contact, and producing effects on a scale inconceivably grand! The atmosphere in all directions was filled with ashes, spray, gasses, etc.; while the burning lava, as it fell into the water, was shivered into millions of minute particles, and, being thrown back into the air, fell in showers of sand on all the surrounding country. The coast was extended into the sea for a quarter of a mile, and a pretty sand beach and a new cape were formed. Three hills of scoria and sand were also formed in the sea, the lowest about two hundred and the highest about three hundred feet.

For three weeks this terrific river disgorged itself into the sea with little abatement. Multitudes of fishes were killed, and the waters of the ocean were heated for twenty miles along the coast. The breadth of the stream, where it fell into the sea, is about half a mile, but inland it varies from one to four or five miles in width, conforming itself, like a river, to the face of the country over which it flowed. Indeed, if you can imagine the Mississippi converted into liquid fire, of the consistency of fused iron, and moving onward, sometimes rapidly, sometime sluggishly; now widening into a sea, and anon rushing through a narrow defile, winding its way through mighty forests and ancient solitudes, you will get some idea of the spectacle here exhibited. The depth of the stream will probably vary from ten to two hundred feet, according to the inequalities of the surface over which it passed. During the flow, night was converted into day on all eastern Hawaii. The light rose and spread like the morning upon the mountains, and its glare was seen on the opposite side of the island. It was also distinctly visible for more than one hundred miles at sea; and at the distance of forty miles fine print could be read at midnight. The brilliancy of the light was like a blazing firmament, and the scene is said to have been one of unrivalled sublimity.

The whole course of the stream from Kirauea to the sea is about forty miles. Its mouth is about twenty-five miles from Hilo station. The ground over which it flowed descends at the rate of one hundred feet to the mile. The crust is now cooled, and may be traversed with care, though scalding steam, pungent gasses, and smoke are still emitted in many places.

In persuing my way for nearly two days over this mighty smouldering mass, I was more and more impressed at every step with the wonderful scene.—Hills had been melted down like wax; ravines and deep valleys had been filled; and majestic forests had disappeared like a feather in the flames. In some places the molten stream parted and flowed in separate channels for a considerable distance, and then re-uniting, formed islands of various sizes, from one to fifty acres, with trees still standing, but seared and blighted with the intense heat. On the outer edges of the lava, where the stream was more shallow and the heat less vehement, and where of course the liquid mass cooled soonest, the trees were mowed down like grass before the scythe, and left charred, crisped, smouldering, and only half consumed. As the lava flowed around the trunks of large trees on the outskirts of the stream, the melted mass stiffened and consolidated before the trunk was consumed, and when this was effected, the top of the tree fell, and lay unconsumed on the crust, while the hole which marked the place of the trunk remains almost as smooth and perfect as the caliber of a cannon. These holes are innumerable, and I found them to measure from ten to forty feet deep, but as I remarked before, they are in the more shallow parts of the lava, the trees being entirely consumed where it was deeper. During the flow of this eruption, the great crater of Kirauea sunk about three hundred feet, and her fires became nearly extinct, one lake only out of many, being left active in this mighty caldron. This, with other facts which have been named, demonstrates that the eruption was the disgorgement of the fires of Kirauea. The open lake in the old crater is at present intensely active, and the fires are increasing, as is evident from the glare visible at our station, and from the testimony of visiters.

During the early part of the eruption, slight and repeated shocks of earthquake were felt, for several successive days, near the scene of action. These shocks were not noticed at Hilo.

Through the directing hand of a kind Providence no lives were lost, and but little property was consumed during this amazing flood of fiery ruin. The stream passed over an almost uninhabited desert. A few little hamlets were consumed, and a few plantations were destroyed; but the inhabitants, forewarned, fled and escaped. During the progress of the eruption some of the people in Puna spent most of their time in prayer and religious meetings, some flew in consternation from the face of the all-devouring element, others wandered along its margin, marking with idle curiosity its daily progress, while another class still coolly pursued their usual vocations, unawed by the burning fury as it rolled along within a mile of their doors. It was literally true that they ate, drank, bought, sold, planted, builded, apparently indifferent to the roar of consuming forests, the sight of devouring fire, the startling detonations, the hissing of escaping steam, the rending of the earth, the shivering and melting of gigantic rocks, the raging and dashing of the fiery waves, the bellowings and murmurings, the unearthly mutterings coming up from a burning deep. They went carelessly on amid the rain of ashes, sand, and fiery scintillations, gazing vacantly on the fearful and ever varying appearance of the atmosphere, murky, black, livid, blazing, the sudden rising of lofty pillars of flame, the upward curling of ten thousand columns of smoke, and their majestic roll in dense, dingy, lurid or party coloured clouds. All these moving phenomena were regarded by them as the fall of a shower, or the running of a brook; while to others they were as tokens of a burning world, the departing heavens, and a coming Judge.

I will just remark here, that while the stream was flowing, it might be approached within a few yards on the windward side, while at the leeward no one could live within the distance of many miles, on account of smoke, the impregnation of the atmosphere with pungent and deadly gasses, and the fiery showers which were constantly descending, and destroying all vegetable life. During the progress of the descending stream it would often fall into some fissure, and forcing itself into apertures and under massive rocks, and even hillocks and extended plats of ground, and lifting them from their ancient beds, bear them with all their superincumbent mass of soil, trees, etc., on its vicious and livid bosom, like a raft on the water. When the fused mass was sluggish, it had a gory appearance like clotted blood, and when it was active, it resembled fresh and clotted blood mingled and thrown into violent agitation. Sometimes the flowing lava would find a subterranean gallery, diverging at right angles from the main channel, and pressing into it would flow off unobserved, until meeting with some obstruction in its dark passage, when, by its expansive force, it would raise the crust of the earth into a dome-like hill of fifteen or twenty feet in height, and then bursting this shell, pour itself out in a fiery torrent around. A man who was standing at a considerable distance from the main stream, and intensely gazing on the absorbing scene before him, found himself suddenly raised to the height of ten or fifteen feet above the common level around him, and he had but just time to escape from his dangerous position, when the earth opened where he had stood, and a stream of fire gushed out. 25th Sept., 1840.

THE MUFFIN MAN.

A LITTLE man who muffins sold,
When I was little too,
Carried a face of giant mould,
But tall he never grew.

His arms were legs for strength and size,
His coat-tail touched his heels;
His brows were forests o'er his eyes,
His voice like wagon-wheels.

When fallen leaves together flock,
And gusts begin to squall,
And suns go down at six o'clock,
You heard his muffin call.

Born in the equinoctial blast,
He came and shook his bell;
And with the equinox he pass'd,
But whither none could tell.

Some thought the monster turn'd to dew,
When muffins ceased to reign,
And lay in buds the summer through
Till muffin-time again.

Or Satyr, used the woods to rove,
Or ev'n old Caliban;
Drawn by the lure of oven-stove
To be a muffin-man.

The dwarf was not a churlish elf,
Who thought folks stared to scoff;
But used deformity itself
To set his muffins off.

He stood at doors, and talk'd with cooks,
While strangers took his span,
And grimly smiled with childhood's looks
At him, the muffin-man.

When others fled from nipping frost,
And fled from drenching skies,
And when in fogs the street was lost,
You saw his figure rise.

One night his tinkle did not sound,
He fail'd each 'custom'd door;
'Twas first of an eternal round
Of nights he walk'd no more.

When, borne in arms, my infant eye
The restless search began,
The nursery-maid was wont to cry,
"See John, the muffin-man!"

My path with things familiar spread,
Death's foot had seldom cross'd;
And when they said that John was dead,
I stood in wonder lost.

New muffin-men from lamp to lamp,
With careless glance I scan;
For none can ever raze thy stamp,
Oh John, thou muffin-man!

Thou standest snatch'd from time and storm,
A statue of the soul;
And round thy carved and goblin form,
Past days—past days unroll.

We will not part—Affection dim
This song shall help to fan;
And Memory, firmer bound to him,
Shall keep her Muffin-man.

FRIGHTS!

There is no fever so contagious as fright. It runs, like a bell-wire, through the house, communicating from one line of agitation to another.

Frights, in a national point of view, are called "clouds on the political horizon." These clouds are very catching; if one nation in Europe has the vapours, all have—as we have lately had an opportunity of witnessing. In a civic, or we should say rather in a commercial sense, frights are called "panics; they are wonderfully contagious. No sooner is one house in danger, than another feels itself in peril. You walk at such a season through some vast capital, amidst lines of lofty and durable-looking mansions, and every one that begins to totter puts at least a couple in mind of tottering also. As this nods to its fall, that returns the nod instinctively. Once set the panic afoot, and each seems inclined to be foremost, rather than hindmost, in the road to ruin; let but a single firm topple down unexpectedly, and its neighbours break too, from nothing but sheer apprehension of breaking. Amidst large assemblages of people—in ball-rooms, theatres, often in churches—fright is irresistible in its progress, if once kindled. The cry of "fire," or a sound construed into the cracking of the wainscot, is enough. The strong, the weak, the bold, the nervous, the old stager and the young novice—are all reduced simultaneously to a common level: they become one mass of flying, fluttering, struggling, shrieking, selfish mortality—rushing to the door, and there effectually blocking up the way; each bent on escape, and each helping to render escape impossible; trampling, stifling, crushing one another, in hideous rout and disorder, without one rational idea amongst the bewildered multitude of the reality of the danger, or one courageous impulse to face it.

This wild alarm, like jealousy, makes the meat it feeds on. There is something so contradictory in it, that the presence of numbers, which should be its protection, increases its confusion. It sees its own pale, glaring, terror-stricken image in each man's face, and its diseased imagination multiplies the causes of fear, because its effects are manifold.

While such panics prevail, as all veracious chronicles show they do, amongst mankind, who shall presume ungallantly to laugh at thy innocent objects of terror, oh, womankind! or childhood, even at thine! All have their favourite antipathies. Gentlemen ere now have been appalled at the sight of a black-bottle; many a lady yet looks aghast at the intrusion of a black-beetle; while the child still screams, affrighted at the idea of black-bogy. Leaving the first to the satirist, and the last to the schoolmaster, let us picture to the eyes of ladies a scene, in which every fair reader almost must have been, at least once in her life, an actress.

We will suppose that scene to be a lady's "finishing establishment"—for there are no schools now—the school went out of fashion with the shop, and the "establishment" came in with the "depôt" and the "emporium."

The group is the prettiest possible, as a specimen of still-life; there is not a whisper, scarcely a motion; the superior is silently calculating the amount of her Michaelmas accounts; the assistant is mutely wondering whether young Ariosto Jackson, whom she met at Northampton last holidays, will again be there at the next breaking up; and several young ladies, in process of tuition, are learning irregular verbs by heart, reading treatises abstrusely scientific, and thinking all the time of nothing; when—all of a sudden—but no, that is not the word—quicker than lightning, transformed as by magic, the scene presents to the eye but one image of consternation—to the ear but one note of terror and dismay.

In the centre of the sacred apartment has been detected a small sable intruder. A cry of horror from one young lady—"Oh! my good gracious, there's a great black beadle!" brings every other young lady's heart into her mouth. In an instant the room resounds with wild piercing screams. Every chair has its pedestalled votary of Fear, its statue of Alarm exquisitely embodied; the sofa boasts a rare cluster of affrighted nymphs—more agonised by far than if they had been, by some wicked bachelor of a magician, locked for life into a nunnery. The lady-president, to exhibit an example of presence of mind, has leaped upon a chair for the purpose of pulling the bell; she at the same time conveys a lesson of industry, for she agitates it like a "ringer" pulling for a leg of mutton and trimmings. The bell-rope breaks, and the other is out of reach. The screams increase; the servants are summoned by more names than they were ever christened by. "Cook, Sarah, Betsy, Betsy, Jane, Cook, Sarah," are called, together with several domestics who have long since gone away.

In the mean time let us snatch a glance at the little dingy contemptible insect, the sable agitator, the Christophe of entomology, who has innocently created all this palpitation in tender bosoms, this distortion of beautiful features, this trembling of limbs, and this discord in voices the most musical. He stands a moment stupified, petrified with astonishment at the rush and the roar around him; recovering from his first surprise, he creeps a pace or two in blank perplexity; he wrestles with his fears—for frightened he is out of his little black wits, you may depend upon it—runs here and there, a few inches to the east, and then a few inches westward, to and fro like a bewildered thing; and then making up his mind, "away he cuts" as hard as he can pelt into the obscurest corner. The enemy out of sight, the boldest of the party, after a minute or two, ventures down and makes a desperate rush to the door; others soon follow this heroine's example; and when they reach the landing—there pale, though recent from the roasting-jack, and peeping up from one of the lower stairs of the kitchen flight, they perceive the face of the cook—a face whose expression is half curiosity, half fear. Aspects of wonder and wo-begone alarm are discernible beyond, and fill up the picture of agitation.

"Oh, Cook! where have you been?" cry the pretty tremblers.

"Oh, Miss! what is the matter?" sighs the cook sentimentally, observing at the same time that "her heart beats that quick as she ain't sure she knows her own name when she hears it."

"Oh, cook!" cries the least exhausted of the party, "here's a great—here's a great black beadle in the parlour!" On which a very small scream, and a pretty shudder at the recollection, pervade the assembly.

"A black-beadle, Miss Higgins! is that all! Lauk, well that is disappineting; we thought as you was all a being murdered, and so we couldn't move, we was so frightened. Why, I minds a black-beadle no more nor—no more nor—no, that I don't! But if it had bin a hearwig, Miss Higgins!—ur-r-r-rh! now that's a ruptile, as I never could abide!"

Had we rushed down stairs sooner, just before the first ring of the bell, a kitchen-group might have presented itself, not unworthy of being sketched. There should we have seen a feminine party of four seated round a table spread with solid viands; the actresses have played their parts to perfection; not like unfortunate players on the mimic stage, who raise to their parched lips empty japan cups, and affect to eat large slices of pasteboard turkeys. No; they have, in the fullest sense of the word, dined; and are in that delicious state of dreamy repose, induced by a hearty meal, about mid-day in summer, after having risen early and "washed" till twelve! It is at this juncture they hear the loud quick ring of the parlour-bell. At such a moment, when Missus know'd they was at dinner! Again, again, again; nay, the peal is continuous, and mingled with confused screams. Terror and the cold beef combined, strong ale and intense alarm, prevent them from stirring. Still the bell rings, the screams continue, and grow more distinct! Sarah faints, Betsy manages about half a fit, and Jane staggers a few paces and falls into the arms of Robert the gardener. A jug of ale, which the cook mistakes for water, flung into the face of the fair insensible, causes a sensation that arouses the whole party; and curiosity overcoming fear, leads them towards the stairs, where, hushed and horror-stricken, they await the dread intelligence that "a great black beadle has got into the parlour," his first appearance this season!

"Had it been a mad dog, indeed!" they all cry. Yes, and if it had been merely a tiny puppy with the smallest tin kettle tied to his tail, retreating affrightedly from roguish boys, they themselves would have been thrown into fright indeed. Their instinct would have led them to cry, "Oh, here's a mad dog, ' and to run right in his way.

Every man has his "frights." Toads are exceedingly unpopular. The deathwatch, like conscience, doth make cowards of us all. Spiders are unwelcome visiters. Rats (politics apart) are eminently disagreeable. One of a party who went out to kill buffaloes, happening to run away just as all his courage was required, explained the circumstance to his friend thus: "One man dislikes this, and another man that animal; gentlemen, my antipathy is the buffalo." But in certain climates, people are accustomed to horrors; they sup full of them. Nobody there screams out, "Oh here's a scorpion!" or "Good gracious, here's an alligator!" The visits of such common-places are not angelic, being neither few nor far between. It is only some rarer monster that can hope to make a sensation. Now, a hippopotamus, once a season, would come with a forty black-beetle power to an evening party; and a group of timid ladies, kicking the mere crocodiles and rattlesnakes away, may well be imagined rushing into a corner, startled by an unlooked-for intruder, and crying out "Oh my! if here isn't a mammoth! Mamma! here's a great large leviathan!"

A PEEP AT A "LEG-OF-BEEF SHOP."

It is a melancholy sight to witness the half-starved, anatomical-looking small youths, dressed in every variety of poverty's wardrobe, that linger for hours near a certain little bow-window in St. Giles's; where the nobility, gentry, and public are informed that by paying down the sum of threepence they will be allowed peaceably to depart with an imperial pint of leg-of-beef soup in their own jug. It is a moving sight. To see the hungry looks—the earnest gazes, that are darted through that little bow-window—to see with what intense relish they snuff up the odoriferous vapours which occasionally ascend through the gratings beneath that little bow-window, or roll out in their full fragrance through the doorway adjacent to that little bow-window, ensnaring at every other burst some new, hungry, unsuspecting wayfarer—to see this is indeed a moving sight. Seldom, very seldom is it the good fortune of these watchful youths to revel in such luxuries as leg-of-beef soup, or its rival, alamode; they are beings destined only to view such things afar off, and make vain speculations upon their ravishing flavour; to contemplate them as amalgams expressly prepared for the affluent—those happy ones who can spend threepence and not feel it. Oh! what felicity to be the master of such a shop!—to eat as much as he likes and nothing to pay—to be able to feast his eyesight with the savoury contents of those bright tin kettles when not hungry—to dress in a white apron and striped jacket, and to have supreme command of that ladle—to be able to look sternly upon those perturbed spirits without, and disregard their earnest whisperings of "Oh, don't it smell jolly; and warn't that piece prime though!"—to be able to go on fishing up the delicious morsels with the same provoking coolness. Oh! to what joys are some men born!

But see. Here comes two that have had their enjoyment; maybe each has eaten a whole threepenn'orth. No longer do the fumes possess any charm for them; they can now walk composedly past those magic kettles. Now, two happy beings are entering the elysium—two whose delights are yet to come. One of them is a dustman in a spotted neckerchief, red wrist-cuffs, and a cap peculiar to gentlemen in that line of business; the other is his lady, glorying in the euphonic name of "Doll."

See with what a majestic air he strides in and takes his seat, as if he could buy up the whole establishment twice over if he chose. Hark with what a lordly voice he calls the waiting-boy, whose benevolent master, for services rendered, rewards him with ninepence per week, and the gratuitous licking of all the crockery soiled on the premises.

"Vater!" again vociferates he of the neckerchief. "Yes, sir," is the reply. "Didn't you hear me call vater afore?" "Sorry, sir, but the gen'l'm'n as is just gone was agoin' to forget to pay, sir—that's all, sir." "That's nuffin to do vith me. Ven I calls 'vater,' I vants yer. I can't afford to vaste my precious breath to no purpose as the members o' parliament do, so just prick up them long ears of your'n, and then I think you'll grow the viser." "Yes, sir." "Vell, then, bring this here leddy and me a freeha'penny plate each, and two penny crusties, and ven a gen'l'm'n calls agin, listen to his woice, or maybe it's not unpossible he may get his bit o' wittles at some other ho-tel." With another professional "Yes, sir," the urchin vanishes from the presence.

Once more the purveyor's ladle dives into the bright tin kettle. Again he tortures the hungry beholders outside the window—as they look on with outstretched necks and spasmodic mouths — with glimpses of its treasures. They see the choice bits of gristle but for an instant, and no more; for whilst gazing at the sight, in a paroxysm of longing and fever of desire, the plates are borne off to that vile dustman.

"Now, Mr. Imperence," says the lady, addressing the purveyor's protégé, at the same time, with much dexterity and elegance, converting a fork she has discovered upon the seat into a toothpick. "Now, Mr. Imperence, I hope you've brought a little less paddywack in it than there was yesterday. As Will says," she continues, stirring and scrutinising the contents of the plate, "bless'd if this house ain't quite losing its caroter." "Brayvo! Doll!" ejaculates her lord approvingly, as leaning backwards with extended leg he draws from his pocket a coin of the realm. "Here, jist valk yer laziness across the vay, and travel back agin vith a pint of half-and-half. Now, vot do you stand ringing o' the money for? Do you think other people is as vicked as yerself!"—"Th' s'picious little warmint!" rejoins the lady, swallowing a spoonful of the soup with alarming expedition, and fulfilling the purposes of a napkin with the back of her hand. "Did you see wot a imperent grin the little beast give?" "Never mind, old gal, you get on," responds the dustman, lounging with both elbows upon the table, and regarding with an air of much complacency the thin-visaged youths outside. "You get on, for I must soon be astirring."

In due time the boy and the solution of malt and hops present themselves, and after a hearty draught of the grateful beverage, the dustman evinces a disposition to become musical, and whistles an air or two with perhaps rather more of good will than of good taste. He suddenly looks round, and discovering his lady has finished the plate of soup and the last drain of beer also, summons forth the juvenile waiter from behind a little partition, just at the mortifying moment when his tongue is making clean the interiors and exteriors of two recently-used plates.

"Now, then, young imp, wot's the damage?"—"Sixpence, please sir," said the waiter, vainly endeavouring to quiet his tongue, which keeps playing round the sides of his mouth; "two plates and three loaves, please, sir." "We ain't had free, you cheating little wagabond!" screams the lady; "we've only had two—you know that!" "Oh! beg pardon, ma'am," replies the boy, after a sly lick; "it was t'other box where the gen'l'm'n was as had three. Fippence, then, please sir—two plates and two new'uns—fippence."

"You're a nice sample o' thievery for your age," says the dustman, contemplating the boy with one eye, and then counting out four penny pieces and four farthings with curious deliberation. "You're a nice article to cast a gen'l'm'n's bill. Do you happ'n to know a cove in London by the name o' Ketch—Jack Ketch!" "Yes, sir." "Vell, then, the next time as you goes his vay, have the goodness to leave your card, and say you was strongly recommended to him by me. Now, Doll."

Having delivered himself to this effect, greatly to the moral benefit of the boy, who mechanically replies at the conclusion of it, "Yes, sir," with a dignified step he leads the way to the door, merely condescending, as he places his foot upon the sill, to inform the proprietor, that "he's blow'd if there's a worser prog-shop in the whole blessed vurld!"

A FEW NOTES ON UNPAID LETTERS.

THE penny-postage has already wrought an extraordinary change in the public ideas of the value of money. Formerly, according to the old maxim, ninepence was but ninepence; but even twopence has now become a sum sterling, to demand which is to stir men's blood as violently as if the said coins were flung in their faces. To put a letter into the post, and an intimate friend to the expense of twopence, was, only the other day, perfectly natural; under the present system, it is fiendish.

A letter sent free costs the sender a penny; to receive a letter not pre-paid, is to expend double the amount. In the degree of attention shown to this little fact, it is not impossible to find a test of the principles of mankind—of the whole corresponding portion of creation at least.

The last post-office returns show, that there are upon an average 7654 persons—monsters in the human form, we should rather say—in this metropolis alone, who walk about day by day dropping stampless epistles into ravenous letter-boxes, from sheer misanthropy—hatred of their fellow-creatures; which feeling they are pleased to call forgetfulness, stamplessness, or copperlessness, as convenience may dictate.

Never become enraged when you receive a missive from one of them—never storm when you pay double—lest you should chance to justify where you mean to condemn.

> At unpaid letters look not blue,
> Nor call your correspondent scamp;
> For if you storm, he proves that you
> Received his letter—with "a stamp!"

Reflect seriously upon the character of such a correspondent. The man whose letters are not pre-paid may be thus denounced:

He is selfish, because he would rather you should pay twice, than that he should pay once.

He would rather inflict an injury on his friend, than act fairly himself.

He is disloyal, because he ought to grace his letter with the head of his Queen, and he declines doing so.

He prefers seeing his brother's two pockets picked, to having a hand thrust into one of his own.

He is an old fool, who wants to be thought young, and affects carelessness, because it is a youthful fault.

Rather than take a bottle of wine out of his own cellar, he would drink a couple at his neighbour's expense.

Sooner than experience a stamp on his toe, he would see his old father's gouty feet trampled on.

He is ready to discharge a double-barrelled gun at any body, to escape a single shot at himself.

He would ride his friend's horse fifty miles, to save his own from a journey of five-and-twenty.

To avoid an easy leap from the first-floor window, he would doom his nearest connexion to jump from the roof.

Rather than submit to the privation of half a meal, he would subject any human being to the misery of being dinnerless.

He is penny wise and twopence foolish. His penny saved is not a penny got, since the damage he occasions will recoil upon himself.

He is more mindful of the flourishing finances of the postmaster-general, than of the scanty funds of individuals who are dear to him.

He has no care for the revenue, for he shrinks from prompt payment.

He is dishonest, for rather than pay in advance he won't pay at all.

Above all, never listen to any thing that may be urged in his defence. Never attach the slightest importance to such items as these:

He is the best of patriots, because he raises a sinking revenue.

He is the best of friends, for he impels all whom he addresses to do good to the state at a slight cost to themselves.

He is the most loyal of men, for he cannot bear to part with his Queen's likeness, even upon a penny-piece.

He is a gentleman, and never has vulgar halfpence within reach.

He is kind to street-beggars, and gives away the penny in charity before he can get to the post-office.

He is well read in ancient literature, and knows that those who pay beforehand are the worst of paymasters.

He is delicate-minded, and feels that a pre-paid letter implies a supposition that the receiver would care about the postage.

His house is open to his acquaintances, who write so many notes there that he never has a stamp to use.

He scorns to subject the portrait of his lady-sovereign to the indignity of being tattooed like a New Zealander.

He is a logician, and maintains that if a penny-postage be a good thing, a twopenny-postage must be exactly twice as good.

He enables others to do a double service to their country, rather than by doing half that service himself, prevent them from doing any.

He denies himself one pleasure that his fellow-creatures may have two.

He sympathises in the postman's joy at the receipt of twopence, as it brings back old times, and restores to him his youth.

He is so anxious to write to those he loves, that the stamp, hastily affixed, comes off in the letter-box.

Signing himself "your most obedient humble servant," of course he dares not take the liberty of paying for what you receive.

He is married, he leaves it to bachelors to pay single postage.

Mark his handwriting, nevertheless; and when his unpaid epistle arrives, let your answer be, a copy of the "Times," supplement and all, sealed up in an unstamped envelope.

THE LIVERY—OUT OF LONDON.

At my friend the squire's, when he lived down at Grassby Farm in Cheshire, I was a constant visitor; and for nothing was that pleasant hospitable house more remarkable than for the eccentric animals that found their way into it, whether as guests or as servants. Of both classes, in the course of a very few years, there were several queer specimens. I laugh as I recall them to mind.

Delightful Grassby, what joyous hours have rolled away there! Well content should I have been to have remained a welcome guest there for ever, if I could but have secured the privilege of dining as sparingly as I liked, and of taking just as few glasses of the old ale or the old port as suited me, rather than my friend. But with the old-fashioned notions of hospitality prevalent there, the comfort of "enough" was out of the question. It was a word never used at the squire's table. If you desired to taste a second or a third dish, good bountiful Mrs. N. sent you a second or third dinner; and not to eat all that was placed before you, though already long past the point where appetite and desire cease, was to break through every principle of their establishment, and violate all their simple ideas of etiquette and good breeding. If you left the remaining wing of the turkey, they would be wretched for the rest of the day—"You didn't like it," "you were not comfortable." After a year or two, Mrs. N. did so far relax, and mingle mercy with her hospitality, as to say when placing two ribs of roast beef upon one's plate, "I hope if there's more than you wish for, that you won't scruple to leave it." The reader will be lucky if he can secure as much indulgence as this, at many country-houses where old fashions and principles yet prevail, and my Lady Bountiful reigns supreme.

Consequences the most alarming sometimes ensued from this sense of the necessity of consuming whatsoever was placed before you by your host. A travelling acquaintance of the squire's (one Mr. Joseph Miller) paid him a flying visit one morning; and as he could not possibly stay one moment, and insisted upon not taking any refreshment at all, he was let off with a tankard of ale, and some of the finest cheese in the county. The traveller threw upward a look of despair as he saw about half a magnificent "Cheshire" introduced to his notice; but as time was precious, he went to work, and ate with vigour for half-an-hour, when the post-boy knocked to remind him of the necessity of completing that stage in a given time, or the journey would be fruitless. The answer returned was, that the traveller "would come as soon as he could;" and upon the cheese he fell again with increased energy. Another thirty minutes elapsed, when he paused to gaze, with evident symptoms of exhaustion, on the semicircle of Cheshire, not yet visibly diminished; a second rap now summoned him, but his reply was an anxious, hopeless look, and the faint ejaculation "Wait!" The attack on the cheese was once more renewed, but by no means fiercely. "Gad," cried the squire, at last, "had I guessed you could ha' staid so long, we'd a hastened dinner a bit." "So long!" exclaimed the traveller in a tone of despair; "let me tell you such a piece of cheese as that isn't to be got through so soon as you think for!"

Another case, and a still more piteous one, was that of a young and simple damsel from a neighbouring county, who brought with her to Grassby Farm the established consciousness (prevailing still over a large portion of the country) of the unpardonable rudeness of sending away any thing presented by the host. Accordingly, one day at dinner, when cheese was sent round, and a plate containing several pieces was handed to the young lady, she presumed it to be meant for her, and as in duty bound devoured the whole supply. It so happened that she did not visit at the squire's again for some considerable time; and then, when remonstrated with for not calling upon her friends at the farm, she said, "Well, I will call, I shall be delighted to dine with you again; but—pray don't give me so much cheese!"

All who entered the farm seemed alike under the influence of one dreary and imperative necessity; that they must take whatever was offered them—which never failed to be too much. A French gentleman one evening underwent with exemplary politeness the martyrdom of drinking sixteen cups of tea, simply from not knowing that he was expected, when tired, to put the spoon in the cup. This at last he did, by mere accident, or good Mrs. N. would have gone on pouring out for him all night, to her great felicity.

Never but once—only once—was that excellent lady convicted of a fit of moderation in the arrangements of her table, and that was when some fine London acquaintances had been persuading her to transform a rustic lout of a stripling into a page, and assuring her that thick pieces of bread at dinner were quite barbarous and vulgar. She did so far forget her original nature, as to decorate the boy with roley-poley buttons, to turn his Christian name of Colin into the surname of Collins, and to admonish him on the subject of bread thus—"Collins, don't cut up so many loaves when we have company at dinner; I don't like very small pieces, but then there shouldn't be too many; you should count heads; you must know how much bread will be wanted, and cut accordingly. Now mind!" Kind, hospitable dame, how was she punished for her precaution! When the next dinner-party assembled, and a dozen persons had taken their seats at the table, Collins proceeded to hand the bread round after the provincial fashion of twenty years ago; but by the time he reached his mistress, the last person of the dozen, the bread was gone. "Collins," said she, in a low discreet whisper, "some bread, some more bread." Collins's whisper in reply was meant to be equally discreet, but it was more audible. "Please, ma'am, I did count heads, and cut twelve bits, but that 'ere gentleman has took two pieces!"

Collins, the page, was but the folly of a day; he speedily disappeared; yet there remained for some time in the heart of his mistress a lurking desire to engraft a few of the best London usages upon the more substantial country customs, and if not to keep pace with the spirit of the present age, at least to emerge out of the deep recesses of the past. Robin, the successor of Collins, was a victim to this spirit of innovation. He was a rustic of one idea; which was, to do whatever he was ordered as well as he could. If told to make haste, he would simply start off at the top of his speed; if told to fly, he would assuredly attempt with his arms and coat-flaps an imitation of the action of a bird, and fly as well as he was able. He understood all instructions literally; Robin had no imagination. To bring in every thing upon a waiter, was an order he could easily comprehend; mistake was impossible. "Well, I declare!" cried Mrs. N. to some visitors one morning, "you haven't yet seen my pets;" (some pups of an illustrious breed, that had just seen the light;) "Robin, bring in the pets—they are miracles." There was considerable delay, however, in the execution of this order; and more than one enquiry went forth, why Robin did not bring in the pups. At last, when curiosity was at its height, and expectation on tiptoe, Robin did contrive, after a "to do" outside the door, to make a formal appearance with the pups, and to explain the delay:—"Here be pups, ma'am, only dang it they won't keep on waiter."

Where the squire picked up the Imperturbable who came next, I never understood. At this distance of time it is not unreasonable to doubt whether he was in reality a human being; he might have been a talking automaton. He never appeared to have "organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions;" he seemed to be simply a thing of clock-work. "Master wants a bit more muffin," or "The ice has broke and master's drowned in the pond," would be uttered by him in exactly the same formal tone of voice, with exactly the same stiff and deliberate air. It was all one to him whether he had to announce—"There's a cricket-match on the common," or "the French have landed." Never shall I forget his walking into the room one day, an hour after dinner, and fixing himself beside his master's chair while the squire was telling us one of his sporting stories which were sometimes rather long; waiting patiently until the close for the signal to proceed, and then when the Squire had turned round leisurely to know what he wanted, saying in his slow tone, "When I went up stairs, sir, a little while ago, the house was a-fire! It's burning now."

But I ought to relate one more example of the manner in which the patience of the Squire's lady was tried, by the rusticity of her attendants, during the short season of her attempt to elevate her household arrangements into something like fashionable dignity. One day, when the Squire had sent off, upon some frivolous errand, every servant in the house except cook and coachman, in dropped a very important visitor who proffered his company at dinner, to the consternation of the lady: hospitable as she was, she was in a dilemma; but it could not be helped. The services of the coachman were duly called into requisition to wait at table, greatly to his chagrin, for he detested the duty, and whenever he chanced to be called upon to perform it, was sure to find some means of letting all the room know that he did. He abhorred indoor work, and took pride in proclaiming himself to be coachee. On this occasion, having some apple-dumplings to bring in (vulgarities to which the Squire was considerably attached,) the coachman, not qualified by daily practice for the duty, let some of them slip off the dish; but recovering himself, he contrived to balance the dish as he held it out, and to steady the rolling dumplings therein, with a "Who-o, whoo-oo, what!" Neither the Squire nor his lady ever affected the "gentilities" after this, or allowed their honest hearts to be disconcerted about trifles; and with this last "tray" of domestic awkwardness, I for the present take my leave of the Livery.

RUS IN URBE.

A RIGID SENSE OF DUTY.

AT one of our sea-port towns there stood (and, we believe, doth stand there still) a fort, on the outside of which is a spacious field, overlooking a delightful prospect of land and water. At the time we are speaking of, a Major Brown was the commandant; and his family being fond of a milk diet, the veteran had several cows that pastured in the land aforesaid; a sentry was placed near the entrance, part of whose duty it was to prevent strangers and stray cattle from trespassing therein. Upon one occasion, an Irish marine, a stranger to the place, was on guard at this post, and having received the regular orders not to allow any one to go upon the grass but the major's cows, determined to adhere to them strictly. He had not been long at his post, when three elegant young ladies presented themselves at the entrance for the purpose of taking their usual evening walk, and were quickly accosted by the marine with "You can't go there!"

"Oh! but we may," uttered the ladies with one voice," we have the privilege to do so."

"Privilege," repeated the sentry; "fait an' I don't care what ye have, but you mustn't go there, I tell ye; it's Major Brown's positive orders to the contrary."

"Oh—ay—yes—we know that," said the eldest of the ladies with dignity, "but we are Major Brown's daughters."

"Ah, well, you don't go in there then anyhow," exclaimed Pat, bringing his firelock to the post, "you may be Major Brown's daughters, but you're not Major Brown's cows."—Omnibus.

A SCENE NEAR FOLKSTONE.

[Folkstone was made, says tradition, of the "odds and ends" left after the rest of the world was finished; and any one who has visited that jumble of heights and hollows, becomes impressed with the conviction that tradition sometimes speaks the truth.]

SOME weather-beaten men with clothes all tar-ry,
Keeping a sharp look-out upon the ocean,
And little Tom, and Jack, and Bill, and Harry,
Making upon the beach a dire commotion,—
Dabbling, like dab-chicks, in the billows briny,
Hunting for crabs, and other things crustaceous,
While a Newfoundland dog, in sport called "Tiny,"
Wags his huge bushy tail, and looks sagacious:
Here wades a shrimper to his waist in water,
There swims a bather, snorting like a grampus;
And lo! James Muddle, with his wife and daughter,
All in a boat, and crying out, "Don't swamp us!"
Far in the offing you may see a cutter,
Her white sails gleaming like the sea-gull's pinions,—
She means to overhaul that craft, with butter
Laden, and cheese, from swampy Scheldt's dominions;—
I shouldn't wonder if Schiedam—however,
That's not my business;—turn our glances landward,
There's Farley in his garden—well, I never!—
A-talking down the chimney, to my landlord;
He says, "I see you've got some greens for dinner,
And pickled pork, but can't say more for coughing;
That smoke just serves him right—the prying sinner!
He's always jeering folks, and at them scoffing:
White cliffs, and houses, underneath and over,
And roads that seem to lead to regions airy—
Old boats converted into roofs, that cover
Buildings, in shape and size that greatly vary,
Denote the place, which popular believings
Point out as being made of ends and leavings.

THE RETURNS, &c.

THE returns of Trade and Navigation for many years back show, on an average, an increase of exportation far exceeding and totally disproportionate to the increase of production. The attendant distress of our home population—want of employment and pauperism among the labouring classes, a constant treading on the verge of bankruptcy among the capitalists—has been the unceasing concomitant of this unnatural state of affairs. Mercantile depression has become in this country a chronic complaint. The system of consigning goods on speculation to foreign markets, instead of waiting for orders, has become in some trades the regular course of business: and the brokers of New York could tell the enormous percentage at which British cottons and printed goods have for years been disposed of below their value in order to get rid of them at any cost. A numerical increase in the quantity and value of exports does not necessarily prove the flourishing condition of a country.*

The present unhealthy condition of British manufactures and commerce has been occasioned by a protective system. This opinion does not rest upon "the ridiculous assumptions of short-sighted economists, who having found protection injurious in one or two cases assume that it must be injurious in all:" it has been adopted because men have found it to be a fact that permanent distress has accompanied permanent protection, and because strong à priori arguments can be advanced to show that the natural tendency of protection is to occasion distress.—Spectator.

* This argument was stated in an able and striking manner by Mr. EDWARD BAINES junior, of Leeds, at a meeting of the Anti-Corn-law Delegates in London, on the 26th March, 1840.

MEMORIALS OF JOSEPH PAICE.

THE "FINE OLD ENGLISH GENTLEMAN" OF ELIA'S ESSAYS.

"Why, that Joseph Paice was as real a person as Joseph Hume, and a great deal pleasanter! A careful observer of life, my dear Bernard, has no need to invent —Nature romances it for him."—CHARLES LAMB.

THE "deep embroidery of foreign lace" with which Elia is, sometimes unjustly, accused, of decorating homespun truth, has had the effect he would certainly have deprecated, of making the sketch of his early benefactor appear half fact half fable. Few except the venerable man's personal acquaintance (a once numerous but fast diminishing body,) are aware how far the original exceeded the picture; how deeply based, how all-pervading were the self-negation and philanthropy that have been faintly outlined!

My grandfather's roof sheltered this chivalrous and Christian old man; my mother was brought up at his knees; his dying hand was laid in blessing on my childish head; and many a trivial fond record has, by constant repetition in the family circle, prevented the memory of his good and gracious deeds from perishing. Add to this, many of his letters, private memoranda, and the letters of those who addressed him as friend and benefactor, are mine by gift; and through them, he, being dead, yet speaketh.

Many of these are exceedingly curious. For instance, here is Captain Coram writing to request the loan of £60 for the necessary expenses attending the drawing up of the charter for the Foundling Hospital, having already so exhausted his own finances and the liberality of his friends, that he could not pay for engrossing these four sheets of vellum, with the accompanying fees. Instead of £60, Mr. Paice immediately sent him a free gift of a hundred, begging that the surplus might be dedicated to the uses of the charity.

Again, here is Mr. Paice acquainting a Mr. Nath. Steward, of Tobago, that the annuitants of the "King's Bay Estate" have consented to indemnify said Mr. Steward for the £400 to which he had subjected himself, in consideration of Mr. Paice's having waived his own claims on them; and after some technical details which display the writer as a shrewd man of business, he proceeds to give directions for the sale of his negroes by private contract instead of public auction, authorising the disposal of them at the sacrifice of a quarter of their value, to secure them kind masters, and this at a time when he appeals to Steward's knowledge of his impoverished circumstances.

But what shall we say to his twice bestowing ten thousand pounds on the rival who married the object of his earliest affections? and his constantly befriending the wife and children of the imprudent and unfortunate man, so as to necessitate close retrenchment in his own style of living! Surely here is magnanimity of rather an unusual kind. The young lady for whom he entertained so deep an affection, was a Miss Hunt, whose father's house of business was in the Old Jewry, where Mr. Paice had frequent opportunities of seeing her; and his country seat at Ewell, in Surrey. I have before me, in the feeble characters of an old man's writing, a memorandum, written before breakfast one Sunday morning at Sir Francis Baring's, enumerating the white days of his life, and thanking the Almighty for them, among which are briefly but emphatically reckoned some of the days spent, doubtless in Miss Hunt's company, at the house of his valued friend in the Old Jewry. A growing passion for this interesting young woman was still undeclared for her, though there was reason to believe she would encourage it, when Mr. Paice became painfully aware that his first cousin, Mr. Mason, was in love with the same lady. One of the parties, it was plain, must be sacrificed to the other: the young lady's chance of happiness between the two was the next point, as well as the comparative fortitude with which disappointment was likely to be met by the several rivals. Mr. Paice debated, and decided against himself: he silently withdrew his attentions, and had the distressing trial of witnessing his cousin's success. Perhaps it was in the first severity of his young disappointment that he made the resolution thus mentioned by him, many years afterwards, in a touching letter to the first Lady Baring. She appears to have rallied him on his having remained single, notwithstanding his admiration and esteem for her sex: the unpremeditated jest opened the secrets of the deep heart; and to this dear and tender friend he wrote a defence, containing, except the story of Miss Hunt, a full account of his motives and principles. After a most pleasing description of his early years,—the only child of his father, and that father a widower,—he mentions some of the reasons which prevented him from "embracing the repeated evidence his father gave him of a liberality disposed to promote his happiness in the married state." "The plan I soon determined to form myself upon," he says, "was that of living for the good of others; first, in the limited sphere of relationship; and secondly, if opportunity should favour, by extending those attentions to ends of more general utility."

God knows how wonderfully he adhered to this plan! Let us only glance over the private account he gives of his stewardship:—

"Of rent and taxes, wife and children clear,
This man possessed two hundred pounds a year;"

at the time of making the above summary of his previous gifts and losses; for on the same sheet is noted, "In the year 1798 my income was only £194 7s. 4d. clear, being £40 less than this present year 1799." And again, "my whole annual income is £329 16s. 4d., out of which I statedly allow to relations in narrow circumstances, annually, £95 9s., and to established charities, over and above all incidental demands of the like nature, £35 2s. 6d.; and the remainder, to defray my tax on personal property, board, apparel, and every incidental expense, is only £199 4s. 10d." It is true, he had West India property, which any one less disinterested would have made available, but which, for several years, was not only unproductive, but expensive to him; and also a large reversionary income then held by Mrs. Angerstein.

There is a miniature portrait of Mr. Paice in his twentieth year still preserved among us, of which it may truly be said, that his face is as that of an angel, mild and heavenly in its expression, and not unlike Raffaelle's exquisite self-portraiture in his School of Athens. But even his oldest surviving friend can only carry back his recollections of him to his fortieth year. "My earliest remembrance of him," says my grandfather, "is before I was eight years old, when we went to call at his house in Cloak Lane, where his father, a fine old gentleman, was sitting by the fire, smoking his pipe with a great deal of dignity. I remember his coming in with a great paper of services (sweetmeats) tied up for us youngsters to carry home; and his father's calling each to him and tying a guinea in the corner of our pocket-handkerchiefs (kindness remembered by me from the age of eight to eighty.) His father died when I was eight years old, so that fixes the date. We expected Mr. Paice to look in on us upon the evening following his father's funeral; and perfectly do I remember my father and mother schooling us how to behave; to avoid any unthinking allusions to his loss, and so forth. Mr. Paice must then have been forty years of age. I well recollect his entering the room, and coming round to each of us in turn, with that dignity and benignity he always had about him, putting something into the hand of each, as a token whereby to remember our lost relative. His gift to my eldest sister was a beautiful miniature of his father, set in gold, which I now have. Afterwards, he sat down, and feelingly entered on the very subject we had been warned to shun."

His father left him £12,500 and his business: and his uncle Edwards, the Shakspeare commentator, had previously bequeathed him £5,000, the moiety of his property, of which his other nephew, Mr. Mason, had the remaining half; but though thus placed in easy circumstances, his bounty to Mr. Mason soon so impaired his fortune, that he determined on immediate retrenchment; saying, it was better to plunge at once into a cold bath, than to stand hesitating on the brink. He accordingly gave up housekeeping, and placed at the head of his establishment the widow of a respectable chemist, to whom he paid a certain sum for his board; keeping his town house still open as a sort of asylum for the homeless, and the rendezvous of his numerous wards during their holidays. He had seventeen guardianship concerns committed to him, including the care of a hundred wards, and a hundred thousand pounds; and the responsibilities thus devolving on him, added to Mr. Mason's quitting England after his failure, leaving him to conduct all his embarrassed concerns, and face his disappointed creditors "without the means of affording the least relief to the necessities of many, and the expectations of all," nearly broke down the mind of this generous rival and tender friend. "The weight thus accumulated," he writes to Lady Baring, "became too heavy; and after long contending with it beyond my strength, had almost overpowered me." So deeply did his fortune suffer by his generosity to his cousin, that at one time he contemplated, from being a South Sea Director, becoming secretary of the company; when the property left him by his cousin, Mrs. Newman, again placed him in easy circumstances. On her death-bed, this lady mentioned to him that she had left legacies of £500, each to her two dear friends, Mrs. Shore and Mrs. Edmonds, formerly the Miss Offleys of Derbyshire (the orphan sisters whose singular story is told by the author of "Tremaine," in his work called "Human Life.") On opening the will, it appeared that the said legacies consisted of only £500 stock; but Mr. Paice, maintaining that £500 sterling had been intended by the testator, insisted on paying the sum in full. In accordance with the same principle was his conduct towards Mr. Beach, the captain of a merchant vessel, who for many years brought home the sugars from Mr. Lucas's estate at St. Christopher's. Mr. Lucas had mentioned to his friend, Mr. Paice, his intention of going to town some day to make an alteration in his will in favour of this Mr. Beach. He died, however, without executing this intention, and his nephew, Captain Wheeler, inherited his property, nearly the whole of which he subsequently left to Mr. Paice, who acting on what he considered the intention of the former testator, made over a share of the West Indian property to Mr. Beach. In like manner, the estate which Captain Wheeler had left his widow for her life, was by Mr. Paice made freehold; which, he said, he was sure must have been intended by the testator; and numerous and perplexing were the claims he drew upon himself, by his sedulous endeavours to provide for the captain's relations to the remotest degree, before he permitted himself to benefit by the fortune that had been left him.

The wholesale munificences of which these are samples, can be imitated by few; and it is to be feared, that the benevolence in daily trifles by which they were accompanied is almost equally rare.—Charles Lamb speaks of Mr. Paice's holding an umbrella over a market woman's fruit basket, lest her store should be spoilt by a sudden shower, and uncovering his head to a servant girl who was requesting him to direct her on her way. These traits are quite in keeping with many that can still be authenticated—his carrying presents of game himself for instance, to humble friends, who might ill have spared a shilling to a servant; and his offering a seat in his hackney coach to some poor, forlorn, draggled beings, picking their way through the mud on a rainy day. Sometimes, these chance guests have proved such uncongenial companions, that the kind old man has himself faced the bad weather, rather than prolong the acquaintance, paying the hackney-coachman for setting down the stranger at the end of his fare. At lottery times, he used to be troubled with begging visits from certain improvident hangers-on, who had risked their all in buying shares of an unlucky number. About the time the numbers were being drawn, (I am speaking now of the period when he had been for years an inmate of my maternal grandfather's family,) there would be a ring at the gate-bell, perhaps at dinner time. His spectacles would be elevated, an anxious expression would steal over his face, as he half raised himself from his seat, to obtain a glance at the intruder—"Ah, I thought so, I expected as much," he would gently say; "I guessed I should soon have a visit from poor Mrs. —— or Mrs. ——. Will you excuse me, my dear madam for a moment, while I just tell her it is quite out of my power to help her!" counting silver into his hand all the time. Then, a parley would ensue at the hall door—complainant telling her tale in a doleful voice: "My good woman, I really cannot," &c.; and at last the hall door would be shut. "Well, sir," my grandmother used to say, as Mr. Paice returned to his seat, "I do not think you have sent Mrs. —— away quite penniless." "Merely enough for a joint of meat, my good madam—just a trifle to buy her a joint of meat."

It is worthy of remark, that this friend of the unfortunate, who had given to and lost by his friends the sum of thirty thousand pounds, received, in his declining years, not a bequest, but a free gift, from his friend, Sir Francis Baring, of seven thousand pounds. Mr. Paice had often consulted him about the disposal of his reversionary property, which depended on the death of Mrs. Angerstein,* and Sir Francis had always spoken on this subject with reluctance, being himself desirous of purchasing the Kentish estate, if Mr. Paice should succeed to its possession before the sale should be completed.—Finding, however, that the reversion would unquestionably be sold to some one else if he did not secure it, Sir Francis concluded the purchase for twenty thousand pounds; but the death of Mrs. Angerstein putting him in possession sooner than he could have anticipated, he was uneasy till he had made up what he considered a sum equivalent to the additional value of the estate. All this is briefly stated in the letter now lying before me, which was brought one afternoon to Mr. Paice by a special courier. He had scarcely glanced at it, when he became agitated, and requested the young ladies of the family would leave him for a few minutes to the company of my grandfather and grandmother. When they returned, they found the party in tears, and feared something was amiss, but were told that they only beheld tears of affection and admiration. "As I have maturely considered," writes Sir Francis, "every circumstance that attaches to the question, the result is, what you will find enclosed, which is absolutely necessary, for my future peace of mind and comfort, should remain without alteration. I will not wound your delicacy with reasons why it should be one sum in preference to another, but I hope you will suffer me to assure you, that neither myself nor any of my family will ever receive the return of any part of this sum, either now or hereafter. With this view, you will permit me to request an assurance from yourself, which I know to be sacred, that you will not give or beqeath to the whole or any part of my family what shall exceed the value of £100." The inclosure was a £7000 stock receipt.

It was Mr. Paice's earnest prayer, left behind him in his own hand-writing, that he might not survive this beloved friend; and Sir Francis died on the day that Mr. Paice was buried. ANNE MANNING.

THE SISTER SCIENCES; OR, BOTANY AND HORTICULTURE.

BY DR. BULGARDO, L. S. D.,

Treasurer of several Learned Societies, and Professor of Asparagus at the University of Battersea.

BOTANY.

TO MARY, WITH A BUNCH OF FLOWERS.

Nay! say not faded,—'tis despair
Has thus subdued them, for they see
That in themselves however fair,
They ne'er can hope to equal thee!
The Rose's joyous blush has fled,
With which no other lip could vie;
The Heartsease turns aside its head,
Fearing to meet thy deep-blue eye.
More sad the Myrtle's hue appears,
The Jasmine's silver star is dim;
Surpass'd by thee, thou seest the tears
That tremble on the Harebell's brim.
The Woodland Lily's silver cup
Was never seen to droop as now,
It dares not lift its flowrets up
To gaze upon thy gentle brow.
How canst thou look thus calmly on,
And watch them slowly die the while?
Recall them yet, ere life be gone,
Enchantress, with thy sunny smile!

HORTICULTURE.

TO MOLLY, WITH A BASKET OF FRUIT AND VEGETABLES.

Nay! say not shrivell'd—'tis despair
Has thus subdued them, for they see
That in themselves however fair,
They'll ne'er be relish'd, love, like thee!
A deeper blush the Raspberry paints,
Pale is the ruddy Beetroot's lip;
And e'en the red-cheek'd Apple faints,
As though it suffer'd from the pip.
Severely frown the Baking Pears;
The Artichoke's bold crest is down;
The awe-struck Medlar wildly stares
To see thy cheek a swarthier brown.
The icy Cucumber is hot,
The freckled Cauliflower wan;
The Mushroom has no longer got
A single leg to stand upon!
See how the rich, round-shoulder'd Figs
Bow to thy figure's graceful swell;
The sobbing Orange bursts its pigs
To find thee such a Nonpareil! Omnibus.

RICHARD BARNFIELD'S POEMS.

POEMS, By Richard Barnfield, 1598. (Auchinleck reprint, 1806. 4to.)

RICHARD BARNFIELD was born in 1574. He was matriculated at Oxford in 1589, as appears by the following entry. Brazen Nose Coll. Nov. 27, 1589. Richard Barnfield, Stafford, gen. fil. ætat. 15, matriculated Regtm. Univ. Oxon. Where he died, is not known. He is not mentioned by Anthony Wood. In 1594, or 1595, he published "The Affectionate Shepherd," which he calls his first work. In 1595, a Poem entitled "Cynthia," with certain Sonnets, and the Legend of Cassandra, dedicated to William Earl of Derby. That he took a degree at Oxford, (probably in 1593,) appears from the title-page of his poem called "The Encomium of Lady Pecunia, or the Praise of Money, 1598," with which this volume commences. Then follows, "The Complaint of Poetrie for the death of Liberalitie, 1598." Thirdly, "The Combat between Conscience and Covetousness in the Minde of Man," 1598; and other poems in divers humours, 1598. From this last we shall make our selections.

SONNET I.—To his friend Maister R. L. in praise of Musique and Poetrie.

If musique and sweet poetrie agree,
As they must needes (the sister and the brother,)
Then must the love be great twixt thee and mee,
Because thou lov'st the one, and I the other.
Dowland to thee is deere, whose heavenly tuch
Upon the lute, doth ravishe humaine sense,
Spenser to mee; whose deepe conceit is such,
As passing all conceit, needs no defence.
Thou lov'st to hear the sweete melodious sound
That Phœbus' lute (the Queen of Musique) makes,
And I in deepe delight am chiefly dround
When as himselfe to singing he betakes.
One God is God of both (as poets faigne,)
One knight loves both, and both in thee remaine.

SONNET II.—Against the Dispraysers of Poetrie.

Chaucer is dead: and Gower lies in grave;
The Earl of Surry long agoe is gone;
Sir Philip Sidnei's soule the Heavens have;
George Gascoigne him beforne, was tomb'd in stone;
Yet tho' their bodies lye full low in ground,
(As every thing must dye, that earst was borne,)
Their living fame no fortune can confound,
Nor ever shall their labours be forlorne.
And you, that discommend sweete poetrie
(So that the subject of the same be good.)
There may you see your fond simplicitie,
Sith kings have favour'd it of royal blood.
The King of Scots (now living) is a poet,
As his Lepanto, and his Furies shoe it.

SONNET III.—A Remembrance of some English Poets.

Live Spenser, ever in thy Fairy Queene,
Whose like for deepe conceit was never seene;
Cround mayst thou bee, unto thy more renoune,
(As King of Poets) with a laurell croune.

And Daniell, praised for thy sweet-chast verse,
Whose fame is grav'd on Rosamond's black herse,
Still may'st thou live; and still be honoured
For that rare work—The White Rose and the Red.

And Drayton, whose well-written tragedies
And sweet epistles, soare thy fame to skies,
Thy learned name is equal with the rest,
Whose stately numbers are so well addrest.

And, Shakespeare, thou, whose honey-flowing vain
(Pleasing the world) thy praises doth obtain,
Whose Venus and whose Lucrece (sweet and chaste)
Thy name in fame's immortal booke have plac't.
Live ever you, at least in fame live ever;
Well may the body die—but fame dies never.

SONNET IV.—An Epitaph upon the Death of Sir Philip Sidney, Knight, Lord-governor of Vlissing.

That England lost, that learning loved, that every truth commended,
That feyne did prayse, that prince did rays, that country so defended,
Here lyes the man: lyke to the swan, who knowing shee shall die,
Doeth tune her voice unto the spheares, and scornes mortalitie.
Two worthie Earls his uncle were: a lady was his mother,
A knight his father, and himselfe a noble countesse brother.
Beloved, bewailed: alive, now dead: of all with tears for ever,
Here lyes Sir Philip Sidnei's corps, whom cruell death did sever.
He liv'd for her, he dyed for her: for when he dyed,
he lived:
O graunt (O God) that wee of her, may never bee depriv'd.

AN ODE.*

As it fell upon a day,
In the merrie month of May,
Sitting in a pleasant shade,
Which a grove of myrtles made,
Beastes did leap, and birds did singe,
Trees did grow, and plants did spring;
Every thing did banish mone,
Save the nightingale alone,
Shee (poore bird) as all forlorne,
Lean'd her breast up-till a thorne,
And there sung the dolefull'st ditty,
Not to heare it was greate pitty:
Fye, fie, fie, now would she cry;
Teru Teru, by and by:
That to heare her so complaine,
Scarce I could from tears refraine,
For her griefs so lively shoune
Made me thinke upon mine oune.
Ah (thought I,) thou mornst in vaine,
None takes pity on thy paine.

* The first part of this Ode was set to music as a Madrigal for four voices by the Earl of Mornington, father of the Duke of Wellington; for three voices by W. Knyvett; and as a duett by Mr. Henry R. Bishop, to be sung by Miss Stephens and Miss M. Tree in Shakspeare's Comedy of Errors. The words are printed, with slight variations, all for the worse, in Clark's "Glees," &c. 1814, p. 20, where the authorship is attributed to Shakspeare. Edit.

Sensless trees, they cannot heere thee;
Ruthlesse bears, they wil not cheere thee;
King Pandion, he is dead;
All thy friends are lapt in lead,
All thy fellow birds doe singe,
Carelesse of thy sorrowing;
Whilst as fickle fortune smilde,
Thou and I were both beguilde.
Everie one that flatters thee,
Is no friend in miserie:
Words are easie like the winde,
Faithfull friends are hard to finde:
Everie man will bee thy friend
Whilst thou hast wherwith to spend;
But if store of crounes be scant,
No man will supply thy want.
If that one be prodigall,
Bountifull they will him call;
And with such like flattering,
Pitty but hee were a king.
If he bee adict to vice,
Quickly him they will entice.
If to woemen he be bent,
They have at commaundement.
But if fortune once doe froune,
Then farwell his greate renoune.
They that faund on him before,
Use his company no more.
Hee that is thy friend indeed,
Hee will helpe thee in thy neede:
If thou sorrowe, hee will weep;
If thou wake, hee cannot sleepe;
Thus of everie griefe in harte,
Hee, with thee, doth bear a part:
These are certain signes to knowe
Faithfull friend from flatt'ring foe.

We must now add, as a conclusion, the fine couplet which Barnfield wrote on the death of Hawkins the Navigator.

"The waters were his winding sheete,—the sea was made his toombe, Yet for his fame, the Ocean Sea was not sufficient roome."

ENIGMA.

"A DELINQUENT there is, and we ever shall scout him,
For roguery never would flourish without him.
We're lovers of peace; but regardless of quiet,
This knave is the first in a row or a riot;
A strange, paradoxical elf, we declare,
That shies at a couple but clings to a pair.
Though at first in the right, still he's found in the wrong;
And though harmony wakes him, yet dies in the song.
Three-fifths of the error that poisons our youth,
Yet boasts of a formal acquaintance with truth.
Though not fond of boasting, yet given to brag;
And though proud of a dress, still content with a rag.
He sticks to our ribs, and he hangs by our hair,
And brings with him trouble, and torment and care;
Stands thick in our sorrows and floats in our tears,
Never leads us to Hope, but returns with our Fears:
To the worst of our passions is ever allied,
Grief, Anger, and Hatred, Rage, Terror, and Pride.
Yet still, notwithstanding, the rogue we might spare
If he kept back his old ugly phiz from the Fair."

The answer is a liquid,* which forms the third part of Rum, the fourth of Port, the fifth of Shrub, the sixth of Brandy, the seventh of Madeira, the eighth of Burgundy, the ninth of Bordeaux, the tenth of Maraschino. It is a letter which is not seen in the alphabet, forms no part of a syllable, and yet is found in every word.—V. D. L.

MIRABEAU.

WHAT aileth thee, oh Paris; Wherefore flow
Big tears upon thy breast, like driving rain
Upon the bosom of the foaming main,
Veiling its fury in the mists of woe?
Thy muffled music keepeth time with slow
And sad lament for him the Fates have slain;
As they of old for Thammuz in their pain
Made frantic moan, so France for Mirabeau.
She weeps for Thammuz—she whose Phœnix eye
Flouted the solar rays, beholds them shorn,
And with prophetic prescience, quivering high,
Her self-consuming fires and bosom torn:
Her sun-star set, her arm of power laid low,
France rends her vest, and mourns her Mirabeau.

---

NAPOLEON.

OLD things have passed, and from her fearful trance
Paris hath waked, her foot on ancient crowns
And dynasties time-gray, and long renowns;
In headstrong youth, she in Ambition's dance
Doth madly reel, and challenge change and chance;
Her Conqueror forth, his din of battle drowns
The thunder-peals of Jove, and at his frowns
Kingdoms must quail, and bow the knee to France.
She hath her glory—the Promethean rock,
The death-sobs of the martyr of her might—
"Give back, give back my dead"—th' electric shock
Shakes out the bars, and rends the gates of night;
Triumphant France bears home her mighty Brave
To fill,—oh glorious Mockery!—a grave.

* "The liquids are l, m, n, r."—Lindley Murray.

From the Christian Observer.

Reminiscences of Bishop Chase, No. 1, to be published quarterly, at fifty cents per number: Peoria, Illinois.

Bishop Chase is one of those remarkable men whom we may justly regard as raised up by Divine Providence as an instrument of special benefit to mankind. His zealous labours to extend the gospel of Christ, in connexion with the ministrations of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the western wilds of the American Union, have for nearly twenty years caused his name to be well known, and highly venerated in England, as well as in his native land. In 1823 he paid a visit to this country, in order to obtain aid in founding an episcopal theological seminary in Ohio, at that period almost entirely a dense forest, but destined rapidly to become the home of a numerous and thriving population; and with a prescient mind the good bishop determined to anticipate the tide of immigration, by providing beforehand the means of spiritual grace to meet it. His plan embraced the two-fold object of an ordinary academical establishment, and a school of the prophets, but with peculiar reference to the latter. Dr. Hobart, the bishop of the Protestant church in the State of New York, arrived in England before Bishop Chase, and laboured strenuously to thwart his project. He did not object to a secular college; but he urged that a theological seminary was unnecessary and mischievous; that the one in New York was adequate for every purpose; and that one in Ohio would only lead to sectional differences, and might ultimately tend to the dismemberment of the United States episcopal church. But it was out of the question that the bishops of sees located in independent states should submit themselves to the rule of New York; nor could the great mass of students of distant and newly settled districts be supposed able to find time or money for a course of education so far from home and in an expensive metropolis. Bishop Hobart's objections were therefore felt to be unreasonable, and he was at length induced to relinquish his opposition to the proposed institution, which was largely assisted by British liberality, and soon became a highly and increasingly important institution.

Since that period the name and plans of Bishop Chase have been familiar to the friends of religious institutions in England. His more recent visit, in aid of his new diocese in Illinois, which stands very much in the condition that Ohio did at his first visit, confirmed the feelings of regard and esteem in which the good prelate is held among British churchmen. The painful circumstances connected with his relinquishing the see of Ohio, were mercifully overruled to his founding a new one in a still more remote state; and Jubilee College, Illinois, will, we trust, become in a few years what Kenyon College is now.

In the mean time the good bishop has determined to publish an auto-biographical memoir, under the title of Reminiscences, and we have been favoured with the first sheet of the intended work, which relates to the bishop's ancestors, and brings down the narrative to the birth of the memorialist. It exhibits so curious and characteristic a sketch of manners in the United States in former days, that we will present it to our readers; more especially in the hope that it may make the intended work better known in this country, and procure subscriptions to it; for it is but justice to the writer to say that he has dedicated his private resources to objects of public religious benefit, and that in his latter days the profits of this work, should it be widely circulated, will be highly useful to him.

"Some Traits of the Writer's Ancestor, Captain Aquila Chase—His Settlement at Newbury—The movement of the Family thence to Sutton, and thence to Cornish, New Hampshire—Story of his mother and seven children going up Connecticut River in a Canoe.

"Aquila Chase, according to a tradition among his descendants, was a native of Cornwall, in England, and was born in 1618. It is certain from the records of the town of Newbury, at the mouth of Merrimack river, that he was the first captain who in a regular vessel ever sailed into that port. By reason of his nautical skill and enterprising character, he received an invitation from the inhabitants of that infant settlement to bring his family from Hampton, not far off, where they had lived a few years on coming to America, and make his home among them; and to ensure his compliance, the 'select men,' who acted as (what is called in other places than New England) a town council, tendered him the donation of several lots of land and some other immunities. He complied with their wishes, and became an inhabitant of that then promising maritime village.

"It appears from the records which the writer caused to be examined in Newburyport in 1826, that Captain Aquila Chase had several children and an affectionate wife, who made home to him more than ordinarily agreeable. Connected with these facts and circumstances there are recorded on the town books many events, which, being put together, fully justify in its main features the truth of the following singular story of this venerable ancestor of most of the New England Chases.

"It appears that the captain and his industrious family had improved the lots, which had been presented to him by the 'select men,' into a pretty garden; and while the enterprising and hardy parent was at sea, buffeting the waves and enduring the hardships of a voyage across the Atlantic, the wife and children felt that they could do no less than try to make him comfortable on his return and during his stay (short enough always) on shore.

"It happened on a year of peculiar vernal forwardness in gardening, after the captain had been absent a great part of the winter, and had delayed his return beyond the expected time, that this most affectionate family mutually conferred together on the great question how they could most acceptably, by their skill in gardening, welcome his return whom of all earthly beings they loved most. The boys proposed to force forward the potatoes; the girls thought that the sweet flowers of May would please him best; but the mother observed that she knew of something which would gratify him more than all. 'Green peas are your father's favourite,' said she, 'and it is my wish that we try to force them forward to the utmost of our power.'

"There was something more than that which met the eye in this expression. Mrs. Chase had often heard her husband complain of the danger to bodily health, in long voyages at sea, from the want of vegetable diet; for acids at that era were not known as means to obviate this evil. She therefore could not but mingle with the motives which prompted her to treat her husband with kindness, in presenting him with the first fruits of her garden on his arrival, something besides the mere pleasure of seeing him regale his appetite, and that was a settled conviction that the same would be for his health. 'He must have been a long time at sea,' said she to her children, when cultivating the favourite bed of peas; 'and who knows but this precaution may prevent some deadly disease?'

"Never were children more mindful of a parent's commands than were those of Captain Chase in all things relating to the cultivation of the garden peas meant to greet him on his expected arrival. The dark green vines of this delicious vegetable grew apace; the flowers put forth, and the pods formed and swelled; and, just as they were ready to pluck, a vessel was seen crowding all her sails to get into port.

"It was Sunday morning. The news came that she had passed the bar;—then that Captain Chase himself had been descried as if giving cheerful orders to his men;—again it was reported that he had arrived and laid his ship 'long side of Newbury old wharf.

"This indeed was a reality, and the grateful father was soon on shore, surrounded by his sons,—full of talk, of questions, and of glee. 'But it is the Sabbath,' said the youngest boy; 'we must not talk loud; the deacon will hear us if we do.' 'Suppose he do, my child,' said the father, tenderly embracing him; 'God hears us too, and knows our hearts and thoughts, and how thankful we all are for being permitted, after so long a voyage, to meet in peace and health.'

"As they were walking to their home, another of his sons said, 'Dear father, it will give mother a great deal of pleasure to see you.' 'I hope so, my son.' 'But she will be additionally happy when she sees you eat her green peas.' 'What green peas?' said the captain. 'Some that we have all been raising, at mother's particular request, to regale you on your arrival. No one else in Newberry has any half so forward. Yes, they are ready, mother said, to pick this moment; and when we came away she said she wished you had come on a week day, for then you should have had them for dinner.' 'Suppose we were yet to have them?' said the father. 'Did not the disciples of our Lord pluck the ears of corn, and rub them in their hands, and eat them too, on the Sabbath day; and may we not pick and eat the green peas without incurring the Divine displeasure?'

"This was reported to the ears of the mother, and consent was obtained to prepare the peas. And now comes the difficulty. Some one who was going home from 'meeting,' (for it was thought sinful to say, 'going home from church' in those days,) saw the captain's family in the garden on the Sabbath day, and that they were gathering peas! The next day he was cited to appear before the minister. The captain plead his own cause,—it seems one against many,—and cited the passage alluded to in his justification. At the close he alleged that he had been long at sea, and that the peas were necessary to his bodily health, and would be adjudged so by the physicians. It was unfortunate for him that he attempted to draw a contrast between his accusers and the ancient Scribes and Pharisees. This shut the door of mercy on him, and they pronounced him 'guilty.' They did not punish him corporeally, as in those days was common, with 'forty stripes save one,' but they laid a heavy fine upon him, and compelled him to pay.

"It does not appear that Captain Chase retained any ill will towards the people of Newberry on account of this treatment: on the contrary, all his descendants have had and still have a traditionary affection for the place and its inhabitants, where their venerable ancestor was invited to reside, and where he spent so many of his happiest days.

"Moses, the youngest son of Aquila Chase, was born the 24th of December, 1663. He married Ann Folansbee, November 10, 1684, and had many children. His first was Daniel, born September 20, 1685. He (Daniel) moved to Sutton, and married Sarah March, January 2, 1707. This couple, also, had many children. Their first-born was Samuel, who married Mary Dudley; and these were the grandparents of the writer of this memoir. Their second son Dudley was the writer's father, who married Alice Corbett, of Mendon, August 23, 1753. They lived in Sutton about ten years, and then moved to New Hampshire, where having obtained the grant, from Governor Bowdoin, of a township of land on Connecticut river, they settled, and called it Cornish, in honour of the parent country of their common ancestor.

"This happened previously to any settlements being made to the northward of Charlestown, then called Fort No. 4, on the forementioned river Connecticut, which divides Vermont from New Hampshire. The writer's father, Dudley Chase, the second son of Samuel Chase, was the first, with his family, then consisting of his wife and seven children, to take possession of the soil, which was then covered by an entire forest of the largest and tallest trees.

"When the family, in their painful journey through the woods, arrived at Fort No. 4, it was thought advisable that his mother and children should remain there for shelter, and for their greater security from the Indians. To this arrangement his mother consented, although, as she told him, it was with the greatest reluctance. 'I shuddered,' she said, 'at the thought of being penned up with my precious bairns within the precincts of a narrow fort, rudely built for defence against savages, for a period of time I knew not how long; for it was sixteen miles up the river whither your father and his company of workmen were going, where the land was to be cleared, and the crop for the approaching season was to be planted. But necessity is an imperious dictate, and submission was my duty. It was nevertheless a hard parting when your father pressed his babes to his bosom, and mine to his manly cheek, as he stepped into his canoe, and took command of his little fleet of stout and cheerful men, both able and willing to subdue the forest and plant the virgin soil.

"'It was sometime in the early spring that this parting scene took place on the banks of the Connecticut river. The bud was then bursting from its wintry fetters; the birds were commencing their wooing songs, and the wild herbage sprang up all around me. Among these I wandered, admired their beauty, and inhaled their sweets: but all had no charms for me while your father was gone. I tried to banish my fears for his safety when I thought of his defenceless state, and the proximity of the ruthless savage; for there was then war between France and England, and no fort between us and Canada. I also endeavoured to seek refuge from my painful feelings in employment for myself and children; but our condition in the fort precluded the observance of regularity, and without that, little can be done. So much mingling of contending interests, especially among a crowd of little children, bade defiance to all efforts for order or peace. Days seemed weeks, and weeks seemed months; and scarcely did a sun rise without witnessing my wanderings on the banks of the flowing stream where I had parted from your father and his blithe company of Cornish woodmen.

"'It was in one of these walks, that, with my children by my side, I saw, as the day drew to its close, a canoe coming round a point of the river bank above me. I first thought of the approach of savages; but before I had time to flee I recognised the well-known canoe of your father, and in it our trusty neighbour Diah Spalding. My heart leaped with joy; and no sooner did the canoe reach the shore, than the children were in it and on his knees; nor did they suffer him to stir till they had told him I was resolved that we should all return with him to their father in the woods. 'Do you know, are you apprised, dear madam,' said he, respectfully approaching me, 'are you aware that such has been our anxiety to put in a crop, and plant the ground for the coming summer, that we have found no time to erect the semblance of a house? I am come to tell you your husband is well and all his men are well, and to obtain information of your health and safety, and to carry back with me a recruit of provisions for their comfort; but we have all slept upon the uncovered ground, and as yet have no place to shelter ourselves —much less you and your little ones—from the pelting of the storm; and will you venture with them into the woods before you are sure of a refuge.' 'I will go, and with all my children endure any storm, if you will give me but a safe and speedy conveyance to my husband. If there be no shelter, or fence, or fort, his faithful arm will guard me, and his trusty men will aid him; and their God, who is above all, ruleth all, and directeth all, will provide.'

"'A much smaller degree of sagacity than our neighbour Spalding possessed, would have been sufficient to make him sensible that it was in vain to thwart a resolution so firmly taken; and the speedy removal once determined on, all the force of his ingenuous and friendly mind was called into action to make things ready. Such goods as we needed least were secured in the fort; and such as the boats would carry, and we needed most, with ample provisions, were put on board; and the morning sun had scarcely risen, ere the indefatigable exertions of Spalding, and the anxious assiduity of my children, had made all things ready for the voyage. Spalding was a good canoe man; and under the protection of the Almighty, in whom our trust was placed, the exertions of his strong arm, and the industrious aid of my elder sons, made our speed, though slow, yet unceasing; and, in time of war, ascending a rapid stream in a frail Indian canoe, we reached before night the little opening among the towering trees, from whence the spot of your father's choice appeared to our longing eyes. 'There they are,' said the mingled voices of my children; 'there is our dear father, and yonder are his men; I hear his voice, and the sound of their axes.' For a moment all was hidden from our view, by the density of the intervening forest trees. This gave me time to utter what was labouring in my bosom,—a prayer of faith and benediction. 'God of our ancestors, bless your father, and me your helpless mother, and you my loved children, now, even now, as we shall, in a few minutes, take possession of this our dwelling-place in the wild woods: and though, like Jacob, we have nought but a stone for our pillow, and the canopy of heaven for a covering, may we all find God indeed to be in this place; and may this place be to us a house of God and a gate of heaven!' What a moment was this to one who had left all for her husband and the future fortunes of her children! The wealth of India would have been meanly estimated in comparison of the endeared spot before me.

"'With your leave, madam,' said pilot Spalding, 'I think it prudent that your husband come to us, and give orders where he will have his family landed.' Accordingly he made fast the canoe to the willows, and desired us to wait his return. Your father could get no direct answer from Spalding as to the nature of the cargo he had brought. 'Come and see,' was all he would say. 'Is all well?' said your father; 'have you brought us a good supply of food?' 'Come and see,' replied Spalding with animation, and in an instant they burst upon our view; and as your dear father stood on the margin of the high bank, he saw beneath his feet the frail bark in which were his wife and children. The emotion was almost too much for him. I saw this, and sprang forward, the children quickly following. He received us with a mixture of joy mingled with agony: 'Are you come to die here,' he exclaimed, 'before your time? We have no house to shelter you, and you will perish before we can get one erected.' 'Cheer up, cheer up, my faithful!" said I to your father; 'let the smiles and the ruddy faces of your children, and the health and cheerfulness of your wife, make you joyful. If you have no house, you have strength and hands to make one. The God we worship will bless us, and help us to obtain a shelter. Cheer up, cheer up, my faithful!"

"'The sunshine of joy and hope began to beam from his countenance; the news was communicated throughout the company of workmen, and the woods rang with shouts at the arrival of the first white woman and the first family on the banks of the Connecticut river above Fort No. 4. All assembled to see the strangers, and strove to do them acts of kindness. The trees were quickly felled and peeled, and the clean bark in large sheets was spread for a floor: other sheets, being fastened by thongs of twisted twigs to stakes driven in the ground, were raised for walls, or laid on cross pieces for a roof; and the cheerful fire soon made glad our little dwelling.—The space of three hours was not consumed in effecting all this: and never were men more happy than those who had contributed thus speedily and thus effectually to supply our wants. Beds were brought from the canoe to this rustic pavilion, and on them we rested sweetly, fearless of danger, though the thick foliage was wet with dew, and the wild beasts howled all around us, trusting in the protecting hand of Providence, and the watchful fidelity of our faithful neighbours.

"'The next day all hands were called to build a cabin, which served us for the coming winter, and in which, cheered by the rising prospects of the family, and the mutual affection of all around us, my enjoyments were more exquisite than at any subsequent period of my life.'

"Thus far the story from the lips of his venerable mother. It will serve to show with what unsubdued, pure and patriotic spirits, New England was first overspread with inhabitants.

"The names of the children of Dudley Chase, and Alice his wife, are as follows:—Before moving to Cornish, N. H., Mercy, Louis, Abigail, Simeon, Salmon, Ithamar, Baruch. After coming to Cornish, Alice, Sarah, Corbett, Heber, Dudley, Rachel, Philander.

"Of these Salmon was a barrister in Portland, Me., of whom the late Judge Dawes, of Boston, was heard to say he 'never saw him enter the court but with feelings of respect.' Died in 1806. Ithamar was for many years member of the council of state of New Hampshire. Died in Keene, N. H., in 1819. Baruch was solicitor for Hillsborough county, N. H., for many years, and president of Merrimack County Bank. Died March 4, 1841, at Hopkinton, N. H. Heber was a physician. Died in 1799, in Demerara, South America. Dudley was long a member and speaker of the legislature of Vermont, afterwards chief justice of that state, and senator in the Congress of the United States, and of whom the writer has heard the late President of the United States—the lamented General Harrison—say, that during the last war with England, while associated with him in congress, he had no friend on whose steady patriotism he could more confidentially rely."

Philander, the youngest, is the present venerable bishop, the Western episcopal pioneer, who has set an example that may work its way, North and West, to the Arctic circle and Nootka Sound. Jubilee College was to open last January.

TO AN OLD LIVING POET.

To thee that art the summer's nightingale,
Thy sovereign goddesses' most dear delight
Why do I send this rustic madrigale,
That may thy tuneful ear unseason quite?—Spenser.

Dear friend and poet! leafy June
Sheds light and shadow o'er thy head;
And still the blackbird's sylvan tune,
At sunrise, lures thee from thy bed.

Each olden book, like fragrant clime,
Far o'er the azure Indian sea,
Opens the treasuries of time,
And gives its rubies unto thee.

Imagination's wondrous lamp
Still shines upon thy studious hour;
Thy footsteps haunt the Angelic Camp;*
Thy couch is spread in Helen's bower.†

About thy gate, at morn and eve,
Linger meek Spirits of the lyre;
Soft raiment for thy thoughts they weave;
And warm thee with their eyes of fire.

Beneath their radiant feet, the ground
With summer-bloom of flowers grows bright;
And Spring, with red-rose garland crown'd,
Breathes odour on thy wintry night.

Sweet Poet of the field and brook,
Of fading hamlet—village tomb;
Thy lip, from Nature's golden book,
Pours wisdom through the scholar's room.

O teach us now one studious hour,
At morn, or noon, to give to thee;
On Nature's shrine to lay one flower;
And learn one lesson at her knee.

Poet and Friend! in hope and fear,
Upon thy tranquil life I gaze;
And see in thy declining year
The shadows warm'd by summer rays.

O'er the tempestuous wave of grief,
Thy faith goes wandering, like the dove;
Like her, oft bringing home a leaf
To crown the pilgrimage of love.

How sweet thy winter-evening's close!
No cloud of storm—no voice of strife!
And childhood's own sweet-scented rose,
Still blooming on the edge of life!

STEPHENS'S TRAVELS IN CENTRAL AMERICA.

Mr. Stephens is favourably known to the English reading public, for some lively, rattling, off-hand Incidents of Travel in Egypt, Asia Minor, Russia, &c., which have attained the unprofitable honour of two or three rival reprints from the American edition. The present work, however, is of a much higher character than its predecessors, possessing all the dashing vivacity and animation of the author, mollified by experience, with the great advantage of being exercised in a new field and under highly-favourable circumstances. If sufficient interest was imparted to travels through countries forming part of the grand tour, by a sprightly and picturesque style, inclining towards a florid eloquence, and reflecting in every page the personal character of the writer, to induce booksellers to send forth all but simultaneous editions, and some of them intended for popular circulation, the additional attraction these qualities derive from being exercised in a country new in all senses may be readily imagined. The personal characteristics of Mr. Stephens, which seemed strange at the least in Europe, were more in place in Central America. His familiarity, wearing an air of what would be deemed impudence in an European, appears to have been adapted to the thin colonial population of Spanish Creoles and interminable races of Indians and mixed breeds; his perpetual-motion propensities, which seemed so singular in Europe, alone got him through his travels in the primitive forests, swamps, and mountains of Central America, where part of the main road between the capital and the principal sea-port was a "narrow gulley, worn by the tracks of mules and mountain torrents so deep that the sides were higher than our heads, and so narrow that we could barely pass through without touching," and sometimes impassable altogether; and a pushing disposition, not too nice in its requisitions, was necessary to deal with Spanish inertness, increased by the lassitude of the Tropics, and the suspicions of ignorance, in a country almost shut out from the world, and distracted by civil war.

Central America, Chiapas, and Yucatan, the regions Mr. Stephens explored, form the greatest part of that very irregularly-shaped neck of land which unites the two Americas, terminating on the North in Mexico, and on the South just excluding the Isthmus of Darien. Those who have not a modern map at hand, will form an idea of their position by hearing that they lie on the mainland opposite to the West Indies. Chiapas nominally belongs to Mexico; so did Yucatan, but had just set up for itself when Mr. Stephens got there. The political condition of Guatemala or Central America may be inferred from the fact that our author was an accredited agent for the United States, and travelled with his credentials and a diplomatic dress coat all through the country in search of a government, without being able to find one.

Yucatan is an alluvial flat, without rivers or springs; and the water of the rainy season is preserved in large tanks, which has caused a curious kind of feudalism: the Indians being too improvident to take heed for the morrow, render suit and service to the great Spanish proprietors, on condition of being supplied with water, and are adscripti aquæ instead of glebæ. Guatemala and Chiapas have much more varied features.

Although the Andes have not in these countries the gigantic character they possess in South America, they rise to a height sufficient in the high table lands to form a temperate climate—a perpetual spring within the Tropics. In the loftier ranges numerous active volcanos are found; mineral wealth is said to exist in them, and of course there is a British Company engaged in exhuming it; the loftiest mountain peaks are sterile, but most other parts of the soil are fertile in vegetation of every kind; the plains and valleys teem with the rank luxuriance of the Tropics; the table-lands produce the vegetables, fruits, and grain of a temperate clime; and in short, between the highest and lowest points of vegetation, almost every plant can be grown which depends upon climate only. The great natural advantage of Guatemala, however, is the all but ready-made connexion of the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans. The great lake of Nicaragua, having an average depth of fifteen fathoms, is within sixteen miles of the Pacific; the only known outlet of this inland sea is the river San Juan, navigable for craft drawing four feet water, to the Atlantic Ocean, in despite of rapids, and capable of being improved for the passage of ships. At present no commerce is carried on upon this remarkable line of navigation; it might almost be said that nothing floats upon it. As soon, however, as a settled country and stable government can give security to commerce and capitalists, it is easy to see that this water-line will be the seat of an extensive transit-trade: whether it will ever answer the full expectations of sanguine men and supersede Cape Horn, is very questionable, as regards coarse and bulky commodities.

This magnificent country, capable of supplying the whole world with tropical produce if the existing marts were struck with barrenness, is thinly peopled, miserably poor in all except the productions grown upon the spot, and torn by intestine divisions, which have nearly destroyed or banished the more respectable families, and seem to render government impossible. We have already seen the nature of their ways; indeed, except in the vicinity of the large towns, where a rock foundation gives a via ready made, there is no such thing as a road; and on the main track of the country the traveller may ride for two or three days without meeting a village, sometimes without even a settler, and the villages are in general merely a collection of hovels—what substantial buildings there are in the country date from the first period of the Spanish conquest.

To this land Mr. Stephens was sent on a special confidential mission, by Mr. Van Buren, in October, 1839, with liberty to travel on his own account, when he had either succeeded or failed for the public. Apparently, Mr. Stephens had been studying the descriptions and disquisitions by Humboldt and others on the aboriginal ruins and antiquities of the country formerly included in old Mexico; for he engaged Mr. Catherwood, an artist, to accompany him on his journey. The two friends sailed direct to the British settlement of Honduras; whence, like Mr. Montgomery, his predecessor of the year before, the diplomatist steamed to Izabel, the port of Guatemala, the capital. On his journey, he heard that there were a couple of governments in the country; but which had the best claims either de jure or de facto, was no easy matter to decide. He also heard that there were at Copan, a few days' journey out of his road, some ruins of that primeval architecture which is the puzzle of antiquaries; and largely interpreting his travelling clause, thither he and his artist companion went, encountering many hardships and adventures on their way, from the nature of the country, the ignorance and suspicions of the people, and the disturbed state of public affairs. Arrived at the city of Guatemala, Mr. Stephens found the government driven out which he had been accredited to, but some expected it would return with its army. The people who were uppermost, of course, claimed to be the true government; but Mr. Stephens had doubts about the fact; the British Consul-General was equally sceptical, with plainer speech, for he wrote to know if the government was in existence; and if it were, there was a military adventurer dictator over it. Mr. Stephens therefore determined to examine the other government, at St. Salvador: but here a new difficulty arose; for the ways were beset by a gentleman with a flag of his own, who fleeced all parties that fell in his way, without regard to politics. Luckily, however, the captain of a French vessel, which lay off St. Salvador, had made the land journey and been hunted for his life, having only escaped by riding sixty miles in one day through a mountainous country. Sick of travelling in Central America, M. de Nouvelle sent off a native courier to order up his ship, merely to take him back again; and offered Mr. Stephens a passage. After many adventures, he at last found a Vice-President, but the government he was in search of depended upon a victory which eventually happened to be a defeat.—However, the upshot was, Mr. Stephens rode the whole length of Central America, turning aside to examine any natural curiosity or ruined work of art; surveyed the line of canal that had been planned to connect Lake Nicaragua with the Pacific, cutting his way through the wood; was present at the last contest, which seems likely to establish anarchy in the state of Guatemala, he and his party being the sole occupants of a town in which the "affair" was fought out, except the clergy and people whose age or infirmity prevented their running away. Arrived again at Guatemala, the victorious government were too much afraid of their military protector even to ask Mr. Stephens for his credentials; and he departed, taking his return through the Northern part of Central America, Chiapas, and Yucatan, in order to visit the ruined aboriginal cities of Palenque and Usmal.

The volumes before us have a threefold character—1. The usual characteristics of a book of travels, personal adventures, with sketches of people, manners, and scenery: and in this point of view it is the best work that has lately appeared; any errors or defects of taste being more than counterbalanced by the hearty pleasantness of manner, the vivacity of the style, and the novelty of the subject,—for Mr. Montgomery's journey was very much less extended, and his powers both of writing and observation very inferior to those of Mr. Stephens. 2. There is a curious chapter, and what may turn out to be a very critical one in the history of Guatemala, and indeed of Spanish America; the present military dictator being an Indian, his army consisting of Indians, and the aristocratical party and priests, who made use of him to destroy the Liberals, beginning to suspect they have done a foolish thing in making the Indians acquainted with their strength. 3. The work contains a sufficient description with graphic illustrations of the most striking remains of the cities of the aboriginals of America, which have excited so much learned speculation; and Stephens's Central America will offer the popular reader by far the pleasantest and the best idea of the subject.

The travels of Mr. Stephens begin at Belize, the chief and only town of our settlement of Honduras; whose mahogany renders the name familiar to many who know nothing of its geography; and from his sketch of it we will take a picture of

COLOURS AT BELIZE.

By this time I had twice passed the whole length of the principal street, and the town seemed in the entire possession of blacks. The bridge, the market-place, the streets, and stores, were thronged with them, and I might have fancied myself in the capital of a Negro republic. They were a fine looking race, tall, straight, and athletic, with skins black, smooth, and glossy as velvet, and well dressed; the men in white cotton shirts and trousers, with straw hats, and the women in white frocks with short sleeves and broad red borders, and adorned with large red earrings and necklaces; and I could not help remarking that the frock was their only article of dress, and that it was the fashion of these sable ladies to drop this considerably from off the right shoulder, and to carry the skirt in the left hand, and raise it to any height necessary for crossing puddles.

On my way back I stopped at the house of a merchant, whom I found at what is called a second breakfast. The gentleman sat on one side of the table and his lady on the other. At the head was a British officer, and opposite him a mulatto; on his left was another officer, and opposite him also a mulatto. By chance a place was made for me between the two coloured gentlemen. Some of my countrymen, perhaps, would have hesitated about taking it, but I did not; both were well dressed, well educated, and polite. They talked of their mahogany works, of England, hunting, horses, ladies, and wine; and before I had been an hour in Belize I learned that the great work of practical amalgamation, the subject of so much angry controversy at home, had been going on quietly for generations; that colour was considered mere matter of taste; and that some of the most respectable inhabitants had black wives, and mongrel children, whom they educated with as much care and made money for with as much zeal as if their skins were perfectly white.

In all Spanish America the government and the church seem to have been the great builders, and the great civilisers, such civilisation as it is. Churches, public offices, with here and there a bridge, are met with upon a much larger scale of grandeur than in our colonies; and in a few cities, where the grandees congregated, the houses are well built: but all this labour for endurance has passed for the present, and the country is on the decline.

A PICTURE OF DESOLATION.

At six o'clock we rose upon a beautiful table of land, on which stood another gigantic church. It was the seventh we had seen that day; and coming upon them in a region of desolation, and by mountain paths which human hands had never attempted to improve, their colossal grandeur and costliness were startling, and gave evidence of a retrograding and expiring people. This stood in a more desolate place than any we had yet seen. The grass was green, the sod unbroken even by a mule-path; not a human being was in sight, and even the gratings of the prison had no one looking through them. It was, in fact, a picture of a deserted village. We rode up to the cabildo; the door of which was fastened and the shed barricaded, probably to prevent the entrance of straggling cattle. We tore away the fastenings, broke open the door, and, unloading the mules, sent Augustin on a foraging expedition. In half an hour he returned with one egg, being all that he was able to procure; but he had waked up the village, and the alcalde, an Indian with a silver-headed cane, and several alguazils with long thin rods or wands of office, came down to examine us. We showed them our passport, and told them where we were going; at which, with their characteristic indifference of manner, they expressed no surprise. They could not read the passport, but they examined the seal and returned it. We asked them for eggs, fowls, milk, &c.; to all of which they answered, what afterwards became too familiar, "No hay"—"There is none," and in a few minutes they retired and left us to ourselves.

CUSTOMS OF THE COUNTRY.

The proprieties of life are matters of conventional usage. Our host was a don; and when we presented our letter, he received us with great dignity, in a single garment, loose, white, and very laconic, not quite reaching his knees. The dress of his wife was no less easy; somewhat in the style of the old-fashioned short-gown and petticoat, only the short-gown and whatever else is usually worn under it were wanting, and their place supplied by a string of beads, with a large cross at the end. A dozen men and half-grown boys, naked except the small covering formed by rolling the trousers up and down in the manner I have mentioned, were lounging about the house; and women and girls in such extremes of undress, that a string of beads seemed quite a covering for modesty.

Mr. C. and I were in a rather awkward predicament for the night. The general reception-room contained three beds, made of strips of cow-hide interlaced. The don occupied one: he had not much undressing to do, but what little he had he did by pulling off his shirt. Another bed was at the foot of my hammock. I was dozing, when I opened my eyes and saw a girl about seventeen sitting sideway upon it, smoking a cigar. She had a piece of striped cotton cloth tied around her waist, and falling below her knees: the rest of her dress was the same which nature bestows alike upon the belle of fashionable life and the poorest girl; in other words, it was the same as that of the don's wife, with the exception of the string of beads. At first, I thought it was something I had conjured up in a dream; and as I waked-up, perhaps I raised my head, for she gave a few quick puffs of her cigar, drew a cotton sheet over her head and shoulders, and lay down to sleep. I endeavoured to do the same. I called to mind the proverb, that "travelling makes strange bedfellows." I had slept pellmell with Greeks, Turks, and Arabs. I was beginning a journey in a new country: it was my duty to conform to the customs of the people, to be prepared for the worst, and to submit with resignation to whatever might befall me.

As guests, it was pleasant to feel that the family made no strangers of us. The wife of the don retired with the same ceremonies. Several times during the night we were waked by the clicking of flint and steel, and saw one of our neighbours lighting a cigar. At daylight the wife of the don was enjoying her morning slumber. While I was dressing, she bade me good morning, removed the cotton covering from her shoulders, and arose dressed for the day.

SHOEMAKING AT GUATEMALA.

At the moment of starting, our remaining attendant said he could not go until he had made a pair of shoes; and we were obliged to wait; but it did not take long. Standing on an untanned cow-hide, he marked the size of his feet with a piece of coal, cut them out with his matchete, made proper holes, and, passing a leather string under the instep, around the heel, and between the great doigt du pied and the one next to it, was shod.

CURATES OF GUATEMALA.

In the course of the day I had an opportunity of seeing, what I afterwards observed throughout all Central America, the life of labour and responsibility passed by the cura in an Indian village, who devotes himself faithfully to the people under his charge.—Besides officiating in all the services of the church, visiting the sick, and burying the dead, my worthy host was looked up to by every Indian in the village as a counsellor, friend, father. The door of the convent was always open, and Indians were constantly resorting to him: a man who had quarrelled with his neighbour, a wife who had been badly treated by her husband, a father whose son had been carried off as a soldier, a young girl deserted by her lover, all who were in trouble or affliction, came to him for advice and consolation, and none went away without it.—And besides this, he was principal director of all the public business of the town; the right-hand of the alcalde; and had been consulted whether or not I ought to be considered a dangerous person. But the performance of these multifarious duties, and the excitement and danger of the times, were wearing away his frame. Four years before, he gave up the capital, and took upon himself this curacy; and during that time he had lived a life of labour, anxiety, and peril; cut off from all the delights of social intercourse that make labour welcome; beloved by the Indians, but without any to sympathise with him in his thoughts and feelings.

SIGHT OF THE TWO OCEANS.

Beyond this we came into an open region, where nothing but cedar and thorns grew; and here I saw whortleberries for the first time in Central America. In that wild region there was a charm in seeing any thing that was familiar to me at home, and I should perhaps have become sentimental, but they were hard and tasteless. As we rose we entered a region of clouds; very soon they became so thick that we could see nothing; the figures of our own party were barely distinguishable, and we lost all hope of any view from the top of the volcano. Grass still grew, and we ascended till we reached a belt of barren sand and lava; and here, to our great joy, we emerged from the region of clouds, and saw the top of the volcano, without a vapour upon it, seeming to mingle with the clear blue sky; and at that early hour the sun was not high enough to play upon its top.

Mr. Lawrence, who had exerted himself in walking, lay down to rest, and the doctor and I walked on. The crater was about two miles in circumference, rent and broken by time or some great convulsion: the fragments stood high, bare, and grand as mountains, and within were three or four smaller craters. We ascended on the south side by a ridge running east and west till we reached a high point, at which there was an immense gap in the crater impossible to cross. The lofty point on which we stood was perfectly clear, the atmosphere was of transparent purity; and looking beyond the region of desolation below us, at a distance of perhaps two thousand feet, the whole country was covered with clouds, and the city at the foot of the volcano was invisible. By degrees the more distant clouds were lifted, and over the immense bed we saw at the same moment the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. This was the grand spectacle we had hoped, but scarcely expected to behold. My companions had ascended the volcano several times, but on account of the clouds had only seen the two seas once before. The points at which they were visible were the Gulf of Nicoya and the harbour of San Juan, not directly opposite, but nearly at right angles to each other, so that we saw them without turning the body. In a right line over the tops of the mountains neither was more than twenty miles distant, and from the great height at which we stood they seemed almost at our feet. It is the only point in the world which commands a view of the two seas; and I ranked the sight with those most interesting occasions when from the top of Mount Sinai I looked out upon the Desert of Arabia, and from Mount Hoar I saw the Dead Sea.

THE CARRIAGE OF THE COUNTRY.

We had brought the silla with us merely as a measure of precaution, without much expectation of being obliged to use it; but at a steep pitch, which made my head almost burst to think of climbing, I resorted to it for the first time. It was a large, clumsy arm-chair, put together with wooden pins and bark strings. The Indian who was to carry me, like all the others, was small, not more than five feet seven, very thin, but symmetrically formed. A bark strap was tied to the arms of the chair; and sitting down, he placed his back against the back of the chair, adjusted the length of the strings, and smoothed the bark across his forehead with a little cushion to relieve the pressure. An Indian on each side lifted it up; and the carrier rose on his feet, stood still a moment, threw me up once or twice to adjust me on his shoulders, and set off with one man on each side. It was a great relief; but I could feel every movement, even to the heaving of his chest. The ascent was one of the steepest on the whole road. In a few minutes he stopped and sent forth a sound usual with Indian carriers, between a whistle and a blow, always painful to my ears, but which I never felt so disagreeably before. My face was turned backward; I could not see where he was going, but observed that the Indian on the left fell back. Not to increase the labour of carrying me, I sat as still as possible; but in a few minutes, looking over my shoulder, saw that we were approaching the edge of a precipice more than a thousand feet deep. Here I became very anxious to dismount; but I could not speak intelligibly, and the Indians could or would not understand my signs. My carrier moved along carefully with his left foot first, feeling that the stone on which he put it down was steady and secure before he brought up the other, and by degrees, after a particularly careful movement, brought both feet up within half a step of the edge of the precipice, stopped, and gave a fearful whistle and blow. I rose and fell with every breath, felt his body trembling under me, and his knees seemed giving way. The precipice was awful, and the slightest irregular movement on my part might bring us both down together. I would have given him a release in full for the rest of the journey to be off his back; but he started again, and with the same care ascended several steps, so close to the edge that even on the back of a mule it would have been very uncomfortable. My fear lest he should break down or stumble was excessive. To my extreme relief the path turned away; but I had hardly congratulated myself upon my escape before he descended a few steps. This was much worse than ascending: if he fell, nothing could keep me from going over his head; but I remained till he put me down of his own accord. The poor fellow was wet with perspiration, and trembled in every limb. Another stood ready to take me up, but I had enough. Pawling tried it, but only for a short time. It was bad enough to see an Indian toiling with a dead-weight on his back; but to feel him trembling under one's own body, hear his hard breathing, see the sweat rolling down him, and feel the insecurity of the position, made this a mode of travelling which nothing but constitutional laziness and insensibility could endure. Walking, or rather climbing, stopping very often to rest, and riding when it was at all practicable, we reached a thatched shed where we wished to stop for the night; but there was no water.

Although many of the sketches of civil war and its effects have an intrinsic interest, the main interest of the historical passages of Mr. Stephens's work arises from the peculiar character of this revolution,—an ignorant Indian domineering over the country, without even the slight regard to forms under which a dictator generally veils his power; not, it would appear, from any willing disregard of White usages, but simply from not knowing better, for Mr. Stephens thinks that he means well, and would act rightly if he knew how. Carrera, for so he is named, was originally a drum-boy under the aristocratic party; but retiring in disgust when a revolution placed the Liberals uppermost, he turned pig-driver. The measures of the dominant party in respect to the church, coupled with the devastations of the cholera, the hatred of foreigners, and the intrigues of the clergy, induced the Indians to rise en masse; and with Carrera at the head of those of his district, they murdered several of the authorities, and cut to pieces a party sent to treat with them. Defeated by the Government troops, themselves were scattered, their villages burned, and among other excesses the last outrage was perpetrated on Carrera's wife. Vowing vengeance, he commenced a buccaneering or partisan warfare at the head of a few followers, who gradually increased in number; and, under the advice of a profligate priest, he issued proclamations, demanding, among other things, a return to old usages and customs. In the mean time, dissensions broke out among the party in power. One faction rose against their quondam friends; the aristocratic party, or such of them as were left, either remaining quiescent or joining the rebels. Carrera was applied to by the weaker; and thus was laid the foundation of his rapid advance, through the internal dissensions of the Spaniards, and their want of spirit and power of combining together to resist, when resistance was almost sure of success. The strange mixture of native energy, passion, and intelligence in Carrera's character, with the native simplicity and ignorance of an uneducated Indian, strangely contrasting with his position—as well as the strange events in his career, and the steps by which he attained his power—must be read in Mr. Stephens's volumes. But we will take one passage—his first entry into Guatemala, when the insurgent inhabitants of Antigua, despairing of success, had called upon Carrera to join them.

CARRERA'S ENTRANCE INTO GUATEMALA.

On Wednesday, Carrera joined the rebels. He had sent his emissaries to the villages, rousing the Indians, and promising them the plunder of Guatemala; and on Thursday, with a tumultuous mass of half-naked savages, men, women, and children, estimated at ten or twelve thousand, presented himself at the gate of the city. The [rebel] Antiguanos themselves were struck with consternation, and the citizens of Guatemala were thrown into a state bordering on distraction.

Efforts at negotiation failed.

"In the mean time, Carrera's hordes were advancing. The commandant of the Antiguans asked him if he had his masses divided into squares or companies; he answered, 'No entiendo nada de eso. Todo es uno.' ('I don't understand any thing of that. It is all the same.') Among his leaders were Monreal and other known outlaws, criminals, robbers, and murderers. He himself was on horseback, with a green bush in his hat, and hung round with pieces of dirty cotton cloth covered with pictures of the saints. A gentleman who saw them from the roof of his house, and who was familiar with all the scenes of terror which had taken place in that unhappy city, told me that he never felt such consternation and horror as when he saw the entry of this immense mass of barbarians; choking up the streets, all with green bushes in their hats, seeming at a distance like a moving forest; armed with rusty muskets, old pistols, fowling-pieces, some with locks and some without; sticks formed into the shape of muskets, with tin-plate locks; clubs, matchetes, and knives tied to the end of long poles; and swelling the multitude were two or three thousand women, with sacks and alforgas for carrying away the plunder. Many, who had never left their villages before, looked wild at the sight of the houses and churches, and the magnificence of the city. They entered the plaza, vociferating 'Viva la religion, y muerte a los etrangeros!' Carrera himself, amazed at the immense ball he had set in motion, was so embarrassed that he could not guide his horse. He afterwards said that he was frightened at the difficulty of controlling this huge and disorderly mass. The traitor Barundia, the leader of the Opposition, the Catiline of this rebellion, rode by his side on his entry into the plaza.

"At sun-down the whole multitude set up the Salve, or Hymn to the Virgin. The swell of human voices filled the air, and made the hearts of the inhabitants quake with fear. Carrera entered the Cathedral; the Indians, in mute astonishment at its magnificence, thronged in after him, and set up around the beautiful altar the uncouth images of their village saints. Monreal broke into the house of General Prem, and seized a uniform coat, richly embroidered with gold; into which Carrera slipped his arms, still wearing his straw-hat with its green bush. A watch was brought him, but he did not know the use of it. Probably, since the invasion of Rome by Alaric and the Goths, no civilised city was ever visited by such an inundation of barbarians.

"And Carrera alone had power to control the wild elements around him. As soon as possible, some of the authorities sought him out, and in the most abject terms begged him to state on what conditions he would evacuate the city. He demanded the deposition of Galvez, the chief of the state, all the money, and all the arms the Government could command. The priests were the only people who had any influence with him; and words cannot convey any idea of the awful state of suspense which the city suffered, dreading every moment to hear the signal given for general pillage and massacre. The inhabitants shut themselves up in their houses; which, being built of stone, with iron balconies to the windows, and doors several inches thick, resisted the assaults of straggling parties; but atrocities more than enough were committed, as it seemed, preliminary to a general sacking. The Vice-President of the Republic was murdered; the house of Flores, a Deputy, sacked, his mother knocked down by a villian with the butt of a musket, and one of his daughters shot in the arm with two balls.

"The house of Messrs. Klee, Skinner, and Co., the principal foreign merchants in Guatemala, which was reported to contain ammunition and arms, was several times attacked with great ferocity: having strong balconied windows, and the door being secured by bales of merchandise piled up within, it resisted the assaults of an undisciplined mob, armed only with clubs, muskets, knives, matchetes. The priests ran through the streets bearing the crucifix, in the name of the Virgin and saints restraining lawless Indians, stilling the wildness of passion, and saving the terrified inhabitants. * * *

"Pending the negotiation, Carrera, dressed in Prem's uniform, endeavoured to restrain his tumultuous followers; but several times he said that he could not himself resist the temptation to sack Klee's house, and those of the other Ingleses. There was a strange dash of fanaticism in the character of this lawless chieftain. The battle-cry of his hordes was "Viva la religion!" The palace of the Archbishop had been suffered to be used as a theatre by the Liberals; Carrera demanded the keys, and putting them in his pocket, declared that, to prevent any future pollution, it should not be opened again until the banished Archbishop returned to occupy it.

"At length the terms upon which he consented to withdraw were agreed upon,—viz: eleven thousand dollars in silver, ten thousand to be distributed among his followers and one thousand for his own share, a thousand muskets, and a commission as Lieutenant-Colonel for himself. The amount of money was small as the price of relief from such imminent danger, but it was an immense sum in the eyes of Carrera and his followers, few of whom were worth more than the rags on their backs and the stolen arms in their hands: and it was not easily raised; the treasury was bankrupt, and the money was not very cheerfully contributed by the citizens. The madness of consenting to put in the hands of Carrera a thousand muskets was only equalled by the absurdity of making him a Lieutenant-Colonel.

"On the afternoon of the third day the money was paid, the muskets delivered, and Carrera was invested with the command of the province of Mita, a district near Guatemala. The joy of the inhabitants at the prospect of his immediate departure was without bounds; but at the last moment an awful rumour spread, that the wild bands had evinced an uncontrollable eagerness, before leaving, to sack the city. A random discharge of muskets in the plaza confirmed the rumour, and the effect was dreadful. An hour of terrible suspense followed; but at five o'clock they filed off in straggling crowds from the plaza. At the Plaza de Toros they halted, and firing their muskets in the air, created another panic. A rumour was revived that Carrera had demanded four thousand dollars more, and that unless he received it he would return and take it by force. Carrera himself did actually return, and demanded a field-piece, which was given him; and at length, leaving behind him a document requiring the redress of certain grievances, to the unspeakable joy of all the inhabitants he left the city."

We have no wish to undervalue the grounds the citizens had for their panic, or to defend the atrocities of the Indians, from the seizure of General Prem's uniform-coat up to the sacking of the house of Senor Flores. At the same time, looking at the doings of civilised soldiers when they take towns—Badajoz and St. Sebastian, for example—and bearing in mind the personal injuries which their Indian leader had suffered, we doubt whether Carrera with his "hordes" might not be safer visitants of a city than Wellington and his heroes, or any other Marshal of them all.

The length to which this notice has extended prevents our entering upon the subject of the ruined cities Mr. Stephens surveyed, and the more striking monuments of which Mr. Catherwood has drawn to illustrate the prose descriptions or exhibit the arts of an aboriginal people: for we are disposed to agree with our author in his conclusions, that these buildings were the works of Americans, and if not erected by the nation which Cortes found on his invasion of Mexico, yet by a similar race. In getting rid, however, of the antediluvian style of building which some have discovered in these monuments—or the Chinese, or Hindoo, or Egyptian, to which others have had recourse—one difficulty still remains, namely, the origin of this American civilisation, such as it was. We say such as it was, for our inspection of the drawings of Mr. Catherwood confirms the opinion we expressed when reviewing Mrs. Hamilton Gray's Sepulchres of Etruria, "that nothing perishes which is worthy to live." In looking at these buildings, with their statues, columns, and various ornaments, we see nothing from which the Old World could have derived any improvement—nothing, indeed, which it had not outgrown three thousand years ago. Mr. Stephens, notwithstanding the enthusiasm of an explorer, candidly admits, that in style of art, and in power over mechanics, they are inferior to the Egyptian monuments. To us they appear to exhibit an inferiority of intellect: the mechanical execution, the mere cutting, appears to have been finished to a high degree; but so is the workmanship of the paddles, prows of canoes, &c. of backward and almost barbarous nations. In style, we do not look for the ideal; but this people seemed scarcely to have arrived at the point of endeavouring to represent things as they actually are. Their human face is grotesque in form and expression; the extremities of the limbs only exhibited, the intermediate parts being nondescript monstrosities; not from any want of mechanical power to express the parts, but from a mental weakness, a vicious style, which seemed to distrust nature. The chief exceptions to this criticism are in the bas-reliefs at Palenque; which would appear to show that Mexican art was in its decadence during its later period, if the inference of Mr. Stephens is correct, that Palenque was a ruined city in the age of Cortes. The clearest point about them is the combined labour required for their erection, arguing despotic power of some kind, monarchical, priestly, or in the system of castes; either or all of which may be deduced from the accounts of the first invaders.

In every clime, full many a time,
With foes I've had a rub,—
On sea and land I've made my stand,

EMERSON'S ESSAYS.

THIS volume is a reprint of an American book, with a candid preface by Carlyle; at whose suggestion, probably, it has appeared with a London imprint. According to Mr. Carlyle, Emerson is a very remarkable man—an American who has "the invaluable talent of sitting still;" one who having attempted public life with good omens of success, has withdrawn from it into solitude and privacy, content to "sit down to spend his life not in Mammon worship, or the hunt for reputation, influence, place, or any outward advantage whatsoever." A self-dependent man is, no doubt, a rare thing any where, but especially in the United States: at the same time, it is perhaps neither Emerson's philosophic independence nor his genius which has attracted Mr. Carlyle's notice, so much as his modes of thought and quaint peculiarity of diction; both of which have a resemblance to those of his English editor, though not enough to stamp him a mere imitator.

The Essays possess faults enough to justify Mr. Carlyle's assertion that "such a book can never expect to become popular here." The looseness of structure, the want of plan inherent in the essay, has often been pointed out as tempting an author to extend his lucubrations as long as he can say any thing about his subject; a temptation overcome only by the artist, who sees distinctly the particular branch which he is going to treat, and determinedly rejects every thing not directly bearing upon it. To this temptation Emerson has yielded, and so fully that he sometimes continues pouring out words with no meaning at all, or a very subordinate one, after he has exhausted his view of the question—or what, in an essay, is much the same, after he has said his best things. He is also deficient in large and vigorous logic; sometimes putting forward a limited truth as if it were as extensive as creation, or advancing a truth as universal, which possibly may be so, but which he does not prove. He as often dogmatises as reasons, and sometimes merely declaims. His style is peculiar—quaint, and rather affected; partaking of the nature of Carlyle, Hazlitt, and Leigh Hunt, but rather founded on than copied from them. When the truth is cogent or the illustration happy, the effect is striking and powerful; but when the thought is common, or imperfectly developed, as is frequently the case, the peculiarity of the manner alone remains —not pleasing, if not offensive. Yet the style is probably one cause of the effect of the book; for it is not always that its best thoughts are new thoughts, but truths presented in a new and more striking way. With all these drawbacks, however, Ralph Waldo Emerson is a man of genius—a deep, original, and independent thinker; scorning the conventionalities of life, holding cheap the mechanicals of literature, and speaking what he deems the truth; careless whether he offends opinion or pleases taste, and not always careful whether he presents his view distinctly to the minds of others.

To enumerate the twelve Essays would not be of much utility; for several reasons. Sometimes the treatment of the subject is so peculiar, that the reader finds nothing which he expects from the title, though an intelligible word enough. The essay on "History," for instance, deals not at all with matters which relate to history in the usual meaning; but refers to the only use which in Emerson's opinion can be made of the works of the past—events, persons, literature, and so forth; whilst he expresses himself about this use so oddly and mystically that few will be certain of what he does mean, though it would seem to be, that the productions of the past have no other use than to enable us to understand ourselves. "Self-Reliance," again, as he treats of it, is rather an inculcation to originality of thought and independence of action—a hortative to men to discover their own natural bent, and give it free scope, instead of imitating individuals or submitting to the opinions and usages of society. "Spiritual Laws" has no relation whatever to theology; but inculcates a kind of practical "fate and metaphysical aid"—that we are taught independently of the teaching of others or of ourselves by the facts and circumstances of our lives, and that mental existence—all connected with mind—is independent, and cannot be affected by accident. "Compensation," to give a last example, does not mean any thing which most readers would infer, but is an endeavour to show that "whatever is is right"—that there is little evil at large, no misfortunes to ourselves; a doctrine the truth of which merely goes to the extent that there is no unmixed evil in the physical world, but which, as regards mind, is very lamely handled by Mr. Emerson, being assumed instead of proved. The utility of the book does not, therefore, consist in the complete view which it propounds upon a series of subjects, or even in any principle which it deduces upon any single topic: its use is in its detached thoughts; and as these have not always a strict relation to the place where they are found, we shall in the examples we take affix the name of the essay to the quotation.

DEAD CONFORMITY.

The objection to conforming to usages that have become dead to you is, that it scatters your force; it loses your time, and blurs the impression of your character. If you maintain a dead church, contribute to a dead bible society, vote with a great party either for the government or against it, spread your table like base housekeepers; under all these screens, I have difficulty to detect the precise man you are. And, of course, so much force is withdrawn from your proper life. But do your thing, and I will know you. Do your work, and you shall reinforce yourself. A man must consider what a blind-man's-buff is this game of conformity. If I know your sect, I anticipate your argument. I hear a preacher announce for his text and topic the expediency of one of the institutions of his church. Do I not know beforehand that not possibly can he say a new and spontaneous word? do I not know that with all this ostentation of examining the grounds of the institution, he will do no such thing? do I not know that he is pledged to himself not to look but at one side; the permitted side, not as a man, but as a parish minister? He is a retained attorney, and these airs of the bench are the emptiest affectation. Well, most men have bound their eyes with one or another handkerchief, and attached themselves to some one of these communities of opinion. This conformity makes them not false in a few particulars, authors of a few lies, but false in all particulars. Their every truth is not quite true.—Essay on Self-Reliance.

COURAGE NECESSARY FOR NONCONFORMITY.

For nonconformity the world whips you with its displeasure. And therefore a man must know how to estimate a sour face. The bystanders look askance on him in the public street or in the friend's parlour. If this pollution, it should not be opened again until the banished Archbishop returned to occupy it.

"At length the terms upon which he consented to withdraw were agreed upon,—viz: eleven thousand dollars in silver, ten thousand to be distributed among his followers and one thousand for his own share, a thousand muskets, and a commission as Lieutenant-Colonel for himself. The amount of money was small as the price of relief from such imminent danger, but it was an immense sum in the eyes of Carrera and his followers, few of whom were worth more than the rags on their backs and the stolen arms in their hands: and it was not easily raised; the treasury was bankrupt, and the money was not very cheerfully contributed by the citizens. ### DEAD CONFORMITY.

The objection to conforming to usages that have become dead to you is, that it scatters your force; it loses your time, and blurs the impression of your character. If you maintain a dead church, contribute to a dead bible society, vote with a great party either for the government or against it, spread your table like base housekeepers; under all these screens, I have difficulty to detect the precise man you are. And, of course, so much force is withdrawn from your proper life. But do your thing, and I will know you. Do your work, and you shall reinforce yourself. A man must consider what a blind-man's-buff is this game of conformity. If I know your sect, I anticipate your argument. I hear a preacher announce for his text and topic the expediency of one of the institutions of his church. Do I not know beforehand that not possibly can he say a new and spontaneous word? do I not know that with all this ostentation of examining the grounds of the institution, he will do no such thing? do I not know that he is pledged to himself not to look but at one side; the permitted side, not as a man, but as a parish minister? He is a retained attorney, and these airs of the bench are the emptiest affectation. Well, most men have bound their eyes with one or another handkerchief, and attached themselves to some one of these communities of opinion. This conformity makes them not false in a few particulars, authors of a few lies, but false in all particulars. Their every truth is not quite true.—Essay on Self-Reliance.

COURAGE NECESSARY FOR NONCONFORMITY.

For nonconformity the world whips you with its displeasure. And therefore a man must know how to estimate a sour face. The bystanders look askance on him in the public street or in the friend's parlour. If this aversation had its origin in contempt and resistance like his own, he might well go home with a sad countenance; but the sour faces of the multitude, like their sweet faces, have no deep cause, disguise no god, but are put on and off as the wind blows and a newspaper directs. Yet is the discontent of the multitude more formidable than that of the senate and the college. It is easy enough for a firm man who knows the world to brook the rage of the cultivated classes. Their rage is decorous and prudent; for they are timid, as being very vulnerable themselves. But when to their feminine rage the indignation of the people is added, when the ignorant and the poor are aroused, when the unintelligent brute force that lies at the bottom of society is made to growl and mow, it needs the habit of magnanimity and religion to treat it godlike as a trifle of no concernment.—Essay on Self-Reliance.

TIMOROUSNESS OF THE AGE.

The sinew and heart of man seem to be drawn out, and we are become timorous desponding whimperers. We are afraid of truth, afraid of fortune, afraid of death, and afraid of each other. Our age yields no great and perfect persons. We want men and women who shall renovate life and our social state, but we see that most natures are insolvent; cannot satisfy their own wants, have an ambition out of all proportion to their practical force, and so do lean and beg day and night continually. Our housekeeping is mendicant; our arts, our occupations, our marriages, our religion we have not chosen, but society has chosen for us. We are parlour soldiers. The rugged battle of fate, where strength is born, we shun.—Essay on Self-Reliance.

Mr. Carlyle tells us that Emerson is understood to have studied theology in his youth; and there are traces of divinity-learning in his book. The following passage smacks of this, and is moreover a remarkable specimen of idiomatic English.

THE PREACHER'S DOCTRINE OF COMPENSATION.

I was lately confirmed in these desires by hearing a sermon at church. The preacher, a man esteemed for his orthodoxy, unfolded in the ordinary manner the doctrine of the last judgment. He assumed that judgment is not executed in this world; that the wicked are successful; that the good are miserable; and then urged from reason and from Scripture a compensation to be made to both parties in the next life. No offence appeared to be taken by the congregation at this doctrine. As far as I could observe, when the meeting broke up, they separated without remark on the sermon.

Yet, what was the import of this teaching? what did the preacher mean by saying, that the good are miserable in the present life? Was it that houses and lands, offices, wine, horses, dress, luxury, are had by unprincipled men, whilst the saints are poor and despised; and that a compensation is to be made to these last hereafter, by giving them the like gratifications another day—bank-stock and doubloons, venison and champagne? This must be the compensation intended; for what else? Is it that they are to have leave to pray and praise, to love and serve men? Why, that they can do now. The legitimate inference the disciple would draw was, "We are to have such a good time as the sinners have now;" or, to push it to its extreme import, "You sin now; we shall sin by and by; we would sin now if we could; not being successful, we expect our revenge to-morrow."—Essay on Compensation.

THE PAST.

When the act of reflection takes place in the mind, when we look at ourselves in the light of thought, we discover that our life is embosomed in beauty. Behind us, as we go, all things assume pleasing forms, as clouds do far off. Not only things familiar and stale, but even the tragic and terrible are comely, as they take their place in the pictures of memory. The river-bank, the weed at the water-side, the old house, the foolish person, however neglected in the passing, have a grace in the past. Even the corpse that has lain in the chambers has added a solemn ornament to the house. The soul will not know either deformity or pain.—Essay on Spiritual Laws.

NO LEARNING WITHOUT PREPARATION.

No man can learn what he has not preparation for learning, however near to his eyes is the object. A chemist may tell his most precious secrets to a carpenter, and he shall be never the wiser; the secrets he would not utter to a chemist for an estate. God screens us evermore from premature ideas. Our eyes are holden that we cannot see things that stare us in the face, until the hour arrives when the mind is ripened; then we behold them, and the time when we saw them not is like a dream. Essay on Spiritual Laws.

THE SPIRIT SELF-PROTECTING.

What can we see or acquire but what we are? You have seen a skilful man reading Virgil. Well, that author is a thousand books to a thousand persons. Take the book into your two hands, and read your eyes out, you will never find what I find. If any ingenious reader would have a monopoly of the wisdom or delight he gets, he is as secure now the book is Englished, as if it were imprisoned in the Pelews' tongue. It is with a good book as it is with good company. Introduce a base person among gentlemen: it is all to no purpose; he is not their fellow. Every society protects itself. The company is perfectly safe, and he is not one of them, though his body is in the room.—Essay on Spiritual Laws.

FORCE OF TRUTH.

Dreadful limits are set in nature to the powers of dissimulation. Truth tyrannises over the unwilling members of the body. Faces never lie, it is said. No man need be deceived who will study the changes of expression. When a man speaks the truth in the spirit of truth, his eye is as clear as the heavens. When he has base ends, and speaks falsely, the eye is muddy and sometimes asquint.

I have heard an experienced counsellor say that he feared never the effect upon a jury of a lawyer who does not believe in his heart that his client ought to have a verdict. If he does not believe it, his unbelief will appear to the jury, despite all his protestations, and will become their unbelief. This is that law whereby a work of art, of whatever kind, sets us in the same state of mind wherein the artist was when he made it. That which we do not believe we cannot adequately say, though we may repeat the words never so often.—Essay on Spiritual Laws.

INTELLECT.

Intellect and intellection signify, to the common ear, consideration of abstract truth. The consideration of time and place, of you and me, of profit and hurt, tyrannise over most men's minds. Intellect separates the fact considered from you, from all local and personal reference, and discerns it as if it existed for its own sake. Heraclitus looked upon the affections as dense and coloured mists. In the fog of good and evil affections, it is hard for man to walk forward in a straight line. Intellect is void of affection, and sees an object as it stands in the light of science, cool and disengaged. The intellect goes out of the individual, floats over its own personality, and regards it as a fact, and not as I and mine. He who is immersed in what concerns person or place cannot see the problem of existence. This the intellect always ponders. Nature shows all things formed and bound. The intellect pierces the form, overleaps the wall, detects intrinsic likeness between remote things, and reduces all things into a few principles.—Essay on Intellect.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-FIFTH.

While the worst passions of the worst men were thus working in the dark, and the mantle of religion, assumed to cover the ugliest deformities, threatened to become the shroud of all that was good and peaceful in society, a circumstance occurred which once more altered the position of two persons from whom this history has long been separated, and to whom it must now return.

In a small English country-town, the inhabitants of which supported themselves by the labour of their hands in plaiting and preparing straw for those who made bonnets and other articles of dress and ornament from that material,—concealed under an assumed name, and living in a quiet poverty which knew no change, no pleasures, and few cares but that of struggling on from day to day in the one great toil for bread,—dwelt Barnaby and his mother.—Their poor cottage had known no stranger's foot since they sought the shelter of its roof five years before; nor had they in all that time held any commerce or communication with the old world from which they had fled. To labour in peace, and devote her labour and her life to her poor son, was all the widow sought. If happiness can be said at any time to be the lot of one on whom a secret sorrow preys, she was happy now. Tranquillity, resignation, and her strong love of him who needed it so much, formed the small circle of her quiet joys; and while that remained unbroken, she was contented.

For Barnaby himself, the time which had flown by, had passed him like the wind. The daily suns of years had shed no brighter gleam of reason on his mind; no dawn had broken on his long, dark night. He would sit sometimes—often for days together—on a low seat by the fire or by the cottage door, busy at work (for he had learnt the art his mother plied,) and listening, God help him, to the tales she would repeat, as a lure to keep him in her sight. He had no recollection of these little narratives; the tale of yesterday was new upon the morrow; but he liked them at the moment; and when the humour held him, would remain patiently within doors, hearing her stories like a little child, and working cheerfully from sunrise until it was too dark to see.

At other times,—and then their scanty earnings were barely sufficient to furnish them with food, though of the coarsest sort,—he would wander abroad from dawn of day until the twilight deepened into night. Few in that place, even of the children, could be idle, and he had no companions of his own kind. Indeed there were not many who could have kept up with him in his rambles, had there been a legion.—But there were a score of vagabond dogs belonging to their neighbours, who served his purpose quite as well. With two or three of these, or sometimes with a full half-dozen barking at his heels, he would sally forth on some long expedition that consumed the day; and though, on their return at nightfall, the dogs would come home limping and sore-footed, and almost spent with their fatigue, Barnaby was up and off again at sunrise with some new attendants of the same class, with whom he would return in like manner. On all these travels, Grip, in his little basket at his master's back, was a constant member of the party, and when they set off in fine weather and in high spirits, no dog barked louder than the raven.

Their pleasures on these excursions were simple enough. A crust of bread and scrap of meat, with water from the brook or spring, sufficed for their repast. Barnaby's enjoyments were, to walk, and run, and leap, till he was tired; then to lie down in the long grass, or by the growing corn, or in the shade of some tall tree, looking upward at the light clouds as they floated over the blue surface of the sky, and listening to the lark as she poured out her brilliant song. There were wild flowers to pluck—the bright red poppy, the gentle harebell, the cowslip, and the rose. There were birds to watch; fish, ants, worms, hares or rabbits, as they darted across the distant pathway in the wood and so were gone: millions of living things to have an interest in, and lie in wait for, and clap hands and shout in memory of, when they had disappeared. In default of these, or when they wearied, there was the merry sunlight to hunt out, as it crept in aslant through leaves and boughs of trees, and hid far down—deep, deep, in hollow places—like a silver pool, where nodding branches seemed to bathe and sport; sweet scents of summer air breathing over fields of beans or clover; the perfume of wet leaves or moss; the life of waving trees, and shadows always changing. When these or any of them tired, or in excess of pleasing tempted him to shut his eyes, there was slumber in the midst of all these soft delights, with the gentle wind murmuring like music in his ears, and every thing around melting into one delicious dream.

Their hut—for it was little more—stood on the outskirts of the town, at a short distance from the high road, but in a secluded place, where few chance passengers strayed at any season of the year. It had a plot of garden-ground attached, which Barnaby in fits and starts of working, trimmed, and kept in order. Within doors and without, his mother laboured for their common good; and hail, rain, snow, or sunshine, found no difference in her.

Though so far removed from the scenes of her past life, and with so little thought or hope of ever visiting them again, she seemed to have a strange desire to know what happened in the busy world. Any old newspaper or scrap of intelligence from London, she caught at with avidity. The excitement it produced was not of a pleasurable kind, for her manner at such times expressed the keenest anxiety and dread; but it never faded in the least degree. Then, and in stormy winter nights, when the wind blew loud and strong, the old expression came into her face, and she would be seized with a fit of trembling, like one who had an ague. But Barnaby noted little of this; and putting a great constraint upon herself, she usually recovered her accustomed manner before the change had caught his observation.

Grip was by no means an idle or unprofitable member of the humble household. Partly by dint of Barnaby's tuition, and partly by pursuing a species of self-instruction common to his tribe, and exerting his powers of observation to the utmost, he had acquired a degree of sagacity which rendered him famous for miles round. His conversational powers and surprising performance were the universal theme: and as many persons came to see the wonderful raven, and none left his exertions unrewarded—when he condescended to exhibit, which was not always, for genius is capricious—his earnings formed an important item in the common stock. Indeed, the bird himself appeared to know his value well; for though he was perfectly free and unrestrained in the presence of Barnaby and his mother, he maintained in public an amazing gravity, and never stooped to any other gratuitous performances than biting the ankles of vagabond boys (an exercise in which he much delighted,) killing a fowl or two occasionally, and swallowing the dinners of various neighbouring dogs, of whom the boldest held him in great awe and dread.

Time had glided on in this way, and nothing had happened to disturb or change their mode of life, when, one summer's night in June, they were in their little garden, resting from the labours of the day.—The widow's work was yet upon her knee, and strewn upon the ground about her; and Barnaby stood leaning on his spade, gazing at the brightness in the west, and singing softly to himself.

"A brave evening, mother! If we had, chinking in our pockets, but a few specks of that gold which is piled up yonder in the sky, we should be rich for life."

"We are better as we are," returned the widow with a quiet smile. "Let us be contented, and we do not want and need not care to have it, though it lay shining at our feet."

"Ay!" said Barnaby, resting with crossed arms on his spade, and looking wistfully at the sunset, "that's well enough, mother; but gold's a good thing to have. I wish that I knew where to find it. Grip and I could do much with gold, be sure of that."

"What would you do?" she asked.

"What! A world of things. We'd dress finely—you and I, I mean; not Grip—keep horses, dogs, wear bright colours and feathers, do no more work, live delicately and at our ease. Oh, we'd find uses for it, mother, and uses that would do us good. I would I knew where gold was buried. How hard I'd work to dig it up!"

"You do not know," said his mother, rising from her seat and laying her hand upon his shoulder, "what men have done to win it, and how they have found, too late, that it glitters brightest at a distance, and turns quite dim and dull when handled."

"Ay, ay; so you say; so you think," he answered, still looking eagerly in the same direction. "For all that, mother, I should like to try."

"Do you not see," she said, "how red it is? Nothing bears so many stains of blood as gold. Avoid it. None have such cause to hate its name as we have. Do not so much as think of it, dear love. It has brought such misery and suffering on your head and mine as few have known, and God grant few may have to undergo. I would rather we were dead and laid down in our graves, than you should ever come to love it."

For a moment Barnaby withdrew his eyes and looked at her with wonder. Then, glancing from the redness in the sky to the mark upon his wrist as if he would compare the two, he seemed about to question her with earnestness, when a new object caught his wandering attention, and made him quite forgetful of his purpose.

This was a man with dusty feet and garments, who stood, bareheaded, behind the hedge that divided their patch of garden from the pathway, and leant meekly forward as if he sought to mingle with their conversation, and waited for his time to speak. His face was turned towards the brightness too, but the light that fell upon it showed that he was blind, and saw it not.

"A blessing on those voices!" said the wayfarer. "I feel the beauty of the night more keenly, when I hear them. They are like eyes to me. Will they speak again, and cheer the heart of a poor traveller!"

"Have you no guide?" asked the widow, after a moment's pause.

"None but that," he answered, pointing with his staff towards the sun: "and sometimes a milder one at night, but she is idle now."

"Have you travelled far?"

"A weary way and long," rejoined the traveller as he shook his head. "A weary, weary way. I struck my stick just now upon the bucket of your well—be pleased to let me have a draught of water, lady."

"Why do you call me lady?" she returned. "I am as poor as you."

"Your speech is soft and gentle, and I judge by that," replied the man. "The coarsest stuffs and finest silks are—apart from the sense of touch—alike to me. I cannot judge you by your dress."

"Come round this way," said Barnaby, who had passed out at the garden gate and now stood close beside him. "Put your hand in mine. You're blind and always in the dark, eh? Are you frightened in the dark? Do you see great crowds of faces, now? Do they grin and chatter?"

"Alas!" returned the other, "I see nothing.—Waking or sleeping, nothing."

Barnaby looked curiously at his eyes, and touching them with his fingers, as an inquisitive child might do, led him towards the house.

"You have come a long distance," said the widow, meeting him at the door. "How have you found your way so far?"

"Use and necessity are good teachers, as I have heard—the best of any," said the blind man, sitting down upon the chair to which Barnaby had led him, and putting his hat and stick upon the red-tiled floor. "May neither you nor your son ever learn under them. They are rough masters."

"You have wandered from the road, too," said the widow, in a tone of pity.

"Maybe, maybe," returned the blind man with a sigh, and yet with something of a smile upon his face, "that's likely. Handpost sand milestones are dumb, indeed, to me. Thank you the more for this rest, and this refreshing drink!"

As he spoke, he raised the mug of water to his mouth. It was clear, and cold, and sparkling, but not to his taste, nevertheless, or his thirst was not very great, for he only wetted his lips and put it down again.

He wore, hanging with a long strap round his neck, a kind of scrip or wallet, in which to carry food. The widow set some bread and cheese before him, but he thanked her, and said that through the kindness of the charitable he had broken his fast once since morning, and was not hungry. When he had made her this reply, he opened his wallet, and took out a few pence, which was all it appeared to contain.

"Might I make bold to ask," he said, turning towards where Barnaby stood looking on, "that one who has the gift of sight, would lay this out for me in bread to keep me on my way? Heaven's blessing on the young feet that will bestir themselves in aid of one so helpless as a sightless man!"

Barnaby looked at his mother, who nodded assent; in another moment he was gone upon his charitable errand. The blind man sat listening with an attentive face, until long after the sound of his retreating footsteps was inaudible to the widow, and then said, suddenly, and in a very altered tone:

"There are various degrees and kinds of blindness, widow. There is the connubial blindness, ma'am, which perhaps you may have observed in the course of your own experience, and which is a kind of wilful and self-bandaging blindness. There is the blindness of party, ma'am, and public men, which is the blindness of a mad bull in the midst of a regiment of soldiers clothed in red. There is the blind confidence of youth, which is the blindness of young kittens, whose eyes have not yet opened on the world; and there is that physical blindness, ma'am, of which I am, contrary to my own desire, a most illustrious example. Added to these, ma'am, is that blindness of the intellect, of which we have a specimen in your interesting son, and which, having sometimes glimmerings and dawnings of the light, is scarcely to be trusted as a total darkness. Therefore, ma'am, I have taken the liberty to get him out of the way for a short time, while you and I confer together, and this precaution arising out of the delicacy of my sentiments towards yourself, you will excuse me, ma'am, I know."

Having delivered himself of this speech with many flourishes of manner, he drew from beneath his coat a flat stone bottle, and, holding the cork between his teeth, qualified his mug of water with a plentiful infusion of the liquor it contained. He politely drained the bumper to her health, and the ladies, and setting it down empty, smacked his lips with infinite relish.

"I am a citizen of the world, ma'am," said the blind man, corking his bottle, "and if I seem to conduct myself with freedom, it is the way of the world. You wonder who I am, ma'am, and what has brought me here. Such experience of human nature as I have, leads me to that conclusion, without the aid of eyes by which to read the movements of your soul as depicted in your feminine features. I will satisfy your curiosity immediately, ma'am; im-mediately." With that he slapped his bottle on its broad back, and having put it under his garment as before, crossed his legs and folded his hands, and settled himself in his chair, previous to proceeding any further.

The change in his manner was so unexpected, the craft and nakedness of his deportment were so much aggravated by his condition—for we are accustomed to see in those who have lost a human sense, something in its place almost divine—and this alteration bred so many fears in her whom he addressed, that she could not pronounce one word. After waiting, as it seemed, for some remark or answer, and waiting in vain, the visiter resumed:

"Madam, my name is Stagg. A friend of mine who has desired the honour of meeting with you any time these five years past, has commissioned me to call upon you. I should be glad to whisper that gentleman's name in your ear.—Zounds, ma'am, are you deaf? Do you hear me say that I should be glad to whisper my friend's name in your ear?"

"You need not repeat it," said the widow, with a stifled groan; "I see too well from whom you come."

"But as a man of honour, ma'am," said the blind man, striking himself on the breast, "whose credentials must not be disputed, I take leave to say that I will mention that gentleman's name. Ay, ay," he added, seeming to catch with his quick ear the very motion of her hand, "but not aloud. With your leave, ma'am, I desire the favour of a whisper."

She moved towards him, and stooped down. He muttered a word in her ear; and, wringing her hands, she paced up and down the room like one distracted. The blind man, with perfect composure, produced his bottle again, mixed another glassful; put it up as before; and, drinking from time to time, followed her with his face in silence.

"You are slow in conversation, widow," he said, after a time, pausing in his draught. "We shall have to talk before your son."

"What would you have me do?" she answered. "What do you want?"

"We are poor, widow, we are poor," he retorted, stretching out his right hand, and rubbing his thumb upon its palm.

"Poor!" she cried. "And what am I?"

"Comparisons are odious," said the blind man. "I don't know, I don't care. I say that we are poor. My friend's circumstances are indifferent, and so are mine. We must have our rights, widow, or we must be bought off. But you know that, as well as I, so where's the use of talking?"

She still walked wildly to and fro. At length, stopping abruptly before him, she said:

"Is he near here?"

"He is. Close at hand."

"Then I am lost!"

"Not lost, widow," said the blind man, calmly; "only found. Shall I call him?"

"Not for the world," she answered with a shudder.

"Very good," he replied, crossing his legs again, for he had made as though he would rise and walk to the door. "As you please, widow. His presence is not necessary that I know of. But both he and I must live; to live, we must eat and drink; to eat and drink, we must have money:—I say no more."

"Do you know how pinched and destitute I am?" she retorted. "I do not think you do, or can. If you had eyes, and could look around you on this poor cabin, you would have pity on me. Oh! let your heart be softened by your own affliction, friend, and have some sympathy with mine."

The blind man snapped his fingers as he answered.

"—Beside the question, ma'am, beside the question. I have the softest heart in the world, but I can't live upon it. Many a gentleman lives well upon a soft head, who would find a heart of the same quality a very great drawback. Listen to me. This is a matter of business, with which sympathies and sentiments have nothing to do. As a mutual friend, I wish to arrange it in a satisfactory manner, if possible; and thus the case stands. If you are very poor now, it's your own choice. You have friends who, in case of need, are always ready to help you. My friend is in a more destitute and desolate situation than most men, and, you and he being linked together in a common cause, he naturally looks to you to assist him. He has boarded and lodged with me a long time (for, as I said just now, I am very soft-hearted,) and I quite approve of his entertaining this opinion. You have always had a roof over your head; he has always been an outcast.—You have your son to comfort and assist you; he has nobody at all. The advantages must not be all on one side. You are in the same boat, and we must divide the ballast a little more equally.

She was about to speak, but he checked her, and went on.

"The only way of doing this, is by making up a little purse now and then for my friend; and that's what I advise. He bears you no malice that I know of, ma'am: so little, that although you have treated him harshly more than once, and driven him, I may say, out of doors, he has that regard for you that I believe, even if you disappointed him now, he would consent to take charge of your son, and to make a man of him."

He laid a great stress on these latter words, and paused as if to find out what effect they had produced. She only answered by her tears.

"He is a likely lad," said the blind man thoughtfully, "for many purposes, and not ill-disposed to try his fortune in a little change and bustle, if I may judge from what I heard of his talk with you to-night. Come. In a word, my friend has pressing necessity for twenty pounds. You, who can give up an annuity, can get that sum for him. It's a pity you should be troubled. You seem very comfortable here, and it's worth that much to remain so. Twenty pounds, widow, is a moderate demand. You know where to apply for it; a post will bring it you.—Twenty pounds!"

She was about to answer him again, but again he stopped her.

"Don't say any thing hastily; you might be sorry for it. Think of it a little while. Twenty pounds—of other people's money—how easy! Turn it over in your mind, I'm in no hurry. Night's coming on, and if I don't sleep here, I shall not go far.—Twenty pounds! Consider of it, ma'am, for twenty minutes; give each pound a minute; that's a fair allowance. I'll enjoy the air the while, which is very mild and pleasant in these parts."

With these words, he groped his way to the door, carrying his chair with him. Then seating himself under a spreading honeysuckle, and stretching his legs across the threshold so that no person could pass in or out without his knowledge, he took from his pocket a pipe, flint, steel, and tinder-box, and began to smoke. It was a lovely evening, of that gentle kind, and at that time of the year when the twilight is most beautiful. Pausing now and then to let his smoke curl slowly off, and to sniff the grateful fragrance of the flowers, he sat there at his ease—as though the cottage were his proper dwelling, and he had held undisputed possession of it all his life—waiting for the widow's answer and for Barnaby's return.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-SIXTH.

When Barnaby returned with the bread, the sight of the pious old pilgrim smoking his pipe and making himself so thoroughly at home, appeared to surprise even him; the more so as that worthy person, instead of putting up the loaf in his wallet as a scarce and precious article, tossed it carelessly on the table, and producing his bottle, bade him sit down and drink.

"For I carry some comfort you see," he said. "Taste that. Is it good?"

The water stood in Barnaby's eyes as he coughed from the strength of the draught, and answered in the affirmative.

"Drink some more," said the blind man; "don't be afraid of it. You don't taste any thing like that, often, eh?"

"Often!" cried Barnby. "Never!"

"Too poor!" returned the blind man with a sigh. "Ay. That's bad. Your mother, poor soul, would be happier if she was richer, Barnaby."

"Why, so I tell her—the very thing I told her just before you came to-night, when all that gold was in the sky," said Barnaby, drawing his chair nearer to him, and looking eagerly in his face. "Tell me. Is there any way of being rich, that I could find out?"

"Any way! A hundred ways."

"Ay, ay?" he returned. "Do you say so? What are they?—Nay, mother, it's for your sake I ask; not mine;—for yours, indeed. What are they?"

The blind man turned his face, on which there was a smile of triumph, to where the widow stood in great distress; and answered,

"Why, they are not to be found out by stay-at-homes, my good friend."

"By stay-at-homes!" cried Barnaby, plucking at his sleeve. "But I am not one. Now, there you mistake. I am often out before the sun, and travel home when he has gone to rest. I am away in the woods before the day has reached the shady places, and am often there when the bright moon is peeping through the boughs, and looking down upon the other moon that lives in water. As I walk along, I try to find, among the grass and moss, some of that small money for which she works so hard and used to shed so many tears. As I lie asleep in the shade, I dream of it—dream of digging it up in heaps; and spying it out, hidden under bushes; and seeing it sparkle, as the dew-drops do, among the leaves. But I never find it. Tell me where it is. I'd go there, if the journey were a whole year long, because I know she would be happier when I came home and brought some with me. Speak again. I'll listen to you if you talk all night."

The blind man passed his hand lightly over the poor fellow's face, and finding that his elbows were planted on the table, that his chin rested on his two hands, that he leaned eagerly forward, and that his whole manner expressed the utmost interest and anxiety, paused for a minute as though he desired the widow to observe this fully, and then made answer:

"It's in the world, bold Barnaby, the merry world; not in solitary places like those you pass your time in, but in crowds, in crowds, and where there's noise and rattle."

"Good! good!" cried Barnaby, rubbing hands.

"Yes! I love that. Grip loves it too. It suits us both. That's brave!"

"—The kind of places," said the blind man, "that a young fellow likes, and in which a good son may do more for his mother, and himself to boot, in a month, than he could here in all his life—that is, if he had a friend, you know, and some one to advise with."

"You hear this, mother!" cried Barnaby, turning to her with delight. "Never tell me we shouldn't heed it, if it lay shining at our feet. Why do we heed it so much now? Why do you toil from morning until night?"

"Surely," said the blind man, "surely. Have you no answer, widow? Is your mind," he slowly added, "not made up yet?"

"Let me speak with you," she answered, "apart."

"Lay your hand upon my sleeve," said Stagg, rising from the table; "and lead me where you will. Courage, bold Barnaby. We'll talk more of this: I've a fancy for you. Wait there till I come back. Now, widow."

She led him out the door, and into the little garden, where they stopped.

"You are a fit agent," she said, in a half-breathless manner, "and well represent the man who sent you here."

"I'll tell him that you said so," Stagg retorted. "He has a regard for you, and will respect me the more (if possible) for your praise. We must have our rights, widow."

"Rights! Do you know," she said, "that a word from me—"

"Why do you stop?" returned the blind man calmly, after a long pause. "Do I know that a word from you would place my friend in the last position of the dance of life? Yes, I do. What of that? It will never be spoken, widow."

"You are sure of that"

"Quite—so sure, that I don't come here to discuss the question. I say we must have our rights, or we must be bought off. Keep to that point, or let me return to my young friend, for I have an interest in the lad, and desire to put him in the way of making his fortune. Bah! you needn't speak," he added hastily; "I know what you would say: you have hinted at it once already. Have I no feeling for you, because I am blind? No, I have not. Why do you expect me, being in darkness, to be better than men who have their sight—why should you? Is the hand of God more manifest in my having no eyes, than in your having two? It's the cant of you folks to be horrified if a blind man robs, or lies, or steals; oh yes, it's far worse in him, who can barely live on the few half-pence that are thrown to him in your crowded streets, than in you, who can see, and work, and are not dependent on the mercies of the world. A curse on you! You who have seven senses may be wicked at your pleasure; we who have six, and want the most important, are to live and be moral on our affliction. The true charity and justice of rich to poor, all the world over!"

He paused a moment when he had said these words, and caught the sound of money, jingling in her hand.

"Well?" he cried, quickly resuming his former manner. "That should lead to something. "The point, widow?"

"First answer me one question," she replied. "You say he is close at hand. Has he left London?"

"Being close at hand, widow, it would seem he has," returned the blind man.

"I mean, for good? You know that."

"Yes, for good. The truth is, widow, that his making a longer stay there might have had disagreeable consequences. He has come away for that reason."

"Listen," said the widow, telling some money out upon a bench beside them. "Count."

"Six," said the blind man, listening attentively. "Any more?"

"They are the savings," she answered, "of five years. Six guineas."

He put out his hand for one of the coins; felt it carefully, put it between his teeth, rung it on the bench; and nodded to her to proceed.

"These have been scraped together and laid by, lest sickness or death should separate my son and me. They have been purchased at the price of much hunger, hard labour, and want of rest. If you can take them—do—on condition that you leave this place upon the instant, and enter no more into that room where he sits now, expecting your return."

"Six guineas," said the blind man, shaking his head, "though of the fullest weight that were ever coined, fall very far short of twenty pounds, widow."

"For such a sum, as you know, I must write to a distant part of the country. To do that, and receive an answer, I must have time."

"Two days?" said Stagg.

"More."

"Four days?"

"A week. Return on this day week, at the same hour, but not to the house. Wait at the corner of the lane."

"Of course," said the blind man, with a crafty look, "I shall find you there!"

"Where else can I take refuge?" Is it not enough that you have made a beggar of me, and that I have sacrificed my whole store, so hardly earned, to preserve this home?"

"Humph!" said the blind man, after some consideration. "Set me with my face towards the point you speak of, and in the middle of the road. Is this the spot?"

"It is."

"On this day week at sunset. And think of him within doors.—For the present, good night."

She made him no answer, nor did he stop for any. He went slowly away, turning his head from time to time, and stopping to listen, as if he were curious to know whether he was watched by any one. The shadows of night were closing fast around, and he was soon lost in the gloom. It was not, however, until she had traversed the lane from end to end, and made sure that he was gone, that she re-entered the cottage, and hurriedly barred the door and window.

"Mother!" said Barnaby. "What is the matter? Where is the blind man?"

"He is gone."

"Gone!" he cried, starting up. "I must have more talk with him. Which way did he take?"

"I don't know," she answered, folding her arms about him. "You must not go out to-night. There are ghosts and dreams abroad."

"Ay?" said Barnaby, in a frightened whisper.

"It is not safe to stir. We must leave this place to-morrow."

"This place! This cottage—and the little garden, mother!"

"Yes! To-morrow morning at sunrise. We must travel to London; lose ourselves in that wide place—there would be some trace of us in any other town; then travel on again, and find some new abode."

Little persuasion was required to reconcile Barnaby to any thing that promised change. In another minute he was wild with delight; in another, full of grief at the prospect of parting with his friends the dogs; in another, wild again; then he was fearful of what she had said to prevent his wandering abroad that night, and full of terrors and strange questions. His light-heartedness in the end surmounted all his other feelings, and lying down in his clothes to the end that he might be ready on the morrow, he soon fell fast asleep before the poor turf fire.

His mother did not close her eyes, but sat beside him, watching. Every breath of wind sounded in her ears like that dreaded footstep at the door, or like that hand upon the latch, and made the calm summer night a night of horror. At length the welcome day appeared. When she had made the little preparations which were needful for their journey, and had prayed upon her knees with many tears, she roused Barnaby, who jumped up gaily at her summons.

His clothes were few enough, and to carry Grip was a labour of love. As the sun shed his earliest beams upon the earth, they closed the door of their deserted home and turned away. The sky was blue and bright. The air was fresh and filled with a thousand perfumes. Barnaby looked upward, and laughed with all his heart.

But it was a day he usually devoted to a long ramble, and one of the dogs—the ugliest of them all—came bounding up, and jumping round him in the fulness of his joy. He had to bid him go back in a surly tone, and his heart smote him while he did so. The dog retreated; turned with a half-incredulous, half-imploring look; came a little back; and stopped.

It was the last appeal of an old companion and a faithful friend—cast off. Barnaby could bear no more, and as he shook his head and waved his playmate home, he burst into tears.

"Oh mother, mother, how mournful he will be when he scratches at the door, and finds it always shut!"

There was such a sense of home in the thought, that though her own eyes overflowed she would not have obliterated the recollection of it, either from her own mind or from his, for the wealth of the whole wide world.

THE ELECTRO-MAGNETIC PRINTING TELEGRAPH.

A REMARKABLY curious instrument, bearing the name of the "Electro-Magnetic Printing Telegraph," is exhibiting at the Polytechnic Institution. The object of this invention is to convey information from one place to another by means of the electrical current, in such a way, that words or sentences transmitted from one locality are instantaneously printed in another, however distant; and this, too, without the agency of any person in the place to which the correspondence is to be forwarded. The means by which this extraordinary effect is produced are simple enough. Three wires for the passage of the electric fluid are first laid between any two given places. To one end of these wires is attached a dial-plate with one revolving hand, which is kept in motion by a spring. A peg stops the hand when required; and the face of the dial-plate contains the letters of the alphabet separately arranged in a circle, each letter having a small hole in the plate, immediately underneath it, into which the peg is placed, when the revolution of the hand is to be arrested. To the other end of the wires is affixed a small frame-work, and into it are introduced a cylinder, round which the paper to be printed on is placed; also, a wheel, having the letters of the alphabet arranged regularly on its edge, and a small inking roller. All these revolve horizontally and simultaneously, the wheel with the letters being placed between the ink roller and the cylinder for paper. Motion is communicated to these parts by a pair of electro-magnets attached to them and communicating with the wires. Thus, if the word "thee" is to be printed, the hand on the dial-plate is allowed to revolve until it reaches the letter T, beyond which it is prevented from passing by the peg. When stopped, the printer places his finger on a spring attached to the plate, which allows a current of electricity to pass to the wheel with the letters, which immediately presses the letter T against the paper, it having previously been inked by the roller, and then retires. The other letters are arranged in the same way until the word is complete. A peculiar part of the mechanism, and that which can hardly be explained without a diagram, relates to the passage of the galvanic current from the dial-plate to the wheel with the letters on it, in order to produce corresponding motion in both, so that the letter indicated by the dial-plate shall be printed by the other. This, however, is effected by a simple arrangement on the face of the dial-plate, which makes and breaks the current exactly in the way required. The inventor of this extraordinary machine is Mr. Alexander Bain, the chronometer-maker; and it appears that its introduction for telegraphic or other similar purposes might be attended with great success. The length of wires laid on at the Polytechnic Institution is not more than a mile; but were it the distance of a hundred or a thousand, the instantaneous effect would be the same. There are some minor particulars which require ocular inspection in order to be fully understood.—John Bull.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-SEVENTH.

In the exhaustless catalogue of Heaven's mercies to mankind, the power we have of finding some germs of comfort in the hardest trials must ever occupy the foremost place; not only because it supports and upholds us when we most require to be sustained, but because in this source of consolation there is something, we have reason to believe, of the divine spirit; something of that goodness which detects amidst our own evil doings, a redeeming quality; something which, even in our fallen nature, we possess in common with the angels; which had its being in the old time when they trod the earth, and lingers on it yet, in pity.

How often, on their journey, did the widow remember with grateful heart, that out of his deprivation Barnaby's cheerfulness and affection sprung! How often did she call to mind that but for that, he might have been sullen, morose, unkind, far removed from her—vicious, perhaps, and cruel! How often had she cause for comfort, in his strength, and hope, and in his simple nature! Those feeble powers of mind which rendered him so soon forgetful of the past, save in brief gleams and flashes,—even they were a comfort now. The world to him was full of happiness; in every tree, and plant, and flower, in every bird, and beast, and tiny insect whom a breath of summer wind laid low upon the ground, he had delight. His delight was hers; and where many a wise son would have made her sorrowful, this poor light-hearted idiot filled her breast with thankfulness and love.

Their stock of money was low, but from the hoard she had told into the blind man's hand, the widow had withheld one guinea. This, with the few pence she possessed besides, was, to two persons of their frugal habits, a goodly sum in bank. Moreover, they had Grip in company; and when they must otherwise have changed the guinea, it was but to make him exhibit outside an alehouse door, or in a village street, or in the grounds or gardens of a mansion of the better sort, and scores, who would have given nothing in charity, were ready to bargain for more amusement from the talking bird.

One day—for they moved slowly, and although they had many rides in carts and wagons, were on the road a week—Barnaby, with Grip upon his shoulder and his mother following, begged permission at a trim lodge to go up to the great house, at the other end of the avenue, and show his raven. The man within was inclined to give them admittance, and was indeed about to do so, when a stout gentleman with a long whip in his hand, and a flushed face which seemed to indicate that he had had his morning's draught, rode up to the gate, and called in a loud voice, and with more oaths than the occasion seemed to warrant, to have it opened directly.

"Who hast thou got here?" asked the gentleman, angrily, as the man threw the gate wide open, and pulled off his hat, "who are these? Eh? ar't a beggar, woman?"

The widow answered, with a curtsy, that they were poor travellers.

"Vagrants," said the gentleman, "vagrants and vagabonds. Thee wish to be made acquainted with the cage, dost thee—the cage, the stocks, and the whippingpost? Where dost thou come from?"

She told him in a timid manner,—for he was very loud, hoarse, and red-faced,—and besought him not to be angry, for they meant no harm, and would go upon their way that moment.

"Don't be too sure of that," replied the gentleman, "we don't allow vagrants to roam about this place. I know what thou want'st—stray linen drying on hedges, and stray poultry, eh? What hast got in that basket, lazy hound?"

"Grip, Grip, Grip—Grip the clever, Grip the wicked, Grip the knowing—Grip, Grip, Grip, Grip," cried the raven, whom Barnaby had shut up on the approach of this stern personage. "I'm a devil, I'm a devil, I'm a devil, Never say die, Hurrah, Bow, wow, wow, Polly put the kettle on, we'll all have tea."

"Take the vermin out, scoundrel," said the gentleman; "and let me see him."

Barnaby, thus condescendingly addressed, produced his bird, but not without much fear and trembling, and set him down upon the ground; which he had no sooner done than Grip drew fifty corks at least, and then began to dance; at the same time eyeing the gentleman with surprising insolence of manner, and screwing his head so much on one side that he appeared desirous of screwing it off upon the spot.

The cork-drawing seemed to make a greater impression on the gentleman's mind than the raven's power of speech, and was indeed particularly adapted to his habits and capacity. He desired to have that done again, but despite his being very peremptory, and notwithstanding that Barnaby coaxed to the utmost, Grip turned a deaf ear to the request, and preserved a dead silence.

"Bring him along," said the gentleman, pointing to the house. But Grip, who had watched the action, anticipated his master, by hopping on before them;—constantly flapping his wings, and screaming "cook!" meanwhile, as a hint, perhaps, that there was company coming, and a small collation would be acceptable.

Barnaby and his mother walked on, on either side of the gentleman on horseback, who surveyed each of them from time to time in a proud and coarse manner, and occasionally thundered out some question, the tone of which alarmed Barnaby so much that he could find no answer, and, as a matter of course, could make him no reply. On one of these occasions, when the gentleman appeared disposed to exercise his horsewhip, the widow ventured to inform him, in a low voice and with tears in her eyes, that her son was of weak mind.

"An idiot, eh?" said the gentleman, looking at Barnaby as he spoke. "And how long hast been an idiot?"

"She knows," was Barnaby's timid answer, pointing to his mother—"I—always, I believe."

"From his birth," said the widow.

"I don't believe it," cried the gentleman, "not a bit of it. It's an excuse not to work. There's nothing like flogging to cure that disorder. I'd make a difference in him in ten minutes, I'll be bound."

"Heaven has made none in more than twice ten years, sir," said the widow mildly.

"Then why don't you shut him up? we pay enough for county institutions, damn 'em. But thou'd rather drag him about to excite charity—of course. Ay, I know thee."

Now, this gentleman had various endearing appellations among his intimate friends. By some he was called "a country gentleman of the true school," by some "a fine old country gentleman," by some "a sporting gentleman," by some "a thorough-bred Englishman," by some "a genuine John Bull;" but they all agreed in one respect, and that was, that it was a pity there were not more like him, and that because there were not, the country was going to rack and ruin every day. He was in the commission of the peace, and could write his name almost legibly; but his greatest qualifications were, that he was more severe with poachers, was a better shot, a harder rider, had better horses, kept better dogs, could eat more solid food, drink more strong wine, go to bed every night more drunk, and get up every morning more sober, than any man in the county. In knowledge of horseflesh he was almost equal to a farrier, in stable learning he surpassed his own head groom, and in gluttony not a pig on his estate was a match for him. He had no seat in Parliament himself, but he was extremely patriotic, and usually drove his voters up to the poll with his own hands. He was warmly attached to the church, and never appointed to the living in his gift any but a three-bottle man and a first-rate fox-hunter. He mistrusted the honesty of all poor people who could read and write, and had a secret jealousy of his own wife (a young lady whom he had married for what his friends called "the good old English reason," that her father's property adjoined his own) for possessing those accomplishments in a greater degree than himself. In short, Barnaby being an idiot, and Grip a creature of mere brute instinct, it would be very hard to say what this gentleman was.

He rode up to the door of a handsome house approached by a great flight of steps, where a man was waiting to take his horse, and led the way into a large hall, which, spacious as it was, was tainted with the fumes of last night's stale debauch. Great-coats, riding-whips, bridles, topboots, spurs, and such gear, were strewn about on all sides, and formed, with some huge stags' antlers, and a few portraits of dogs and horses, its principal embellishments.

Throwing himself into a great chair (in which, by the bye, he often snored away the night, when he had been, according to his admirers, a finer country gentleman than usual) he bade the man tell his mistress to come down: and presently there appeared, a little flurried, as it seemed, by the unwonted summons, a lady much younger than himself, who had the appearance of being in delicate health, and not too happy.

"Here! Thou'st no delight in following the hounds as an Englishwoman should have," said the gentleman. "See to this here. That'll please thee, perhaps."

The lady smiled, sat down at a little distance from him, and glanced at Barnaby with a look of pity.

"He's an idiot, the woman says," observed the gentleman, shaking his head; "I don't believe it."

"Are you his mother?" asked the lady.

She answered yes.

"What's the use of asking her?" said the gentleman, thrusting his hands into his breeches pockets. "She'll tell thee so, of course. Most likely he's hired, at so much a day. There. Get on. Make him do something."

Grip having by this time recovered his urbanity, condescended, at Barnaby's solicitation, to repeat his various phrases of speech, and to go through the whole of his performances with the utmost success. The corks, and the never say die, afforded the gentleman so much delight that he demanded the repetition of this part of the entertainment, until Grip got into his basket, and positively refused to say another word, good or bad. The lady too, was much amused with him; and the closing point of his obstinacy so delighted her husband that he burst into a roar of laughter, and demanded his price.

Barnaby looked as though he didn't understand his meaning. Probably he did not.

"His price," said the gentleman, rattling the money in his pockets, "what dost want for him? How much?"

"He's not to be sold," replied Barnaby, shutting up the basket in a great hurry, and throwing the strap over his shoulder. "Mother, come away."

"Thou seest how much of an idiot he is, book-learner," said the gentleman, looking scornfully at his wife. "He can make a bargain. What dost want for him, old woman?"

"He is my son's constant companion," said the widow. "He is not to be sold, sir, indeed."

"Not to be sold!" cried the gentleman, growing ten times redder, hoarser, and louder than before. "Not to be sold!"

"Indeed no," she answered. "We have never thought of parting with him, sir, I do assure you."

He was evidently about to make a very passionate retort, when a few murmured words from his wife happening to catch his ear, he turned sharply round, and said, "Eh? What?"

"We can hardly expect them to sell the bird, against their own desire," she faltered. "If they prefer to keep him——"

"Prefer to keep him!" he echoed. "These people, who go tramping about the country, a pilfering, and vagabondizing on all hands, prefer to keep a bird, when a landed proprietor and a justice asks his price! That old woman's been to school. I know she has. Don't tell me no," he roared to the widow, "I say, yes."

Barnaby's mother pleaded guilty to the accusation, and hoped there was no harm in it.

"No harm!" said the gentleman. "No. No harm, ye old rebel, not a bit of harm. If my clerk was here, I'd set ye in the stocks, I would, or lay ye in jail for prowling up and down, on the lookout for petty larcenies, ye limb of a gipsy. Here, Simon, put these pilferers out, shove 'em into the road, out with 'em! Ye don't want to sell the bird, ye that come here to beg, don't ye? If they an't out in double-quick, set the dogs upon 'em!"

They waited for no further dismissal, but fled precipitately, leaving the gentleman to storm away by himself (for the poor lady had already retreated,) and making a great many vain attempts to silence Grip, who, excited by the noise, drew corks enough for a city feast as they hurried down the avenue, and appeared to congratulate himself beyond measure on having been the cause of the disturbance. When they had nearly reached the lodge, another servant, emerging from the shrubbery, feigned to be very active in ordering them off, but this man put a crown into the widow's hand, and whispering that his lady sent it, thrust them gently from the gate.

This incident only suggested to the widow's mind, when they halted at an ale-house some miles further on, and heard the justice's character as given by his friends, that perhaps something more than capacity of stomach and tastes for the kennel and the stable, were required to form either a perfect country gentleman, a thorough-bred Englishman, or a genuine John Bull; and that possibly the terms were sometimes misappropriated, not to say disgraced. She little thought then, that a circumstance so slight would ever influence their future fortunes; but time and experience enlightened her in this respect.

"Mother," said Barnaby, as they were sitting next day in a wagon which was to take them to within ten miles of the capital, "we're going to London first, you said. Shall we see that blind man there?"

She was about to answer "Heaven forbid!" but checked herself, and told him No, she thought not; why did he ask?

"He's a wise man," said Barnaby, with a thoughtful countenance. "I wish that we may meet with him again. What was it that he said of crowds? That gold was to be found where people crowded, and not among the trees and in such quiet places? He spoke as if he loved it; London is a crowded place; I think we shall meet him there."

"But why do you desire to see him, love?" she asked.

"Because," said Barnaby, looking wistfully at her, "he talked to me about gold, which is a rare thing, and say what you will, a thing you would like to have, I know. And because he came and went away so strangely—just as white-headed old men come sometimes to my bed's foot in the night, and say what I can't remember when the bright day returns. He told me he'd come back. I wonder why he broke his word!"

"But you never thought of being rich or gay, before, dear Barnaby. You have always been contented."

He laughed and bade her say that again, then cried "Ay, ay—oh, yes," and laughed once more. Then something passed that caught his fancy, and the topic wandered from his mind, and was succeeded by another just as fleeting.

But it was plain from what he had said, and from his returning to the point more than once that day, and on the next, that the blind man's visit, and indeed his words, had taken strong possession of his mind. Whether the idea of wealth had occurred to him for the first time on looking at the golden clouds that evening—and images were often presented to his thoughts by outward objects quite as remote and distant; or whether their poor and humble way of life had suggested it, by contrast, long ago; or whether the accident (as he would deem it) of the blind man's pursuing the current of his own remarks, had done so at the moment; or he had been impressed by the mere circumstance of the man being blind, and, therefore, unlike any one with whom he had talked before; it was impossible to tell. She tried every means to discover, but in vain; and the probability is that Barnaby himself was equally in the dark.

It filled her with uneasiness to find him harping on this string, but all that she could do, was to lead him quickly to some other subject, and to dismiss it from his brain. To caution him against their visiter, to show any fear or suspicion in reference to him, would only be, she feared, to increase that interest with which Barnaby regarded him, and to strengthen his desire to meet him once again. She hoped, by plunging into the crowd, to rid herself of her terrible pursuer, and then, by journeying to a distance and observing increased caution, if that were possible, to live again unknown, in secresy and peace.

They reached, in course of time, their halting-place within ten miles of London, and lay there for the night, after bargaining to be carried on for a trifle next day, in a light van which was returning empty, and was to start at five o'clock in the morning. The driver was punctual, the road good—save for the dust, the weather being very hot and dry—and at seven in the forenoon of Friday the second of June, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, they alighted at the foot of Westminster Bridge, bade their conductor farewell, and stood alone, together, on the scorching pavement. For the freshness which night sheds upon such busy thoroughfares had already departed, and the sun was shining with uncommon lustre.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-EIGHTH.

Uncertain where to go next, and bewildered by the crowd of people who were already astir, they sat down in one of the recesses on the bridge, to rest. They soon became aware that the stream of life was all pouring one way, and that a vast throng of persons were crossing the river from the Middlesex to the Surrey shore, in unusual haste and evident excitement. They were, for the most part, in knots of two or three, or sometimes half-a-dozen; they spoke little together—many of them were quite silent; and hurried on as if they had one absorbing object in view, which was common to them all.

They were surprised to see that nearly every man in this great concourse, which still came pouring past, without slackening in the least, wore in his hat a blue cockade; and that the chance passengers who were not so decorated, appeared timidly anxious to escape observation or attack, and gave them the wall as if they would conciliate them. This, however, was natural enough, considering their inferiority in point of numbers; for the proportion of those who wore blue cockades, to those who were dressed as usual, was at least forty or fifty to one. There was no quarrelling, however: the blue cockades went swarming on, passing each other when they could, and making all the speed that was possible in such a multitude; and exchanged nothing more than looks, and very often not even those, with such of the passers-by as were not of their number.

At first, the current of people had been confined to the two pathways, and but a few more eager stragglers kept the road. But after half an hour or so, the passage was completely blocked up by the great press, which, being now closely wedged together, and impeded by the carts and coaches it encountered, moved but slowly, and was sometimes at a stand for five or ten minutes together.

After the lapse of nearly two hours, the numbers began to diminish visibly, and gradually dwindling away, by little and little, left the bridge quite clear, save that, now and then, some hot and dusty man with the cockade in his hat, and his coat thrown over his shoulder, went panting by, fearful of being too late, or stopped to ask which way his friends had taken, and being directed, hastened on again like one refreshed. In this comparative solitude, which seemed quite strange and novel after the late crowd, the widow had for the first time an opportunity of enquiring of an old man who came and sat beside them, what was the meaning of that great assemblage.

"Why, where have you come from," he returned, "that you haven't heard of Lord George Gordon's great association? This is the day that he presents the petition against the Catholics, God bless him!"

"What have all these men to do with that?" she asked.

"What have they to do with it!" the old man replied. "Why, how you talk! Don't you know his lordship has declared he won't present it to the house at all, unless it is attended to the door by forty thousand good and true men at least? There's a crowd for you!"

"A crowd indeed!" said Barnaby. "Do you hear that, mother!"

"And they're mustering yonder, as I am told," resumed the old man, "nigh upon a hundred thousand strong. Ah! Let Lord George alone. He knows his power. There'll be a good many faces inside them three windows over there," and he pointed to where the House of Commons overlooked the river, "that'll turn pale when good Lord George gets up this afternoon, and with reason too. Ay, ay. Let his lordship alone. Let him alone. He knows!" And so, with much mumbling and chuckling and shaking of his forefinger, he rose, with the assistance of his stick, and tottered off.

"Mother!" said Barnaby, "that's a brave crowd he talks of. Come!"

"Not to join it!" cried his mother.

"Yes, yes," he answered, plucking at her sleeve. "Why not? Come!"

"You don't know," she urged, "what mischief they may do, where they may lead you, what their meaning is. Dear Barnaby, for my sake——"

"For your sake!" he cried, patting her hand. "Well! It is for your sake, mother. You remember what the blind man said about the gold. Here's a brave crowd! Come! Or wait till I come back—yes, yes, wait here."

She tried with all the earnestness her fears engendered, to turn him from his purpose, but in vain. He was stooping down to buckle on his shoe, when a hackney-coach passed them rather quickly, and a voice inside called to the driver to stop.

"Young man," said a voice within.

"Who's that?" cried Barnaby, looking up.

"Do you wear this ornament?" returned the stranger, holding out a blue cockade.

"In Heaven's name, no. Pray do not give it him!" exclaimed the widow.

"Speak for yourself, woman," said the man within the coach, coldly. "Leave the young man to his choice; he's old enough to make it, and to snap your apron-strings. He knows, without your telling, whether he wears the sign of a loyal Englishman or not."

Barnaby, trembling with impatience, cried, "Yes, yes, yes, I do," as he had cried a dozen times already. The man threw him a cockade, and crying "Make haste to Saint George's Fields," ordered the coachman to drive on fast; and left them.

With hands that trembled with his eagerness to fix the bauble in his hat, Barnaby was adjusting it as he best could, and hurriedly replying to the tears and entreaties of his mother, when two gentlemen passed on the opposite side of the way. Observing them, and seeing how Barnaby was occupied, they stopped, whispered together for an instant, turned back, and came over to them.

"Why are you sitting here!" said one of them, who was dressed in a plain suit of black, wore long lank hair, and carried a great cane. "Why have you not gone with the rest?"

"I am going, sir," replied Barnaby, finishing his task, and putting his hat on with an air of pride. "I shall be there directly."

"Say my lord, young man, when his lordship does you the honour of speaking to you," said the second gentleman mildly. "If you don't know Lord George Gordon when you see him, it's high time you should."

"Nay, Gashford," said Lord George, as Barnaby pulled off his hat again and made him a low bow, "it's no great matter on a day like this, which every Englishman will remember with delight and pride. Put on your hat, friend, and follow us, for you lag behind and are late. It's past ten now. Didn't you know that the hour of assembling was ten o'clock?"

Barnaby shook his head, and looked vacantly from one to the other.

"You might have known it, friend," said Gashford, "it was perfectly understood. How came you to be so ill informed!"

"He cannot tell you, sir," the widow interposed. "It's of no use to ask him. We are but this morning come from a long distance in the country, and know nothing of these matters."

"The cause has taken a deep root, and has spread its branches far and wide," said Lord George to his secretary. "This is a pleasant hearing. I thank Heaven for it!"

"Amen!" cried Gashford, with a solemn face.

"You do not understand me, my lord," said the widow. "Pardon me, but you cruelly mistake my meaning. We know nothing of these matters. We have no desire or right to join in what you are about to do. This is my son, my poor afflicted son, dearer to me than my own life. In mercy's name, my lord, go your way alone, and do not tempt him into danger!"

"My good woman," said Gashford, "how can you!—Dear me!—What do you mean by tempting and by danger? Do you think his lordship is a roaring lion, going about and seeking whom he may devour? God bless me!"

"No, no, my lord, forgive me," implored the widow, laying both her hands upon his breast, and scarcely knowing what she did, or said, in the earnestness of her supplication, "but there are reasons why you should hear my earnest, mother's prayer, and leave my son with me. Oh do! He is not in his right senses, he is not, indeed!"

"It is a bad sign of the wickedness of these times," said Lord George, evading her touch, and colouring deeply, "that those who cling to the truth and support the right cause, are set down as mad. Have you the heart to say this of your own son, unnatural mother!"

"I am astonished at you!" said Gashford, with a kind of meek severity. "This is a very sad picture of female depravity."

"He has surely no appearance," said Lord George, glancing at Barnaby, and whispering in his secretary's ear, "of being deranged? And even if he had, we must not construe any trifling peculiarity into madness. Which of us"—and here he turned red again—"would be safe, if that were made the law!"

"Not one," replied the secretary; "in that case, the greater the zeal, the truth, and talent; the more direct the call from above; the clearer would be the madness. With regard to this young man, my lord," he added, with a lip that slightly curled as he looked at Barnaby, who stood twirling his hat, and stealthily beckoning them to come away, "he is as sensible and self-possessed as any one I ever saw."

"And you desire to make one of this great body!" said Lord George, addressing him; "and intended to make one, did you!"

"Yes—yes," said Barnaby, with sparkling eyes. "To be sure I did! I told her so myself."

"I see," replied Lord George, with a reproachful glance at the unhappy mother: "I thought so. Follow me and this gentleman, and you shall have your wish."

Barnaby kissed his mother tenderly on the cheek, and, bidding her be of good cheer, for their fortunes were both made now, did as he was desired. She, poor woman, followed too—with how much fear and grief it would be hard to tell.

They passed quickly through the Bridge-road, where the shops were all shut up (for the passage of the great crowd and the expectation of their return had alarmed the tradesmen for their goods and windows,) and where, in the upper stories, all the inhabitants were congregated, looking down into the street below, with faces variously expressive of alarm, of interest, expectancy, and indignation. Some of these applauded, and some hissed; but, regardless of these interruptions—for the noise of a vast congregation of people at a little distance, sounded in his ears like the roaring of a sea—Lord George Gordon quickened his pace, and presently arrived before St. George's Fields.

They were really fields at that time, and of considerable extent. Here an immense multitude was collected, bearing flags of various kinds and sizes, but all of the same colour—blue, like the cockades—some sections marching to and fro in military array, and others drawn up in circles, squares, and lines. A large portion, both of the bodies which paraded the ground, and of those which remained stationary, were occupied in singing hymns or psalms. With whomsoever this originated, it was well done; for the sound of so many thousand voices in the air must have stirred the heart of any man within him, and could not fail to have a wonderful effect upon enthusiasts, however mistaken.

Scouts had been posted in advance of the great body, to give notice of their leader's coming. These falling back, the word was quickly passed through the whole host, and for a short interval there ensued a profound and death-like silence, during which the mass was so still and quiet, that the fluttering of a banner caught the eye, and became a circumstance of note. Then they burst into a tremendous shout, into another, and another; and the air seemed rent and shaken, as if by the discharge of cannon.

"Gashford!" cried Lord George, pressing his secretary's arm tight within his own, and speaking with as much emotion in his voice, as in his altered face, "I am called indeed, now. I feel and know it. I am the leader of a host. If they summoned me at this moment with one voice to lead them on to death, I'd do it—Yes, and fall first myself!"

"It is a proud sight," said the secretary. "It is a noble day for England, and for the great cause throughout the world. Such homage, my lord, as I, an humble but devoted man can render——"

"What are you doing!" cried his master, catching him by both hands; for he had made a show of kneeling at his feet; "Do not unfit me, dear Gashford, for the solemn duty of this glorious day—" the tears stood in the eyes of the poor gentleman as he said the words.—"Let us go among them; we have to find a place in some division for this new recruit—give me your hand."

Gashford slid his cold insidious palm into his master's grasp, and so, hand in hand, and followed still by Barnaby and by his mother too, they mingled with the concourse.

They had by this time taken to their singing again, and as their leader passed between their ranks, they raised their voices to their utmost. Many of those who were banded together to support the religion of their country, even unto death, had never heard a hymn or psalm in all their lives. But these fellows having for the most part strong lungs, and being naturally fond of singing, chanted any ribaldry or nonsense that occurred to them, feeling pretty certain that it would not be detected in the general chorus, and not caring very much if it were. Many of these voluntaries were sung under the very nose of Lord George Gordon, who, quite unconscious of their burden, passed on with his usual stiff and solemn deportment, very much edified and delighted by the pious conduct of his followers.

So they went on and on, up this line, down that, round the exterior of this circle, and on every side of that hollow square; and still there were lines, and squares, and circles out of number to review. The day being now intensely hot, and the sun striking down his fiercest rays upon the field, those who carried heavy banners began to grow faint and weary; most of the number assembled were fain to pull off their neck-cloths, and throw their coats and waistcoats open; and some, towards the centre, quite overpowered by the excessive heat, which was of course rendered more unendurable by the multitude around them, lay down upon the grass, and offered all they had about them for a drink of water. Still, no man left the ground, not even these who were so distressed; still Lord George, streaming from every pore, went on with Gashford; and still Barnaby and his mother followed close behind them.

They had arrived at the top of a long line of some eight hundred men in single file, and Lord George had turned his head to look back, when a loud cry of recognition—in that peculiar and half-stifled tone which a voice has, when it is raised in the open air and in the midst of a great concourse of persons—was heard, and a man stepped with a shout of laughter from the rank, and smote Barnaby on the shoulders with his heavy hand.

"How now!" he cried. "Barnaby Rudge! Why, where have you been hiding for these hundred years!"

Barnaby had been thinking within himself that the smell of the trodden grass brought back his old days at cricket, when he was a young boy and played on Chigwell Green. Confused by this sudden and boisterous address, he stared in a bewildered manner at the man, and could scarcely say "What! Hugh!"

"Hugh!" echoed the other; "ay, Hugh—Maypole Hugh! You remember my dog? He's alive now, and will know you, I warrant. What, you wear the colour, do you? Well done! Ha, ha, ha!"

"You know this young man, I see," said Lord George.

"Know him, my lord! as well as I know my own right hand. My captain knows him. We all know him."

"Will you take him into your division?"

"It hasn't in it a better, nor a nimbler, nor a more active man, than Barnaby Rudge," said Hugh. "Show me the man who says it has. Fall in, Barnaby. He shall march, my lord, between me and Dennis; and he shall carry," he added, taking a flag from the hand of a tired man who tendered it, "the gayest silken streamer in this valiant army."

"In the name of God, no!" shrieked the widow, darting forward. "Barnaby—my lord—see—he'll come back—Barnaby—Barnaby!"

"Women in the field!" cried Hugh, stepping between them, and holding her off. "Holloa! My captain there!"

"What's the matter here?" cried Simon Tappertit, bustling up in a great heat. "Do you call this order?"

"Nothing like it, captain," answered Hugh, still holding her back with his out-stretched hand. "It's against all orders. Ladies are carrying off our gallant soldiers from their duty. The word of command, captain! They're filing off the ground. Quick!"

"Close!" cried Simon, with the whole power of his lungs. "Form! March!"

She was thrown to the ground; the whole field was in motion; Barnaby was whirled away into the heart of a dense mass of men, and she saw him no more.

CHAPTER THE FORTY-NINTH.

The mob had been divided from its first assemblage into four divisions; the London, the Westminster, the Southwark, and the Scotch. Each of these divisions being subdivided into various bodies, and these bodies being drawn up in various forms and figures, the general arrangement was, except to the few chiefs and leaders, as unintelligible as the plan of a great battle to the meanest soldier in the field. It was not without its method, however; for, in a very short space of time after being put in motion, the crowd had resolved itself into three great parties, and were prepared, as had been arranged, to cross the river by different bridges, and make for the House of Commons in separate detachments.

At the head of that division which had Westminster Bridge for its approach to the scene of action, Lord George Gordon took his post; with Gashford at his right hand, and sundry ruffians, of most unpromising appearance, forming a kind of staff about him. The conduct of a second party, whose route lay by Blackfriars, was entrusted to a committee of management, including perhaps a dozen men; while the third, which was to go by London Bridge, and through the main streets, in order that their numbers and their serious intentions might be the better known and appreciated by the citizens, were led by Simon Tappertit, (assisted by a few subalterns, selected from the Brotherhood of United Bull-Dogs,) Dennis the hangman, Hugh, and some others.

The word of command being given, each of these great bodies took the road assigned to it, and departed on its way, in perfect order and profound silence. That which went through the city greatly exceeded the others in number, and was of such prodigious extent that when the rear began to move, the front was nearly four miles in advance, notwithstanding that the men marched three abreast and followed very close upon each other.

At the head of this party, in the place where Hugh, in the madness of his humour, had stationed him, and walking between that dangerous companion and the hangman, went Barnaby; as many a man among the thousands who looked on that day afterwards remembered well. Forgetful of all other things in the ecstasy of the moment, his face flushed and his eyes sparkling with delight, heedless of the weight of the great banner he carried, and mindful only of its flashing in the sun and rustlings in the summer breeze, on he went, proud, happy, elated past all telling:—the only light-hearted, undesigning creature, in the whole assembly.

"What do you think of this?" asked Hugh, as they passed through the crowded streets, and looked up at the windows which were thronged with spectators. "They have all turned out to see our flags and streamers? Eh, Barnaby? Why, Barnaby's the greatest man of all the pack! His flag's the largest of the lot, the brightest too. There's nothing in the show like Barnaby. All eyes are turned on him. Ha, ha, ha!"

"Don't make that din, brother," growled the hangman, glancing with no very approving eyes at Barnaby as he spoke: "I hope he don't think there's nothing to be done, but carrying that there piece of blue rag, like a boy at a breaking-up. You're ready for action I hope, eh? You, I mean," he added, nudging Barnaby roughly with his elbow. "What are you staring at? Why don't you speak?"

Barnaby had been gazing at his flag, and looked vacantly from his questioner to Hugh.

"He don't understand your way," said the latter. "Here, I'll explain it to him. Barnaby, old boy, attend to me."

"I'll attend," said Barnaby, looking anxiously round; "but I wish I could see her somewhere."

"See who?" demanded Dennis in a gruff tone. "You a'n't in love I hope, brother? That a'n't the sort of thing for us, you know. We mustn't have no love here."

"She would be proud, indeed, to see me now, eh, Hugh?" said Barnaby. "Wouldn't it make her glad to see me at the head of this large show? She'd cry with joy, I know she would. Where can she be? She never sees me at my best, and what do I care to be gay and fine if she's not by?"

"Why, what palaver's this?" asked Mr. Dennis with supreme disdain. "We a'n't got no sentimental members among us, I hope."

"Don't be uneasy, brother," cried Hugh, "he's only talking of his mother."

"Of his what?" said Mr. Dennis, with a strong oath.

"His mother."

"And have I combined myself with this here section, and turned out on this here memorable day, to hear men talk about their mothers!" growled Mr. Dennis, with extreme disgust. "The notion of a man's sweetheart's bad enough, but a man's mother!"—and here his disgust was so extreme that he spat upon the ground, and could say no more.

"Barnaby's right," cried Hugh, with a grin, "and I say it. Lookee, bold lad. If she's not here to see, it's because I've provided for her, and sent half a dozen gentlemen, every one of 'em with a blue flag (but not half as fine as yours,) to take her, in state, to a grand house all hung round with gold and silver banners, and every thing else you please, where she'll wait till you come, and want for nothing."

"Ay!" said Barnaby, his face beaming with delight: "have you, indeed? That's a good hearing. That's fine! Kind Hugh!"

"But nothing to what will come, bless you," retorted Hugh, with a wink at Dennis, who regarded his new companion in arms with great astonishment.

"No, indeed!" cried Barnaby.

"Nothing at all," said Hugh. "Money, cocked hats and feathers, red coats and gold lace; all the fine things there are, ever were, or will be; will belong to us if we are true to that noble gentleman—the best man in the world, carry our flags for a few days, and keep them safe. That's all we've got to do."

"Is that all?" cried Barnaby, with glistening eyes, as he clutched his pole the tighter; "I warrant you I keep this one safe, then. You have put it in good hands. You know me, Hugh. Nobody shall wrest this flag away."

"Well said!" cried Hugh. "Ha, ha! Nobly said! That's the old stout Barnaby, that I have climbed and leaped with many and many a day—I knew I was not mistaken in Barnaby.—Don't you see, man," he added in a whisper, as he slipped to the other side of Dennis, "that the lad's a natural, and can be got to do any thing, if you take him the right way. Letting alone the fun he is, he's worth a dozen men, in earnest, as you'd find, if you tried a fall with him. Leave him to me. You shall soon see whether's he's of use or not."

Mr. Dennis received these explanatory remarks with many nods and winks, and softened his behaviour towards Barnaby from that moment. Hugh, laying his finger on his nose, stepped back into his former place, and they proceeded in silence.

It was between two and three o'clock in the afternoon when the three great parties met at Westminster, and, uniting into one huge mass, raised a tremendous shout. This was not only done in token of their presence, but as a signal to those on whom the task devolved, that it was time to take possession of the lobbies of both Houses, and of the various avenues of approach, and of the gallery stairs. To the last-named place, Hugh and Dennis, still with their pupil between them, rushed straightway; Barnaby having given his flag into the hands of one of their own party, who kept them at the outer door. Their followers pressing on behind, they were borne as on a great wave to the very doors of the gallery, whence it was impossible to retreat, even if they had been so inclined, by reason of the throng which choked up the passages. It is a familiar expression in describing a great crowd, that a person might have walked upon the people's heads. In this case it was actually done; for a boy who had by some means got among the concourse, and was in imminent danger of suffocation, climbed to the shoulders of a man beside him, and walked upon the people's hats and heads into the open street; traversing in his passage the whole length of two staircases and a long gallery. Nor was the swarm without less dense; for a basket which had been tossed into the crowd, was jerked from head to head, and shoulder to shoulder, and went spinning and whirling on above them, until it was lost to view, without ever once falling in among them or coming near the ground.

Through this vast throng, sprinkled doubtless here and there with honest zealots, but composed for the most part of the very scum and refuse of London, whose growth was fostered by bad criminal laws, bad prison regulations, and the worst conceivable police,—such of the members of both Houses of Parliament as had not taken the precaution to be already at their posts, were compelled to fight and force their way. Their carriages were stopped and broken; the wheels wrenched off; the glasses shivered to atoms; the panels beaten in; drivers, footmen, and masters, pulled from their seats and rolled in the mud. Lords, commoners, and reverend Bishops, with little distinction of person or party, were kicked and pinched and hustled; passed from hand to hand through various stages of ill-usage; and sent to their fellow-senators at last with their clothes hanging in ribands about them, their bag-wigs torn off, themselves speechless and breathless, and their persons covered with the powder which had been cuffed and beaten out of their hair. One Lord was so long in the hands of the populace, that the Peers as a body resolved to sally forth and rescue him, and were in the act of doing so, when he happily appeared among them covered with dirt and bruises, and hardly to be recognised by those who knew him best. The noise and uproar were on the increase every moment. The air was filled with execrations, hoots, and howlings. The mob raged and roared, like a mad monster as it was, unceasingly, and each new outrage served to swell its fury.

Within doors, matters were even yet more threatening. Lord George—preceded by a man who carried the immense petition on a porter's knot through the lobby to the door of the House of Commons, where it was received by two officers of the house, who rolled it up to the table ready for presentation—had taken his seat at an early hour, before the Speaker went to prayers. His followers pouring in at the same time, the lobby and all the avenues were immediately filled, as we have seen: thus the members were not only attacked in their passage through the streets, but were set upon within the very walls of Parliament; while the tumult, both within and without, was so great, that those who attempted to speak could scarcely hear their own voices; far less consult upon the course it would be wise to take in such extremity, or animate each other to dignified and firm resistance. So sure as any member, just arrived, with dress disordered and dishevelled hair, came struggling through the crowd in the lobby, it yelled and screamed in triumph; and when the door of the house, partially and cautiously opened by those within for his admission, gave them a momentary glimpse of the interior, they grew more wild and savage, like beasts at the sight of prey, and made a rush against the portal which strained its locks and bolts in their staples, and shook the very beams.

The strangers' gallery, which was immediately above the door of the house, had been ordered to be closed on the first rumour of disturbance, and was empty; save that now and then Lord George took his seat there, for the convenience of coming to the head of the stairs which led to it, and repeating to the people what had passed within. It was on these stairs that Barnaby, Hugh, and Dennis were posted. There were two flights, short, steep, and narrow, running parallel to each other, and leading to two little doors communicating with a low passage which opened on the gallery. Between them was a kind of well, or unglazed skylight, for the admission of light and air into the lobby, which might be some eighteen or twenty feet below.

Upon one of these little staircases—not that at the head of which Lord George appeared from time to time, but the other—Gashford stood with his elbow on the banister, and his cheek resting on his hand, with his usual crafty aspect. Whenever he varied this attitude in the slightest degree—so much as by the gentlest motion of his arm—the uproar was certain to increase, not merely there, but in the lobby below; from which place, no doubt, some man who acted as fugleman to the rest, was constantly looking up and watching him.

"Order!" cried Hugh, in a voice which made itself heard even above the roar and tumult, as Lord George appeared at the top of the staircase. "News! News from my Lord!"

The noise continued notwithstanding his appearance, until Gashford looked round. There was silence immediately—even among the people in the passages without, and on the other staircases, who could neither see nor hear, but to whom, notwithstanding, the signal was conveyed with marvellous rapidity.

"Gentlemen," said Lord George, who was very pale and agitated, "we must be firm. They talk of delays, but we must have no delays. They talk of taking your petition into consideration next Tuesday, but we must have it considered now. Present appearances look bad for our success, but we must succeed and will!"

"We must succeed and will!" echoed the crowd. And so among their shouts and cheers and other cries, he bowed to them and retired, and presently came back again. There was another gesture from Gashford, and a dead silence directly.

"I am afraid," he said, this time, "that we have little reason, gentlemen, to hope for any redress from the proceedings of parliament. But we must redress our own grievances, we must meet again, we must put our trust in Providence, and it will bless our endeavours."

This speech being a little more temperate than the last, was not so favourably received. When the noise and exasperation were at their height, he came back once more, and told them that the alarm had gone forth for many miles round; that when the King heard of their assembling together in that great body, he had no doubt His Majesty would send down private orders to have their wishes complied with; and, with the manner of his speech as childish, irresolute, and uncertain as his matter—was proceeding further, when two gentlemen suddenly appeared at the door where he stood, and pressing past him and coming a step or two lower down upon the stairs, confronted the people.

The boldness of this action quite took them by surprise. They were not the less disconcerted, when one of the gentlemen, turning to Lord George, spoke thus—in a loud voice that they might hear him well, but quite coolly and collectedly—

"You may tell these people, if you please, my Lord, that I am General Conway of whom they have heard; and that I oppose this petition, and all their proceedings, and yours. I am a soldier, you may tell them; and I will protect the freedom of this place with my sword. You see, my Lord, that the members of this house are all in arms to-day; you know that the entrance to it is a narrow one; you cannot be ignorant that there are men within these walls who are determined to defend that pass to the last, and before whom many lives must fall if your adherents persevere. Have a care what you do."

"And my Lord George," said the other gentleman, addressing him in like manner, "I desire them to hear this, from me—Colonel Gordon—your near relation. If a man among this crowd, whose uproar strikes us deaf, crosses the threshold of the House of Commons, I swear to run my sword that moment—not into his, but into your body!"

With that, they stepped back again, keeping their faces towards the crowd; took each an arm of the misguided nobleman; drew him into the passage, and shut the door; which they directly locked and fastened on the inside.

This was so quickly done, and the demeanour of both gentlemen—who were not young men either—was so gallant and resolute, that the crowd faltered and stared at each other with irresolute and timid looks. Many tried to turn towards the door; some of the faintest-hearted cried that they had best go back, and called to those behind to give way; and the panic and confusion were increasing rapidly, when Gashford whispered Hugh.

"What now!" Hugh roared aloud, turning towards them. "Why go back? Where can you do better than here, boys! One good rush against these doors and one below at the same time, will do the business. Rush on, then! As to the door below, let those stand back who are afraid. Let those who are not afraid, try who shall be the first to pass it. Here goes. Look out down there!"

Without the delay of an instant, he threw himself headlong over the banisters into the lobbey below. He had hardly touched the ground when Barnaby was at his side. The chaplain's assistant and some members who were imploring the people to retire, immediately withdrew; and then, with a great shout, both crowds threw themselves against the doors pell-mell, and besieged the house in earnest.

At that moment, when a second onset must have brought them into collision with those who stood on the defensive within, in which case great loss of life and bloodshed would inevitably have ensued,—the hindmost portion of the crowd gave way, and the rumour spread from mouth to mouth that a messenger had been despatched by water for the military, who were forming in the street. Fearful of sustaining a charge in the narrow passages in which they were so closely wedged together, the throng poured out as impetuously as they had flocked in. As the whole stream turned at once, Barnaby and Hugh went with it: and so, fighting and struggling and trampling on fallen men and being trampled on in turn themselves, they and the whole mass floated by degrees into the open street, where a large detachment of the Guards, both horse and foot, came hurrying up, clearing the ground before them so rapidly that the people seemed to melt away as they advanced.

The word of command to halt being given, the soldiers formed across the street; the rioters, breathless and exhausted with their late exertions, formed likewise, though in a very irregular and disorderly manner. The commanding officer rode hastily into the open space between the two bodies, accompanied by a magistrate and an officer of the House of Commons, for whose accommodation a couple of troopers had hastily dismounted. The Riot Act was read, but not a man stirred.

In the first rank of the insurgents, Barnaby and Hugh stood side by side. Somebody had thrust into Barnaby's hands when he came out into the street, his precious flag; which, being now rolled up and tied round the pole, looked like a giant quarter-staff as he grasped it firmly and stood upon his guard. If ever man believed with his whole heart and soul that he was engaged in a just cause, and that he was bound to stand by his leader to the last, poor Barnaby believed it of himself and Lord George Gordon.

After an ineffectual attempt to make himself heard, the magistrate gave the word and the Horse Guards came riding in among the crowd. But even then he galloped here and there, exhorting the people to disperse; and, although heavy stones were thrown at the men, and some were desperately cut and bruised, they had no orders but to make prisoners of such of the rioters as were the most active, and to drive the people back with the flat of their sabres. As the horses came in among them, the throng gave way at many points, and the Guards, following up their advantage, were rapidly clearing the ground, when two or three of the foremost, who were in a manner cut off from the rest by the people closing round them, made straight towards Barnaby and Hugh, who had no doubt been pointed out as the two men who dropped into the lobby; laying about them now with some effect, and inflicting on the more turbulent of their opponents, a few slight flesh-wounds, under the influence of which a man dropped senseless, here and there, into the arms of his fellows, amid much groaning and confusion.

At the sight of gashed and bloody faces, seen for a moment in the crowd, then hidden by the press around them, Barnaby turned pale and sick. But he stood his ground, and grasping his pole more firmly yet, kept his eye fixed upon the nearest soldier—nodding his head meanwhile, as Hugh, with a scowling visage, whispered in his ear.

The soldier came spurring on, making his horse rear as the people pressed about him, cutting at the hands of those who would have grasped his rein and forced his charger back, and waving to his comrades to follow—and still Barnaby, without retreating an inch, waited for his coming. Some called to him to fly, and some were in the very act of closing round him, to prevent his being taken, when the pole swept the air above the people's heads, and the man's saddle was empty in an instant.

Then he and Hugh turned and fled; the crowd opening to let them pass, and closing up again so quickly that there was no clue to the course they had taken. Panting for breath, hot, dusty, and exhausted with fatigue, they reached the river-side in safety, and getting into a boat with all despatch were soon out of any immediate danger.

As they glided down the river, they plainly heard the people cheering; and supposing they might have forced the soldiers to retreat, lay upon their oars for a few minutes, uncertain whether to return or not. But the crowd passing along Westminster Bridge, soon assured them that the populace were dispersing; and Hugh rightly guessed from this, that they had cheered the magistrate for offering to dismiss the military on condition of their immediate departure to their several homes; and that he and Barnaby were better where they were. He advised, therefore, that they should proceed to Blackfriars, and, going ashore at the bridge, make the best of their way to the Boot; where there was not only good entertainment and safe lodging, but where they would certainly be joined by many of their late companions. Barnaby assenting, they decided on this course of action, and pulled for Blackfriars accordingly.

They landed at a critical time, and fortunately for themselves at the right moment. For, coming into Fleet Street, they found it in an unusual stir; and enquiring the cause, were told that a body of Horse Guards had just galloped past, and that they were escorting some rioters whom they had made prisoners, to Newgate for safety. Not at all ill-pleased to have so narrowly escaped the cavalcade, they lost no more time in asking questions, but hurried to the Boot with as much speed as Hugh considered it prudent to make, without appearing singular or attracting an inconvenient share of public notice.

CHAPTER THE FIFTIETH.

They were among the first to reach the tavern, but they had not been there many minutes, when several groups of men who had formed part of the crowd, came straggling in. Among them were Simon Tappertit and Mr. Dennis; both of whom, but especially the latter, greeted Barnaby with the utmost warmth, and paid him many compliments on the prowess he had shown.

"Which," said Dennis, with an oath, as he rested his bludgeon in a corner with his hat upon it, and took his seat at the same table with them, "it does me good to think of. There was an opportunity! But it led to nothing. For my part, I don't know what would. There's no spirit among the people in these here times. Bring something to eat and drink here. I'm disgusted with humanity."

"On what account?" asked Mr. Tappertit, who had been quenching his fiery face in a half-gallon can. "Don't you consider this a good beginning, mister?"

"Give me security that it an't an ending," rejoined the hangman. "When that soldier went down, we might have made London ours; but no; we stand, and gape, and look on—the justice (I wish he had had a bullet in each eye, as he would have had, if we'd gone to work my way) says, 'My lads, if you'll give me your word to disperse, I'll order off the military,'—our people set up a hurrah, threw up the game with the winning cards in their hands, and stalk away like a pack of tame curs as they are. Ah!" said the hangman, in a tone of deep disgust, "it makes me blush for my feller creeturs. I wish I had been born a ox, I do!"

"You'd have been quite as agreeable a character if you had been, I think," returned Simon Tappertit, going out in a lofty manner.

"Don't be too sure of that," rejoined the hangman, calling after him; "if I was a horned animal at the present moment, with the smallest grain of sense, I'd toss every man in this company, excepting them two," meaning Hugh and Barnaby, "for his manner of conducting himself this day."

With which mournful review of their proceedings, Mr. Dennis sought consolation in cold boiled beef and beer; but without at all relaxing the grim and dissatisfied expression of his face, the gloom of which was rather deepened than dissipated by their grateful influence.

The company who were thus libelled might have retaliated by strong words, if not by blows, but they were dispirited and worn out. The greater part of them had fasted since morning; all had suffered extremely from the excessive heat; and, between the day's shouting, exertion, and excitement, many had quite lost their voices, and so much of their strength that they could hardly stand. Then they were uncertain what to do next, fearful of the consequences of what they had done already, and sensible that after all they had carried no point, but had indeed left matters worse than they had found them. Of those who had come to the Boot, many had dropped off within an hour; such of them as were really honest and sincere, never, after the morning's experience, to return, or to hold any communication with their late companions. Others remained but to refresh themselves, and then went home desponding; others who had theretofore been regular in their attendance, avoided the place altogether. The half-dozen prisoners whom the Guards had taken, were magnified by report into half a hundred at least; and their friends, being faint and sober, so slackened in their energy, and so drooped beneath these dispiriting influences, that by eight o'clock in the evening, Dennis, Hugh, and Barnaby, were lett alone. Even they were fast asleep upon the benches, when Gashford's entrance roused them.

"Oh! You are here then?" said the secretary. "Dear me!"

"Why, where should we be, Muster Gashford!" Dennis rejoined, as he rose into a sitting posture.

"Oh nowhere, nowhere," he returned, with excessive mildness. "The streets are filled with blue cockades. I rather thought you might have been among them. I am glad you are not."

"You have orders for us, master, then?" said Hugh.

"Oh dear, no. Not I. No orders, my good fellow. What orders should I have? You are not in my service."

"Muster Gashford," remonstrated Dennis, "we belong to the cause, don't we?"

"The cause!" repeated the secretary, looking at him in a sort of abstraction. "There is no cause. The cause is lost."

"Lost!"

"Oh yes. You have heard, I suppose? The petition is rejected by a hundred and ninety-two, to six. It's quite final. We might have spared ourselves some trouble: that, and my Lord's vexation, are the only circumstances I regret. I am quite satisfied in all other respects."

As he said this, he took a penknife from his pocket, and putting his hat upon his knee, began to busy himself in ripping off the blue cockade which he had worn all day; at the same time humming a psalm tune which had been very popular in the morning, and dwelling on it with a gentle regret.

His two adherents looked at each other, and at him, as if they were at a loss how to pursue the subject. At length Hugh, after some elbowing and winking between himself and Mr. Dennis, ventured to stay his hand, and to ask him why he meddled with that riband in his hat.

"Because," said the secretary, looking up with something between a snarl and a smile, "because to sit still and wear it, or fall asleep and wear it, or run away and wear it, is a mockery. That's all, friend."

"What would you have us do, master?" cried Hugh.

"Nothing," returned Gashford, shrugging his shoulders; "nothing. When my Lord was reproached and threatened for standing by you, I, as a prudent man, would have had you do nothing.—When the soldiers were trampling you under their horses' feet, I would have had you do nothing. When one of them was struck down by a daring hand, and I saw confusion and dismay in all their faces, I would have had you do nothing—just what you did, in short. This is the young man who had so little prudence, and so much boldness. Ah! I am sorry for him."

"Sorry, master?" cried Hugh.

"Sorry, Muster Gashford!" echoed Dennis.

"In case there should be a proclamation out to-morrow, offering five hundred pounds, or some such trifle, for his apprehension; and in case it should include another man who dropped into the lobby from the stairs above," said Gashford coldly; "still, do nothing."

"Fire and fury, master!" cried Hugh, starting up. "What have we done, that you should talk to us like this!"

"Nothing," returned Gashford, with a sneer. "If you are cast into prison; if the young man—" here he looked hard at Barnaby's attentive face—"is dragged from us and from his friends; perhaps from people whom he loves, and whom his death would kill; is thrown into jail, brought out and hanged before their eyes; still, do nothing. You'll find it your best policy, I have no doubt."

"Come on!" cried Hugh, striding towards the door. "Dennis—Barnaby—come on!"

"Where? To do what?" said Gashford, slipping past him, and standing with his back against it.

"Any where! Any thing!" cried Hugh. "Stand aside, master, or the window will serve our turn as well. Let us out!"

"Ha, ha, ha! You are of such—of such an impetuous nature," said Gashford, changing his manner for one of the utmost good fellowship and the pleasantest raillery; "you are such an excitable creature—but you'll drink with me before you go?"

"Oh, yes—certainly," growled Dennis, drawing his sleeve across his thirsty lips. "No malice, brother. Drink with Muster Gashford!"

Hugh wiped his heated brow, and relaxed into a smile. The artful secretary laughed outright.

"Some liquor here! Be quick, or he'll not stop, even for that. He is a man of such desperate ardour!" said the smooth secretary, whom Mr. Dennis corroborated—with sundry nods and muttered oaths.—"Once roused, he is a fellow of such fierce determination!"

Hugh poised his sturdy arm aloft, and clapping Barnaby on the back, bade him fear nothing. They shook hands together—poor Barnaby evidently possessed with the idea that he was among the most virtuous and disinterested heroes in the world—and Gashford laughed again.

"I hear," he said smoothly, as he stood among them with a great measure of liquor in his hand, and filled their glasses as quickly and as often as they chose, "I hear—but I cannot say whether it be true or false—that the men who are loitering in the streets to-night, are half disposed to pull down a Romish chapel or two, and that they only want leaders. I even heard mention of those in Duke street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and in Warwick street, Golden Square; but common report, you know—You are not going?"

—"To do nothing, master, eh!" cried Hugh. "No jails and halter for Barnaby and me. They must be frightened out of that. Leaders are wanted, are they? Now boys!"

"A most impetuous fellow!" cried the secretary. "Ha, ha! A courageous, boisterous, most vehement fellow! A man who—"

There was no need to finish the sentence, for they had rushed out of the house, and were far beyond hearing. He stopped in the middle of a laugh, listened, drew on his gloves, and, clasping his hands behind him, paced the deserted room for a long time, then bent his steps towards the busy town, and walked into the streets.

They were filled with people, for the rumour of that day's proceedings had made a great noise.—Those persons who did not care to leave home, were at their doors or windows, and one topic of discourse prevailed on every side. Some reported that the riots were effectually put down; others that they had broken out again: some said that Lord George Gordon had been sent under a strong guard to the Tower; others that an attempt had been made upon the King's life, that the soldiers had been again called out, and that the noise of musketry in a distant part of the town had been plainly heard within an hour. As it grew darker, these stories became more direful and mysterious; and often, when some frightened passenger ran past with tidings that the rioters were not far off, and were coming up, the doors were shut and barred, lower windows made secure, and as much consternation engendered, as if the city were invaded by a foreign army.

Gashford walked stealthily about, listening to all he heard, and diffusing or confirming, whenever he had an opportunity, such false intelligence as suited his own purpose; and busily occupied in this way, turned into Holborn for the twentieth time, when a great many women and children came flying along the street—often panting and looking back—and the confused murmur of numerous voices struck upon his ear. Assured by these tokens, and by the red light which began to flash upon the houses on either side, that some of his friends were indeed approaching, he begged a moment's shelter at a door which opened as he passed, and running with some other persons to an upper window, looked out upon the crowd.

They had torches among them, and the chief faces were distinctly visible. That they had been engaged in the destruction of some building was sufficiently apparent, and that it was a Catholic place of worship was evident from the spoils they bore as trophies, which were easily recognisable for the vestments of a priest, and rich fragments of altar furniture. Covered with soot, and dirt, and dust, and lime; their garments torn to rags; their hair hanging wildly about them; their hands and faces jagged and bleeding with the wounds of rusty nails; Barnaby, Hugh, and Dennis hurried on before them all, like hideous madmen. After them, the dense throng came fighting on: some singing; some shouting in triumph; some quarrelling among themselves; some menacing the spectators as they passed; some with great wooden fragments, on which they spent their rage as if they had been alive, rending them limb from limb, and hurling the scattered morsels high into the air; some in a drunken state, unconscious of the hurts they had received from falling bricks, and stones, and beams; one borne upon a shutter, in the very midst, covered with a dingy cloth, a senseless, ghastly heap. Thus—a vision of coarse faces, with here and there a blot of flaring, smoky light; a dream of demon heads and savage eyes, and sticks and iron bars uplifted in the air, and whirled about; a bewildering horror, in which so much was seen, and yet so little, which seemed so long and yet so short, in which there were so many phantoms, not to be forgotten all through life, and yet so many things that could not be observed in that distracting glimpse;—it flitted onward and was gone.

As it passed away upon its work of wrath and ruin, a piercing scream was heard. A knot of persons ran towards the spot; Gashford, who just then emerged into the street, among them. He was on the outskirts of the little concourse, and could not see or hear what passed within; but one who had a better place, informed him that a widow woman had descried her son among the rioters.

"Is that all?" said the secretary, turning his face homewards. "Well! I think this looks a little more like business!"

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-FIRST.

Promising as these outrages were to Gashford's view, and much like business as they looked, they extended that night no farther. The soldiers were again called out, again they took half-a-dozen prisoners, and again the crowd dispersed after a short and bloodless scuffle. Hot and drunken though they were, they had not yet broken all bounds and set all law and government at defiance. Something of their habitual deference to the authority erected by society for its own preservation yet remained among them, and had its majesty been vindicated in time, the secretary would have had to digest a bitter disappointment.

By midnight, the streets were clear and quiet, and, save that there stood in two parts of the town, a heap of nodding walls and pile of rubbish, where there had been at sunset a rich and handsome building, every thing wore its usual aspect. Even the Catholic gentry and tradesmen, of whom there were many, resident in different parts of the city and its suburbs, had no fear for their lives or property, and but little indignation for the wrong they had already sustained in the plunder and destruction of their temples of worship. An honest confidence in the government under whose protection they had lived for many years, and a well-founded reliance on the good feeling and right thinking of the great mass of the community, with whom, notwithstanding their religious differences, they were every day in habits of confidential, affectionate, and friendly intercourse, re-assured them, even under the excesses that had been committed; and convinced them that they who were Protestants in any thing but the name, were no more to be considered as abettors of these disgraceful occurrences, than they themselves were chargeable with the uses of the block, the rack, the gibbet, and the stake, in cruel Mary's reign.

The clock was on the stroke of one, when Gabriel Varden, with his lady and Miss Miggs, sat waiting in the little parlour. This fact, the toppling wicks of the dull, wasted candles; the silence that prevailed; and above all the nightcaps of both maid and matron, were sufficient evidence that they had been prepared for bed some time ago, and had some strong reason for sitting up so far beyond their usual hour.

If any other corroborative testimony had been required, it would have been abundantly furnished in the actions of Miss Miggs, who, having arrived at that restless state and sensitive condition of the nervous system which are the result of long watching, did, by a constant rubbing and tweaking of her nose, a perpetual change of position (arising from the sudden growth of imaginary knots and knobs in her chair,) a frequent friction of her eye-brows, the incessant recurrence of a small cough, a small groan, a gasp, a sigh, a sniff, a spasmodic start, and by other demonstrations of that nature, so file down and rasp, as it were, the patience of the locksmith, that after looking at her in silence for some time, he at last broke out into this apostrophe:

"Miggs my good girl, go to bed—do go to bed. You're really worse than the dripping of a hundred water-butts outside the window, or the scratching of as many mice behind the wainscot. I can't bear it. Do go to bed, Miggs. To oblige me—do."

"You haven't got nothing to untie sir, returned Miss Miggs, "and therefore your requests does not surprise me. But Missis has—and while you set up, mim"—she added, turning to the locksmith's wife, "I couldn't, no not if twenty times the quantity of cold water was apereiently running down my back at this moment, go to bed with a quiet spirit."

Having spoken these words, Miss Miggs made divers efforts to rub her shoulders in an impossible place, and shivered from head to foot; thereby giving the beholders to understand that the imaginary cascade was still in full flow, but that a sense of duty upheld her under that, and all other sufferings, and nerved her to endurance.

Mrs. Varden being too sleepy to speak, and Miss Miggs having, as the phrase is, said her say, the locksmith had nothing for it but to sigh and be as quiet as he could.

But to be quiet with such a basilisk before him, was impossible. If he looked another way, it was worse to feel that she was rubbing her cheek, or twitching her ear, or winking her eye, or making all kinds of extraordinary shapes with her nose, than to see her do it. If she was for a moment free from any of these complaints, it was only because of her foot being asleep, or of her arm having got the fidgets, or of her leg being doubled up with the cramp, or of some other horrible disorder which racked her whole frame. If she did enjoy a moment's ease, then with her eyes shut and her mouth wide open she would be seen to sit very stiff and upright in her chair; then to nod a little way forward, and stop with a jerk; then to nod a little further forward, and stop with another jerk; then to recover herself; then to come forward again—lower—lower—lower—by very slow degrees, until, just as it seemed impossible that she could preserve her balance for another instant, and the locksmith was about to call out in an agony, to save her from dashing down upon her forehead and fracturing her skull, then, all of a sudden and without the smallest notice, she would come upright and rigid again with her eyes open, and in her countenance an expression of defiance, sleepy but yet most obstinate, which plainly said "I've never once closed 'em since I looked at you last, and I'll take my oath of it!"

At length, after the clock had struck two, there was a sound at the street door as if somebody had fallen against the knocker by accident. Miss Miggs immediately jumping up and clapping her hands, cried with a drowsy mingling of the sacred and profane, "Ally Looyer Mim! there's Simmuns's knock!"

"Who's there!" said Gabriel.

"Me!" cried the well-known voice of Mr. Tappertit. Gabriel opened the door, and gave him admission.

He did not cut a very insinuating figure; for a man of his stature suffers in a crowd: and having been active in yesterday morning's work, his dress was literally crushed from head to foot: his hat being beaten out of all shape, and his shoes trodden down at heel like slippers. His coat fluttered in strips about him, the buckles were torn away both from his knees and feet, half his neckerchief was gone, and the bosom of his shirt was rent to tatters. Yet notwithstanding all these personal disadvantages; despite his being very weak from heat and fatigue; and so begrimed with mud and dust that he might have been in a case, for any thing of the real texture (either of his skin or apparel) that the eye could discern; he stalked haughtily into the parlour, and throwing himself into a chair, and endeavouring to thrust his hands into the pockets of his small-clothes, which were turned inside out and displayed upon his legs, like tassels, surveyed the household with a gloomy dignity.

"Simon," said the locksmith gravely, "how comes it that you return home at this time of night, and in this condition? Give me an assurance that you have not been among the rioters, and I am satisfied."

"Sir," replied Mr. Tappertit, with a contemptuous look, "I wonder at your assurance in making such demands."

"You have been drinking," said the locksmith.

"As a general principle, and in the most offensive sense of the words, sir," returned his journeyman with great self-possession, "I consider you a liar. In that last observation you have unintentionally—unintentionally, sir—struck upon the truth."

"Martha," said the locksmith, turning to his wife, and shaking his head sorrowfully, while a smile at the absurd figure before him still played upon his open face, "I trust it may turn out that this poor lad is not the victim of the knaves and fools we have so often had words about, and who have done so much harm this day. If he has been at Warwick Street or Duke Street to-night—"

"He has been at neither, sir," cried Mr. Tappertit in a loud voice, which he suddenly dropped into a whisper as he repeated, with eyes fixed upon the locksmith, "he has been at neither."

"I am glad of it, with all my heart," said the locksmith in a serious tone; "for if he had been, and it could be proved against him, Martha, your great association would have been to him the cart that draws men to the gallows and leaves them hanging in the air. It would, as sure as we're alive!"

Mrs. Varden was too much scared by Simon's altered manner and appearance, and by the accounts of the rioters which had reached her ears that night, to offer any retort, or to have recourse to her usual matrimonial policy. Miss Miggs wrung her hands, and wept.

"He was not at Duke Street or at Warwick Street, G. Varden," said Simon, sternly; "but he was at Westminster. Perhaps, sir, he kicked a county member, perhaps sir he tapped a lord—you may stare, sir, I repeat it—blood flowed from noses, and perhaps he tapped a lord. Who knows? This," he added, putting his hand into his waistcoat-pocket, and taking out a large tooth, at sight of which both Miggs and Mrs. Varden screamed, "this was a bishop's. Beware, G. Varden!"

"Now, I would rather," said the locksmith hastily, "have paid five hundred pounds, than had this come to pass. You idiot, do you know what peril you stand in?"

"I know it, sir," replied his journeyman, "and it is my glory. I was there, every body saw me there. I was conspicuous and prominent. I will abide the consequences."

The locksmith, really disturbed and agitated, paced to and fro in silence—glancing at his former 'prentice every now and then—and at length stopping before him, said:

"Get to bed, and sleep for a couple of hours that you may wake penitent, and with some of your senses about you. Be sorry for what you have done, and we will try to save you. If I call him by five o'clock," said Varden, turning hurriedly to his wife, "and he washes himself clean and changes his dress, he may get to the Tower Stairs, and away by the Gravesend tide-boat, before any search is made for him. From there he can easily get on to Canterbury, where your cousin will give him work till this storm has blown over. I am not sure that I do right in screening him from the punishment he deserves, but he has lived in this house, man and boy, for a dozen years, and I should be sorry if for this one day's work he made a miserable end. Lock the front door Miggs, and show no light towards the street when you go up stairs. Quick, Simon! Get to bed!"

"And do you suppose, sir," retorted Mr. Tappertit, with a thickness and slowness of speech which contrasted forcibly with the rapidity and earnestness of his kind-hearted master—"and do you suppose, sir, that I am base and mean enough to accept your servile proposition!—Miscreant!"

"Whatever you please, Sim, but get to bed. Every minute is of consequence. The light here, Miggs!"

"Yes, yes, oh do! Go to bed directly," cried the two women together.

Mr. Tappertit stood upon his feet, and pushing his chair away to show that he needed no assistance, answered, swaying himself to and fro, and managing his head as if it had no connexion whatever with his body.

"You spoke of Miggs, sir—Miggs may be smothered!"

"Oh Simmun!" ejaculated that young lady in a faint voice. "Oh mim! Oh sir! Oh goodness gracious, what a turn he has give me!"

"This family may all be smothered, sir," returned Mr. Tappertit, after glancing at her with a smile of ineffable disdain, "excepting Mrs. V. I have come here, sir, for her sake this night. Mrs. Varden, take this piece of paper. It's a protection, ma'am. You may need it."

With these words he held out at arms length, a dirty, crumpled scrap of writing. The locksmith took it from him, opened it, and read as follows:

"All good friends to our cause, I hope will be particular, and do no injury to the property of any true Protestant. I am well assured that the proprietor of this house is a staunch and worthy friend to the cause. GEORGE GORDON."

"What's this!" said the locksmith, with an altered face.

"Something that'll do you good service, young feller," replied his journeyman, "as you'll find.—Keep that safe, and where you can lay your hand upon it in an instant. And chalk 'No Popery' on your door to-morrow night, and for a week to come—that's all."

"This is a genuine document," said the locksmith, "I know, for I have seen the hand before. What threat does it imply? What devil is abroad?"

"A fiery devil," retorted Sim; "a flaming, furious devil. Don't you put yourself in its way, or you're done for, my buck. Be warned in time, G. Varden. Farewell!"

But here the two women threw themselves in his way—especially Miss Miggs, who fell upon him with such fervour that she pinned him against the wall—and conjured him in moving words not to go forth till he was sober; to listen to reason; to think of it; to take some rest, and then determine.

"I tell you," said Mr. Tappertit, "that my mind is made up. My bleeding country calls me, and I go! Miggs, if you don't get out of the way, I'll pinch you."

Miss Miggs, still clinging to the rebel, screamed once vociferously—but whether in the distraction of her mind, or because of his having executed his threat, is uncertain.

"Release me," said Simon, struggling to free himself from her chaste, but spider-like embrace. "Let me go! I have made arrangements for you in an altered state of society, and mean to provide for you comfortably in life—there! Will that satisfy you?"

"Oh Simmun!" cried Miss Miggs. "Oh my blessed Simmun! Oh mim, what are my feelings at this conflicting moment!"

Of a rather turbulent description, it would seem; for her nightcap had been knocked off in the scuffle, and she was on her knees upon the floor, making a strange revelation of blue and yellow curl-papers, straggling locks of hair, tags of staylaces, and strings of it's impossible to say what; panting for breath, clasping her hands, turning her eyes upwards, shedding abundance of tears, and exhibiting various other symptoms of the acutest mental suffering.

"I leave," said Simon, turning to his master, with an utter disregard of Miggs's maidenly afflictions, "a box of things up stairs. Do what you like with 'em. I don't want 'em. I'm never coming back here, any more. Provide yourself, sir, with a journeyman; I'm my country's journeyman; henceforward that's my line of business."

"Be what you like in two hour's time, but now go up to bed," returned the locksmith, planting himself in the doorway. "Do you hear me? Go to bed!"

"I hear you, and defy you, Varden," rejoined Simon Tappertit. "This night, sir, I have been in the country, planning an expedition which shall fill your bell-hanging soul with wonder and dismay.—The plot demands my utmost energy. Let me pass!"

"I'll knock you down if you come near the door," replied the locksmith. "You had better go to bed!"

Simon made no answer, but gathering himself up as straight as he could, plunged head foremost at his old master, and the two went driving out into the workshop together, plying their hands and feet so briskly that they looked like half-a-dozen, while Miggs and Mrs. Varden screamed for twelve.

It would have been easy for Varden to knock his old 'prentice down, and bind him hand and foot; but as he was loath to hurt him in his then defenceless state, he contented himself with parrying his blows when he could, taking them in perfect good part when he could not, and keeping between him and the door, until a favourable opportunity should present itself for forcing him to retreat up stairs, and shutting him up in his own room. But in the goodness of his heart, he calculated too much upon his adversary's weakness, and forgot that drunken men who have lost the power of walking steadily, can often run. Watching his time, Simon Tappertit made a cunning show of falling back, staggered unexpectedly forward, brushed past him, opened the door (he knew the trick of that lock well,) and darted down the street like a mad dog. The locksmith paused for a moment in the excess of his astonishment, and then gave chase.

It was an excellent season for a run, for at that silent hour the streets were deserted, the air was cool, and the flying figure before him distinctly visible at a great distance, as it sped away, with a long gaunt shadow following at its heels. But the short-winded locksmith had no chance against a man of Sim's youth and spare figure, though the day had been when he could have run him down in no time. The space between them rapidly increased, and as the rays of the rising sun streamed upon Simon in the act of turning a distant corner, Gabriel Varden was fain to give up, and sit down on a door-step to fetch his breath. Simon meanwhile, without once stopping, fled at the same degree of swiftness to the Boot, where, as he well knew, some of his company were lying, and at which respectable hostelry—for he had already acquired the distinction of being in great peril of the law—a friendly watch had been expecting him all night, and was even now on the look-out for his coming.

"Go thy ways, Sim, go thy ways," said the locksmith, as soon as he could speak. "I have done my best for thee, poor lad, and would have saved thee, but the rope is round thy neck, I fear."

So saying, and shaking his head in a very sorrowful and disconsolate manner, he turned back, and soon re-entered his own house, where Mrs. Varden and the faithful Miggs had been anxiously expecting his return.

Now Mrs. Varden (and by consequence Miss Miggs likewise) was impressed with a secret misgiving that she had done wrong; that she had, to the utmost of her small means, aided and abetted the growth of disturbances, the end of which it was impossible to foresee; that she had led remotely to the scene which had just passed; and that the locksmith's time for triumph and reproach had now arrived indeed. And so strongly did Mrs. Varden feel this, and so crest-fallen was she in consequence, that while her husband was pursuing their lost journeyman, she secreted under her chair the little red brick dwelling house with the yellow roof, lest it should furnish new occasion for reference to the painful theme; and now hid the same still farther, with the skirts of her dress.

But it happened that the locksmith had been thinking of this very article on his way home, and that, coming into the room and not seeing it, he at once demanded where it was.

Mrs. Varden had no resource but to produce it, which she did with many tears, and broken protestations that if she could have known—

"Yes, yes," said Varden, "of course—I know that. I don't mean to reproach you, my dear. But recollect from this time that all good things perverted to evil purposes, are worse than those which are naturally bad. A thoroughly wicked woman, is wicked indeed. When religion goes wrong, she is very wrong, for the same reason. Let us say no more about it, my dear."

So he dropped the red brick dwelling house on the floor, and setting his heel upon it, crushed it into pieces. The halfpence, and sixpences, and other voluntary contributions, rolled about in all directions, but nobody offered to touch them, or to take them up.

"That," said the locksmith, "is easily disposed of, and I would to Heaven that every thing growing out of the same society could be settled as easily."

"It happens very fortunately, Varden," said his wife, with her handkerchief to her eyes, "that in case any more disturbances should happen—which I hope not; I sincerely hope not—"

"I hope so too, my dear."

"—That in case any should occur, we have the piece of paper which that poor misguided young man brought."

"Ay, to be sure," said the locksmith, turning quickly round. "Where is that piece of paper?"

Mrs. Varden stood aghast as he took it from her outstretched hand, tore it into fragments, and threw them under the grate.

"Not use it!" she said.

"Use it!" cried the locksmith. "No! Let them come and pull the roof about our ears; let them burn us out of house and home; I'd neither have the protection of their leader, nor chalk their howl upon my door, though, for not doing it, they shot me on my own threshold. Use it! Let them come and do their worst. The first man who crosses my door step on such an errand as theirs, had better be a hundred miles away. Let him look to it. The others may have their will. I wouldn't beg or buy them off, if, instead of every pound of iron in the place, there was a hundred weight of gold. Get you to bed, Martha. I shall take down the shutters and go to work."

"So early!" said his wife.

"Ay," replied the locksmith cheerily, "so early. Come when they may, they shall not find us skulking and hiding, as if we feared to take our portion of the light of day, and left it all to them. So pleasant dreams to you, my dear, and cheerful sleep!"

With that he gave his wife a hearty kiss, and bade her delay no longer, or it would be time to rise before she lay down to rest. Mrs. Varden quite amiably and meekly walked up stairs, followed by Miggs, who, although a good deal subdued, could not refrain from sundry stimulative coughs and sniffs by the way, or from holding up her hands in astonishment at the daring conduct of master.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-SECOND.

A MOB is usually a creature of very mysterious existence, particularly in a large city. Where it comes from or whither it goes, few men can tell. Assembling and dispersing with equal suddenness, it is as difficult to follow to its various sources as the sea itself; nor does the parallel stop here, for the ocean is not more fickle and uncertain, more terrible when roused, more unreasonable, or more cruel.

The people who were boisterous at Westminster upon the Friday morning and were eagerly bent upon the work of devastation in Duke Street and Warwick Street at night, were, in the mass, the same. Allowing for the chance accessions of which any crowd is morally sure in a town where there must always be a large number of idle and profligate persons, one and the same mob was at both places. Yet they spread themselves in various directions when they dispersed in the afternoon, made no appointment for re-assembling, had no definite purpose or design, and indeed, for any thing they know, were scattered beyond the hope of future union.

At the Boot, which, as has been shown, was in a manner the head quarters of the rioters, there were not, upon this Friday night, a dozen people. Some slept in the stable and out-houses, some in the common room, some two or three in beds. The rest were in their usual homes or haunts. Perhaps not a score in all lay in the adjacent fields and lanes, and under haystacks, or near the warmth of brick-kilns, who had not their accustomed place of rest beneath the open sky. As to the public ways within the town, they had their ordinary nightly occupants, and no others; the usual amount of vice and wretchedness, but no more.

The experience of one evening, however, had taught the reckless leaders of disturbance, that they had but to show themselves in the streets, to be immediately surrounded by materials which they could only have kept together when their aid was not required, at great risk, expense, and trouble. Once possessed of this secret, they were as confident as if twenty thousand men, devoted to their will, had been encamped about them, and assumed a confidence which could not have been surpassed, though that had really been the case. All day Saturday, they remained quiet. On Sunday, they rather studied how to keep their men within call, and in full hope, than to follow out, by any very fierce measure, their first day's proceedings.

"I hope," said Dennis, as, with a loud yawn, he raised his body from a heap of straw on which he had been sleeping, and supporting his head upon his hand, appealed to Hugh on Sunday morning, "that Muster Gashford allows some rest! Perhaps he'd have us at work again already, eh?"

"It's not his way to let matters drop, you may be sure of that," growled Hugh in answer. "I'm in no humour to stir yet, though. I'm as stiff as a dead body, and as full of ugly scratches as if I had been fighting all day yesterday with wild-cats."

"You've so much enthusiasm, that's it," said Dennis, looking with great admiration at the uncombed head, matted beard, and torn hands and face of the wild figure before him; "you're such a devil of a fellow. You hurt yourself a hundred times more than you need, because you will be foremost in every thing, and will do more than the rest."

"For the matter of that," returned Hugh, shaking back his ragged hair and glancing towards the door of the stable in which they lay; "there's one yonder as good as me. What did I tell you about him? Did I say he was worth a dozen, when you doubted him?"

Mr. Dennis rolled lazily over upon his breast, and resting his chin upon his hand in imitation of the attitude in which Hugh lay, said, as he too looked towards the door:

"Ay ay, you knew him brother, you knew him. But who'd suppose to look at that chap now, that he could be the man he is! Isn't it a thousand cruel pities, brother, that instead of taking his nat'ral rest and qualifying himself for further exertions in this here honourable cause, he should be playing at soldiers like a boy? And his cleanliness, too!" said Mr. Dennis, who certainly had no reason to entertain a fellow feeling with any body who was particular on that score: "what weaknesses he's guilty of, with respect to his cleanliness! At five o'clock this morning, there he was at the pump, though any one would think he had gone through enough the day before yesterday, to be pretty fast asleep at that time. But no—when I woke for a minute or two, there he was at the pump, and if you'd have seen him sticking them peacock's feathers into his hat when he'd done washing—ah! I'm sorry he's such a imperfect character, but the best on us is incomplete in some pint of view or another."

The subject of this dialogue and of these concluding remarks which were uttered in a tone of philosophical meditation, was, as the reader will have divined, no other than Barnaby, who, with his flag in his hand, stood sentry in the little patch of sunlight at the distant door, or walked to and fro outside, singing softly to himself, and keeping time to the music of some clear church bells. Whether he stood still, leaning with both hands on the flag-staff, or, bearing it upon his shoulder, paced slowly up and down, the careful arrangement of his poor dress, and his erect and lofty bearing, showed how high a sense he had of the great importance of his trust, and how happy and how proud it made him. To Hugh and his companion, who lay in a dark corner of the gloomy shed, he, and the sunlight, and the peaceful Sabbath sound to which he made response, seemed like a bright picture framed by the door, and set off by the stable's blackness. The whole formed such a contrast to themselves, as they lay wallowing, like some obscene animals, in their squalor and wickedness on the two heaps of straw, that for a few moments they looked on without speaking, and felt almost ashamed.

"Ah!" said Hugh at length, carrying it off with a laugh: "He's a rare fellow is Barnaby, and can do more, with less rest, or meat, or drink, than any of us. As to his soldiering, I put him on duty there."

"Then there was a object in it, and a proper good one too, I'll be sworn," retorted Dennis with a broad grin, and an oath of the same quality. "What was it, brother?"

"Why, you see," said Hugh, crawling a little nearer to him, "that our noble captain yonder, came in yesterday morning rather the worse for liquor, and was—like you and me—ditto last night."

Dennis looked to where Simon Tappertit lay coiled upon a truss of hay, snoring profoundly, and nodded.

"And our noble captain," continued Hugh with another laugh, "our noble captain and I, have planned for to-morrow a roaring expedition, with good profit in it."

"Against the papists?" asked Dennis, rubbing his hands.

"Ay, against the papists—against one of 'em at least, that some of us, and I for one, owe a good heavy grudge to."

"Not Muster Gashford's friend that he spoke to us about in my house, eh?" said Dennis, brimfull of pleasant expectation.

"The same man," said Hugh.

"That's your sort," cried Mr. Dennis, gaily shaking hands with him, "that's the kind of game. Let's have revenges and injuries, and all that, and we shall get on twice as fast. Now you talk, indeed!"

"Ha, ha, ha! The captain," added Hugh, "has thoughts of carrying off a woman in the bustle, and—ha, ha, ha!—and so have I!"

Mr. Dennis received this part of the scheme with a wry face, observing that as a general principle he objected to women altogether, as being unsafe and slippery persons on whom there was no calculating with any certainty, and who were never in the same mind for four-and-twenty hours at a stretch. He might have expatiated on this suggestive theme at much greater length, but that it occurred to him to ask what connexion existed between the proposed expedition and Barnaby's being posted at the stable door as sentry; to which Hugh cautiously replied in these words:

"Why, the people we mean to visit, were friends of his once upon a time, and I know that much of him to feel pretty sure that if he thought we were going to do them any harm, he'd be no friend to our side, but would lend a ready hand to the other. So I've persuaded him (for I know him of old) that Lord George has picked him out to guard this place to-morrow while we're away, and that it's a great honour—and so he's on duty now, and as proud of it as if he was a general. Ha, ha! What do you say to me for a careful man as well as a devil of a one?"

Mr. Dennis exhausted himself in compliments, and then added,

"But about the expedition itself—"

"About that," said Hugh, "you shall hear all particulars from me and the great captain conjointly and both together—for see, he's waking up. Rouse yourself, lion-heart. Ha, ha! Put a good face upon it, and drink again. Another hair of the dog that bit you, captain! Call for drink! There's enough of gold and silver cups and candlesticks buried underneath my bed," he added, rolling back the straw, and pointing to where the ground was newly turned, "to pay for it, if it was a score of casks full. Drink, captain!"

Mr. Tappertit received these jovial promptings with a very bad grace, being much the worse, both in mind and body, for his two nights of debauch, and but indifferently able to stand upon his legs. With Hugh's assistance, however, he contrived to stagger to the pump; and having refreshed himself with an abundant draught of cold water, and a copious shower of the same refreshing liquid on his head and face, he ordered some rum and milk to be served; and upon that innocent beverage and some biscuits and cheese made a pretty hearty meal. That done, he disposed himself in an easy attitude on the ground beside his two companions (who were carousing after their own tastes,) and proceeded to enlighten Mr. Dennis in reference to to-morrow's project.

That their conversation was an interesting one, was rendered manifest by its length, and by the close attention of all three. That it was not of an oppressively grave character, but was enlivened by various pleasantries arising out of the subject, was clear from their loud and frequent roars of laughter, which startled Barnaby on his post, and made him wonder at their levity. But he was not summoned to join them, until they had eaten, and drunk, and slept, and talked together for some hours; not, indeed, until the twilight; when they informed him that they were about to make a slight demonstration in the streets—just to keep the people's hands in, as it was Sunday night, and the public might otherwise be disappointed—and that he was free to accompany them, if he would.

Without the slightest preparation, saving that they carried clubs and wore the blue cockade, they sallied out into the streets; and, with no more settled design than that of doing as much mischief as they could, paraded them at random. Their numbers rapidly increasing, they soon divided into parties; and agreeing to meet by-and-by, in the fields near Welbeck Street, scoured the town in various directions. The largest body, and that which augmented with the greatest rapidity, was the one to which Hugh and Barnaby belonged. This took its way towards Moorfields, where there was a rich chapel, and in which neighbourhood several Catholic families were known to reside.

Beginning with the private houses so occupied, they broke open the doors and windows; and while they destroyed the furniture and left but the bare walls, made a sharp search for tools and engines of destruction, such as hammers, pokers, axes, saws, and such like instruments. Many of the rioters made belts of cord, or of handkerchiefs, or any material they found at hand, and wore these weapons as openly as pioneers upon a field-day. There was not the least disguise or concealment—indeed, on this night, very little excitement or hurry. From the chapels, they tore down and took away the very altars, benches, pulpits, pews, and flooring; from the dwelling-houses, the very wainscoting and stairs. This Sunday evening's recreation they pursued like mere workmen who had a certain task to do, and did it. Fifty resolute men might have turned them at any moment; a single company of soldiers could have scattered them like dust; but no man interposed, no authority restrained them, and, except by the terrified persons who fled from their approach, they were as little heeded as if they were pursuing their lawful occupations with the utmost sobriety and good conduct.

In the same manner, they marched to the place of rendezvous agreed upon, made great fires in the fields, and reserving the most valuable of their spoils, burnt the rest. Priestly garments, images of saints, rich stuffs and ornaments, altar-furniture and household goods, were cast into the flames, and shed a glare on the whole country around; but they danced, and howled, and roared about these fires till they were tired, and were never for an instant checked.

As the main body filed off from this scene of action, and passed down Welbeck Street, they came upon Gashford, who had been a witness of their proceedings, and was walking stealthily along the pavement. Keeping up with him, and yet not seeming to speak, Hugh muttered in his ear:

"Is this better, master?"

"No," said Gashford. "It is not."

"What would you have?" said Hugh. "Fevers are never at their height at once. They must get on by degrees."

"I would have you," said Gashford, pinching his arm with such malevolence that his nails seemed to meet in the skin; "I would have you put some meaning into your work. Fools! Can you make no better bonfires than of rags and scraps? Can you burn nothing whole?"

"A little patience, master," said Hugh. "Wait but a few hours, and you shall see. Look for a redness in the sky, to-morrow night."

With that, he fell back into his place beside Barnaby; and when the secretary looked after him, both were lost in the crowd.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-THIRD.

The next day was ushered in by merry peals of bells, and by the firing of the Tower guns; flags were hoisted on many of the church-steeples; the usual demonstrations were made, in honour of the anniversary of the King's birth-day; and every man went about his pleasure or business, as if the city were in perfect order, and there were no half-smouldering embers in its secret places which on the approach of night would kindle up again, and scatter ruin and dismay abroad. The leaders of the riot, rendered still more daring by the success of last night and by the booty they had acquired, kept steadily together, and only thought of implicating the mass of their followers so deeply that no hope of pardon or reward might tempt them to betray their more notorious confederates into the hands of justice.

Indeed, the sense of having gone too far to be forgiven, held the timid together no less than the bold. Many, who would readily have pointed out the foremost rioters and given evidence against them, felt that escape by that means was hopeless, when their every act had been observed by scores of people who had taken no part in the disturbances; who had suffered in their persons, peace, or property, by the outrages of the mob; who would be most willing witnesses; and whom the government would, no doubt, prefer to any King's evidence that might be offered. Many of this class had deserted their usual occupations on the Saturday morning; some had been seen by their employers, active in the tumult; others knew they must be suspected, and that they would be discharged if they returned; others had been desperate from the beginning, and comforted themselves with the homely proverb, that, being hung at all, they might as well be hung for a sheep as a lamb. They all hoped and believed, in a greater or less degree, that the government they seemed to have paralysed, would, in its terror, come to terms with them in the end, and suffer them to make their own conditions. The least sanguine among them reasoned with himself that, at the worst, they were too many to be all punished, and that he had as good a chance of escape as any other man. The great mass never reasoned or thought at all, but were stimulated by their own headlong passions, by poverty, by ignorance, by the love of mischief, and the hope of plunder.

One other circumstance is worthy of remark; and that is, that from the moment of their first outbreak at Westminster, every symptom of order or preconcerted arrangement among them, vanished. When they divided into parties and ran to different quarters of the town, it was on the spontaneous suggestion of the moment. Each party swelled as it went along, like rivers as they roll towards the sea; new leaders sprang up as they were wanted, disappeared when the necessity was over, and re-appeared at the next crisis. Each tumult took shape and form, from the circumstances of the moment; sober workmen going home from their day's labour, were seen to cast down their baskets of tools and become rioters in an instant; mere boys on errands did the like. In a word, a moral plague ran through the city. The noise, and hurry, and excitement, had for hundreds and hundreds an attraction they had no firmness to resist. The contagion spread, like a dread fever: an infectious madness, as yet not near its height, seized on new victims every hour, and society began to tremble at their ravings.

It was between two and three o'clock in the afternoon when Gashford looked into the lair described in the last chapter, and seeing only Barnaby and Dennis there, enquired for Hugh.

He was out, Barnaby told him; had gone out more than an hour ago; and had not yet returned.

"Dennis!" said the smiling secretary, in his smoothest voice, as he sat down cross-legged on a barrel, "Dennis!"

The hangman struggled into a sitting posture directly, and with his eyes wide open, looked towards him.

"How do you do, Dennis?" said Gashford, nodding. "I hope you have suffered no inconvenience from your late exertions, Dennis!"

"I always will say of you, Muster Gashford," returned the hangman, staring at him, "that that 'ere quiet way of yours might almost wake a dead man. It is," he added with a muttered oath—still staring at him in a thoughtful manner—"so awfully sly!"

"So distinct, eh Dennis?"

"Distinct!" he answered, scratching his head, and keeping his eyes upon the secretary's face; "I seem to hear it, Muster Gashford, in my very bones."

"I am very glad your sense of hearing is so sharp, and that I succeed in making myself so intelligible," said Gashford, in his unvarying, even tone. "Where is your friend?"

Mr. Dennis looked round as in expectation of beholding him asleep upon his bed of straw; then remembering that he had seen him go out, replied:

"I can't say where he is, Muster Gashford. I expected him back afore now. I hope it isn't time that we was busy, Muster Gashford?"

"Nay," said the secretary, "who should know that as well as you? How can I tell you, Dennis? You are a perfect master of your own actions, you know, and accountable to nobody—except sometimes to the law, eh?"

Dennis, who was very much baffled by the cool matter-of-course manner of this reply, recovered his self-possession on his professional pursuits being referred to, and pointing towards Barnaby, shook his head and frowned.

"Hush!" cried Barnaby.

"Ah! Do hush about that, Muster Gashford," said the hangman in a low voice, "pop'lar prejudices—you always forget—well, Barnaby my lad, what's the matter?"

"I hear him coming," he answered: "Hark! Do you mark that? That's his foot! Bless you, I know his step, and his dog's too. Tramp, tramp, pitpat, on they come together, and, ha, ha, ha!—and here they are!" he cried joyfully, welcoming Hugh with both hands, and then patting him fondly on the back, as if instead of being the rough companion he was, he had been one of the most prepossessing of men. "Here he is, and safe too! I am glad to see him back again, old Hugh!"

"I'm a Turk if he don't give me a warmer welcome always than any man of sense," said Hugh, shaking hands with him with a kind of ferocious friendship, strange enough to see. "How are you, boy?"

"Hearty!" cried Barnaby, waving his hat. "Ha, ha, ha! And merry too, Hugh! And ready to do any thing for the good cause, and the right, and to help the kind, mild, pale-faced gentleman—the Lord they use so ill—eh, Hugh?"

"Ay!" returned his friend, dropping his hand, and looking at Gashford for an instant with a changed expression before he spoke to him. "Good day, master!"

"And good day to you," replied the secretary, nursing his leg. "And many good days—whole years of them, I hope. You are heated."

"So would you have been, master," said Hugh, wiping his face, "if you'd been running here as fast as I have."

"You know the news then? Yes, I supposed you would have heard it."

"News—what news?"

"You don't?" cried Gashford, raising his eyebrows with an exclamation of surprise. "Dear me! Come; then I am the first to make you acquainted with your distinguished position, after all. Do you see the King's Arms a-top?" he smilingly asked, as he took a large paper from his pocket, unfolded it, and held it out for Hugh's inspection.

"Well!" said Hugh. "What's that to me?"

"Much. A great deal," replied the secretary. "Read it."

"I told you, the first time I saw you, that I couldn't read," said Hugh, impatiently. "What in the Devil's name's inside of it?"

"It is a proclamation from the King in Council," said Gashford, "dated to-day, and offering a reward of five hundred pounds—five hundred pounds is a great deal of money, and a large temptation to some people—to any one who will discover the person or persons most active in demolishing those chapels on Saturday night."

"Is that all?" cried Hugh, with an indifferent air. "I knew of that."

"Truly I might have known you did," said Gashford, smiling, and folding up the document again. "Your friend, I might have guessed—indeed I did guess—was sure to tell you."

"My friend!" stammered Hugh, with an unsuccessful effort to appear surprised. "What friend?"

"Tut tut—do you suppose I don't know where you have been?" retorted Gashford, rubbing his hands, and beating the back of one on the palm of the other, and looking at him with a cunning eye. "How dull you think me! Shall I say his name?"

"No," said Hugh, with a hasty glance towards Dennis.

"You have also heard from him, no doubt," resumed the secretary, after a moment's pause, "that the rioters who have been taken (poor fellows) are committed for trial, and that some very active witnesses have had the temerity to appear against them. Among others—" and here he clenched his teeth, as if he would suppress, by force, some violent words that rose upon his tongue; and spoke very slowly.

"Among others, a gentleman who saw the work going on in Warwick street; a Catholic gentleman; one Haredale."

Hugh would have prevented his uttering the word, but it was out already. Hearing the name, Barnaby turned swiftly round.

"Duty, duty, bold Barnaby!" cried Hugh, assuming his wildest and most rapid manner, and thrusting into his hand his staff and flag which leant against the wall. "Mount guard without loss of time, for we are off upon our expedition. Up, Dennis, and get ready. Take care that no one turns the straw upon my bed, brave Barnaby; we know what's underneath it—eh! Now, master, quick! What you have to say, say speedily, for the little captain and a cluster of 'em are in the fields, and only waiting for us. Sharp's the word, and strike's the action. Quick!"

Barnaby was not proof against this bustle and despatch. The look of mingled astonishment and anger which had appeared in his face when he turned towards them, faded from it, as the words passed from his memory, like breath from a polished mirror; and grasping the weapon which Hugh forced upon him, he proudly took his station at the door, beyond their hearing.

"You might have spoiled our plans, master," said Hugh. "You, too, of all men!"

"Who would have supposed that he would be so quick?" urged Gashford.

"He's as quick sometimes—I don't mean with his hands, for that you know, but with his head—as you, or any man," said Hugh. "Dennis, it's time we were going; they're waiting for us; I came to tell you. Reach me my stick and belt. Here! Lend a hand, master. Fling this over my shoulder, and buckle it behind, will you?"

"Brisk as ever!" said the secretary, adjusting it for him as he desired.

"A man need be brisk to-day; there's brisk work a-foot."

"There is, is there?" said Gashford. He said it with such a provoking assumption of ignorance, that Hugh, looking over his shoulder and angrily down upon him, replied:

"Is there! You know there is! Who knows better than you, master, that the first great step to be taken is to make examples of these witnesses, and frighten all men from appearing against us or any of our body, any more?"

"There's one we know of," returned Gashford, with an expressive smile, "who is at least as well informed upon that subject as you or I."

"If we mean the same gentleman, as I suppose we do," Hugh rejoined, softly, "I tell you this—he's as good and quick information about every thing as—" here he paused and looked round, as if to make quite sure that the person in question was not within hearing—"as Old Nick himself. Have you done that, master? How slow you are!"

"Its quite fast now," said Gashford, rising. "I say—you didn't find that your friend disapproved of to-day's little expedition? Ha, ha, ha! It is fortunate! it jumps so well with the witness' policy; for, once planned, it must have been carried out. And now you are going, eh?"

"Now we are going, master!" Hugh replied. "Any parting words!"

"Oh dear, no," said Gashford sweetly. "None!"

"You're sure?" cried Hugh, nudging the grinning Dennis.

"Quite sure, eh, Muster Gashford?" chuckled the hangman.

Gashford paused a moment, struggling with his caution and his malice; then putting himself between the two men, and laying a hand upon the arm of each, said, in a cramped whisper:

"Do not, my good friends—I am sure you will not—forget our talk one night—in your house, Dennis—about this person. No mercy, no quarter, no two beams of his house to be left standing where the builder placed them! Fire, the saying goes, is a good servant, but a bad master. Make it his master; he deserves no better. But I am sure you will be firm, I am sure you will be very resolute, I am sure you will remember that he thirsts for your lives, and those of all your brave companions. If you ever acted like stanch fellows, you will do so to-day. Won't you, Dennis—won't you, Hugh?"

The two looked at him, and at each other; then bursting into a roar of laughter, brandished their staves above their heads, shook hands, and hurried out.

When they had been gone a little time, Gashford followed. They were yet in sight, and hastening to that part of the adjacent fields in which their fellows had already mustered; Hugh was looking back, and flourishing his hat to Barnaby, who, delighted with his trust, replied in the same manner, and then resumed his pacing up and down before the stable-door, where his feet had worn a path already. And when Gashford himself was far distant, and looked back for the last time, he was still walking to and fro, with the same measured tread; the most devoted and the blithest champion that ever maintained a post, and felt his heart lifted up with a brave sense of duty, and determination to defend it to the last.

Smiling at the simplicity of the poor idiot, Gashford betook himself to Welbeck Street by a different path from that which he knew the rioters would take, and sitting down behind a curtain in one of the upper windows of Lord George Gordon's house, waited impatiently for their coming. They were so long, that although he knew it had been settled they should come that way, he had a misgiving they must have changed their plans and taken some other route. But at length the roar of voices was heard in the neighbouring fields, and soon afterwards they came thronging past, in a great body.

However, they were not all, nor nearly all, in one body, but were, as he soon found, divided into four parties, each of which stopped before the house to give three cheers, and then went on; the leaders crying out in what direction they were going, and calling on the spectators to join them. The first detachment, carrying, by way of banners, some relics of the havoc they had made in Moorfields, proclaimed that they were on their way to Chelsea, whence they would return in the same order, to make of the spoil they bore, a great bonfire, near at hand. The second gave out that they were bound for Wapping, to destroy a chapel; the third, that their place of destination was East Smithfield, and their object the same. All this was done in broad, bright, summer day. Gay carriages and chairs stopped to let them pass, or turned back to avoid them; people on foot stood aside in doorways, or perhaps knocked and begged permission to stand at a window, or in the hall, until the rioters had passed; but nobody interfered with them; and directly they had gone by, every thing went on as usual.

There still remained the fourth body, and for that the secretary looked with a most intense eagerness. At last it came up. It was numerous, and composed of picked men; for as he gazed down among them, he recognised many upturned faces which he knew well—those of Simon Tappertit, Hugh, and Dennis in the front, of course. They halted and cheered, as the others had done; but when they moved again, they did not, like them, proclaim what design they had. Hugh merely raised his hat upon the bludgeon he carried, and glancing at a spectator on the opposite side of the way, was gone.

Gashford followed the direction of his glance instinctively, and saw, standing on the pavement, and wearing the blue cockade, Sir John Chester. He held his hat an inch or two above his head, to propitiate the mob; and, resting gracefully on his cane, smiling pleasantly, and displaying his dress and person to the very best advantage, looked on in the most tranquil state imaginable. For all that, and quick and dexterous as he was, Gashford had seen him recognise Hugh with the air of a patron. He had no longer any eyes for the crowd, but fixed his keen regards upon Sir John.

He stood in the same place and posture, until the last man in the concourse had turned the corner of the street; then very deliberately took the blue cockade out of his hat; put it carefully in his pocket, ready for the next emergency; refreshed himself with a pinch of snuff; put up his box; and was walking slowly off, when a passing carriage stopped, and a lady's hand let down the glass. Sir John's hat was off again immediately. After a minute's conversation at the carriage-window, in which it was apparent that he was vastly entertaining on the subject of the mob, he stepped lightly in, and was driven away.

The secretary smiled, but he had other thoughts to dwell upon, and soon dismissed the topic. Dinner was brought to him, but he sent it down untasted; and, in restless pacings up and down the room, and constant glances at the clock, and many futile efforts to sit down and read, or go to sleep, or look out of the window, consumed four weary hours. When the dial told him thus much time had crept away, he stole up stairs to the top of the house, and coming out upon the roof, sat down with his face towards the east.

Heedless of the fresh air that blew upon his heated brow, of the pleasant meadows from which he turned, of the piles of roofs and chimneys upon which he looked, of the smoke and rising mist he vainly sought to pierce, of the shrill cries of children at their evening sports, the distant hum and turmoil of the town, the cheerful country breath that rustled past to meet it, and to droop and die; he watched, and watched, till it was dark—save for the specks of light that twinkled in the streets below and far away—and, as the darkness deepened, strained his gaze and grew more eager yet.

"Nothing but gloom in that direction still!" he muttered restlessly. "Dog! where is the redness in the sky, you promised me!

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-FOURTH.

Rumours of the prevailing disturbances had by this time begun to be pretty generally circulated through the towns and villages round London, and the tidings were every where received with that appetite for the marvellous and love of the terrible which have probably been among the natural characteristics of mankind since the creation of the world. These accounts, however, appeared, to many persons at that day, as they would to us at the present, but that we know them to be matter of history, so monstrous and improbable, that a great number of those who were resident at a distance, and who were credulous enough on other points, were really unable to bring their minds to believe that such things could be; and rejected the intelligence they received on all hands, as wholly fabulous and absurd.

Mr. Willet—not so much, perhaps, on account of his having argued and settled the matter with himself, as by reason of his constitutional obstinacy—was one of those who positively refused to entertain the current topic for a moment. On this very evening, and perhaps at the very time when Gashford kept his solitary watch, old John was so red in the face with perpetually shaking his head in contradiction of his three ancient cronies and pot companions, that he was quite a phenomenon to behold; and lighted up the Maypole Porch wherein they sat together, like a monstrous carbuncle in a fairy tale.

"Do you think, sir," said Mr. Willet, looking hard at Solomon Daisy, for it was his custom in cases of personal altercation to fasten upon the smallest man in the party—"do you think, sir, that I'm a born fool!"

"No, no, Johnny," returned Solomon, looking round upon the little circle of which he formed a part: "We all know better than that. You're no fool, Johnny. No, no!"

Mr. Cobb and Mr. Parkes shook their heads in unison, muttering "No, no, Johnny, not you!" But as such compliments had usually the effect of making Mr. Willet rather more dogged than before, he surveyed them with a look of deep disdain, and returned for answer:

"Then what do you mean by coming here, and telling me that this evening you're going to walk up to London together—you three—you—and have the evidence of your own senses? An't," said Mr. Willet, putting his pipe in his mouth with an air of solemn disgust, "an't the evidence of my senses enough for you?"

"But we haven't got it, Johnny," pleaded Parkes, humbly.

"You haven't got it, sir?" repeated Mr. Willet, eyeing him from top to toe. "You haven't got it, sir? You have got it, sir. Don't I tell you that His blessed Majesty King George the Third would no more stand a rioting and rollicking in his streets, than he'd stand being crowed over by his own Parliament?"

"Yes Johnny, but that's your sense—not your senses," said the adventurous Mr. Parkes.

"How do you know," returned John with great dignity. "You're a contradicting pretty free, you are sir. How do you know which it is? I'm not aware I ever told you, sir."

Mr. Parkes, finding himself in the position of having got into metaphysics without exactly seeing his way out of them, stammered forth an apology and retreated from the argument. There then ensued a silence of some ten minutes or a quarter of an hour, at the expiration of which period Mr. Willet was observed to rumble and shake with laughter, and presently remarked, in reference to his late adversary, "that he hoped he had tackled him enough." Thereupon Messrs. Cobb and Daisy laughed, and nodded, and Parkes was looked upon as thoroughly and effectually put down.

"Do you suppose if all this was true, that Mr. Haredale would be constantly away from home, as he is?" said John, after another silence. "Do you think he would'nt be afraid to leave his house with them two young women in it, and only a couple of men or so?"

"Ay, but then you know, returned Solomon Daisy, "his house is a goodish way out of London, and they say that the rioters won't go more than two miles, or three at farthest, off the stones. Besides, you know, some of the Catholic gentlefolks have actually sent trinkets and such-like down here for safety—at least, so the story goes."

"The story goes!" said Mr. Willet testily. "Yes, sir. The story goes that you saw a ghost last March. But nobody believes it."

"Well!" said Solomon, rising, to divert the attention of his two friends, who tittered at this retort: "believed or disbelieved it's true; and true or not, if we mean to go to London, we must be going at once. So shake hands, Johnny, and good night."

"I shall shake hands," returned the landlord, putting his into his pockets, "with no man as goes to London on such nonsensical errands."

The three cronies were therefore reduced to the necessity of shaking his elbows; having performed that ceremony, and brought from the house their hats, and sticks, and great coats, they bade him good night and departed; promising to bring him on the morrow full and true accounts of the real state of the city, and if it were quiet, to give him the full merit of his victory.

John Willet looked after them, as they plodded along the road in the rich glow of a summer evening; and knocking the ashes out of his pipe, laughed inwardly at their folly, until his sides were sore.—When he had quite exhausted himself—which took some time, for he laughed as slowly as he thought and spoke—he sat himself comfortably with his back to the house, put his legs upon the bench, then his apron over his face, and fell sound asleep.

How long he slept, matters not; but it was for no brief space, for when he awoke, the rich light had faded, the sombre hues of night were falling fast upon the landscape, and a few bright stars were already twinkling overhead. The brids were all at roost, the daisies on the green had closed their fairy hoods, the honeysuckle twining round the porch exhaled its perfume in a twofold degree, as though it lost its coyness at that silent time and loved to shed its fragrance on the night; the ivy scarcely stirred its deep green leaves. How tranquil, and how beautiful it was!

Was there no sound in the air, besides the gentle rustling of the trees and the grasshopper's merry chirp? Hark! Something very faint and distant, not unlike the murmuring in a sea-shell. Now it grew louder, fainter now, and now it altogether died away. Presently—it came again, subsided, came once more; grew louder, fainter, swelled into a roar. It was on the road, and varied with its windings.—All at once it burst with a distinct sound—the voices, and the tramping feet of many men.

It is questionable whether old John Willet, even then, would have thought of the rioters, but for the cries of his cook and housemaid, who ran screaming up stairs, and locked themselves into one of the old garrets,—shrieking dismally when they had done so, by way of rendering their place of refuge perfectly secret and secure. These two females did afterwards depone that Mr. Willet in his consternation uttered but one word, and called that up the stairs in a stentorian voice, six distinct times. But as this word was a monosyllable, which, however inoffensive when applied to the quadruped it denotes, is highly reprehensible when used in connexion with females of unimpeachable character, many persons were inclined to believe that the young women laboured under some hallucination caused by excessive fear; and that their ears deceived them.

Be this as it may, John Willet, in whom the very uttermost extent of dull headed perplexity supplied the place of courage, stationed himself in the porch, and waited for their coming up. Once, it dimly occurred to him that there was a kind of door to the house, which had a lock and bolts; and at the same time some shadowy ideas of shutters to the lower windows, flitted through his brain. But he stood stock still, looking down the road in the direction which the noise was rapidly advancing, and did not so much as take his hands out of his pockets.

He had not to wait long. A dark mass, looming through a cloud of dust, soon became visible; the mob quickened their pace; shouting and whooping like savages, they came rushing on pell-mell; and in a few seconds he was bandied from hand to hand, in the heart of a crowd of men.

"Halloa!" cried a voice he knew, as the man who spoke came cleaving through the throng. "Where is he? Give him to me. Don't hurt him. How now, old Jack! Ha, ha, ha!"

Mr. Willet looked at him, and saw it was Hugh; but he said nothing, and thought nothing.

"These lads are thirsty and must drink!" cried Hugh, thrusting him back towards the house. "Bustle, Jack, bustle. Show us the best—the very best—the over-proof that you keep for your own drinking, Jack!"

John faintly articulated the words, "Who's to pay?"

"He says 'Who's to pay!'" cried Hugh, with a roar of laughter which was loudly echoed by the crowd. Then turning to John, he added, "Pay! Why, nobody."

John stared round at the mass of faces—some grinning, some fierce, some lighted up by torches, some indistinct, some dusky and shadowy: some looking at him, some at his house, some at each other,—and while he was, as he thought, in the very act of doing so, found himself, without any consciousness of having moved, in the bar; sitting down in an arm-chair, and watching the destruction of his property, as if it were some queer play or entertainment, of an astonishing and stupefying nature, but having no reference to himself—that he could make out—at all.

Yes. Here was the bar—the bar that the boldest never entered without special invitation—the sanctuary, the mystery, the hallowed ground: here it was, crammed with men, clubs, sticks, torches, pistols; filled with a deafening noise, oaths, shouts, screams, hootings; changed all at once into a bear-garden, a madhouse, an infernal temple: men darting in and out, by door and window, smashing the glass, turning the taps, drinking liquor out of China punch-bowls, sitting astride of casks, smoking private and personal pipes, cutting down the sacred grove of lemons, hacking and hewing at the celebrated cheese, breaking open inviolable drawers, putting things in their pockets which didn't belong to them, dividing his own money before his own eyes, wantonly wasting, breaking, pulling down, and tearing up: nothing quiet, nothing private: men every where—above, below, over-head, in the bedrooms, in the kitchen, in the yard, in the stables—clambering in at windows when there were doors wide open; dropping out of windows when the stairs were handy; leaping over the banisters into chasms of passages: new faces and figures presenting themselves every instant—some yelling, some singing, some fighting, some breaking glass and crockery, some laying the dust with the liquor they couldn't drink, some ringing the bells till they pulled them down, others beating them with pokers till they beat them into fragments: more men still—more, more, more,—swarming on like insects: noise, smoke, light, darkness, frolic, anger, laughter, groans, plunder, fear, and ruin!

Nearly all the time while John looked on at this bewildering scene, Hugh kept near him; and though he was the loudest, wildest, most destructive villain there, he saved his old master's bones a score of times. Nay, even when Mr. Tappertit, excited by liquor, came up, and in an assertion of his prerogative politely kicked John Willet on the shins, Hugh bade him return the compliment; and if old John had sufficient presence of mind to understand this whispered direction, and to profit by it, he might no doubt, under Hugh's protection, have done so with impunity.

At length the band began to re-assemble outside the house, and to call to those within, to join them, for they were losing time. These murmurs increasing, and attaining a very high pitch, Hugh, and some of those who yet lingered in the bar, and who plainly were the leaders of the troop, took counsel together apart as to what was to be done with John, to keep him quiet until their Chigwell work was over. Some proposed to set the house on fire and leave him in it; others that he should be reduced to a state of temporary insensibility, by knocking on the head; others that he should be sworn to sit where he was until to-morrow at the same hour; others again that he should be gagged and taken off with them, under a sufficient guard. All these propositions being overruled, it was concluded, at last, to bind him in his chair, and the word was passed for Dennis.

"Look'ee here, Jack!" said Hugh, striding up to him: "We're going to tie you, hand and foot, but otherwise you won't be hurt. D'ye hear?"

John Willet looked at another man, as if he didn't know which was the speaker, and muttered something about an ordinary every Sunday at two o'clock.

"You won't be hurt I tell you, Jack—do you hear me?" roared Hugh, impressing the assurance upon him by means of a heavy blow on the back. "He's so dead scared, he's wool-gathering, I think. Ha, ha! Give him a drop of something to drink here. Hand over, one of you."

A glass of liquor being passed forward, Hugh poured the contents down old John's throat. Mr. Willet feebly smacked his lips, thrust his hand into his pocket, and enquired what was to pay; adding, as he looked vacantly round, that he believed there was a trifle of broken glass—

"He's out of his senses for the time, it's my belief," said Hugh, after shaking him, without any visible effect upon his system, until his keys rattled in his pocket. "Where's that Dennis?"

The word was again passed, and presently Mr. Dennis, with a long cord bound about his middle, something after the manner of a friar, came hurrying in, attended by a body-guard of half-a-dozen of his men.

"Come! Be alive here!" cried Hugh, stamping his foot upon the ground. "Make haste!"

Dennis, with a wink and a nod, unwound the cord from about his person, and raising his eyes to the ceiling, looked all over it, and round the walls and cornice, with a curious eye; then shook his head.

"Move man, can't you!" cried Hugh, with another impatient stamp of his foot. "Are we to wait here till the cry has gone for ten miles round, and our work's interrupted?"

"It's all very fine talking, brother," answered Dennis, stepping towards him; "but unless—" and here he whispered in his ear—"unless we do it over the door, it can't be done at all in this here room."

"What can't!" Hugh demanded.

"What can't!" retorted Dennis. "Why, the old man can't."

"Why, you weren't going to hang him!" cried Hugh.

"No, brother!" returned the hangman, with a stare. "What else?"

Hugh made no answer, but snatching the rope from his companion's hand, proceeded to bind old John himself; but his very first move was so bungling and unskilful, that Mr. Dennis entreated, almost with tears in his eyes, that he might be permitted to perform the duty. Hugh consenting, he achieved it in a twinkling.

"There!" he said, looking mournfully at John Willet, who displayed no more emotion in his bonds than he had shown out of them. "That's what I call pretty, and workmanlike. He's quite a picter now. But, brother, just a word with you—now that he's ready trussed, as one may say, wouldn't it be better for all parties if we was to work him off? It would read uncommon well in the newspapers, it would indeed. The public would think a great deal more on us!"

Hugh, inferring what his companion meant, rather from his gestures than his technical mode of expressing himself (to which, as he was ignorant of his calling, he wanted the clue,) rejected this proposition for the second time, and gave the word "Forward!" which was echoed by a hundred voices from without.

"To the Warren!" shouted Dennis as he ran out, followed by the rest. "A witness's house, my lads!"

A loud yell followed, and the whole throng hurried off, mad for pillage and destruction. Hugh lingered behind him for a few moments to stimulate himself with more drink, and to set all the taps running, a few of which had accidentally been spared; then glancing round the despoiled and plundered room, through whose shattered window the rioters had thrust the Maypole itself,—for even that had been sawn down,—lighted a torch; clapped the mute and motionless John Willet on the back; and waving it above his head, and uttering a fierce shout, hastened after his companions.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-FIFTH.

John Willet, left alone in his dismantled bar, continued to sit staring about him; awake as to his eyes, certainly, but with all his powers of reason and reflection in a sound and dreamless sleep. He looked round upon the room which had been for years, and was within an hour ago, the pride of his heart; and not a muscle of his face was moved. The night without looked black and cold through the dreary gaps in the casement; the precious liquids, now nearly leaked away, dripped with a hollow sound upon the floor; the Maypole peered ruefully in through the broken window like the bowsprit of a wrecked ship; the ground might have been the bottom of the sea, it was so strewn with precious fragments. Currents of air rushed in as the old doors jarred and creaked upon their hinges; the candles flickered and guttered down, and made long winding-sheets; the cheery deep-red curtains flapped and fluttered idly in the road; even the stout Dutch kegs, overthrown and lying empty in dark corners, seemed the mere husks of good fellows whose jollity had departed, and who could kindle with a friendly glow no more. John saw this desolation, and yet saw it not. He was perfectly contented to sit there staring at it, and felt no more indignation or discomfort in his bonds than if they had been robes of honour. So far as he was personally concerned, old Time lay snoring, and the world stood still.

Save for the dripping from the barrels, the rustling of such light fragments of destruction as the wind effected, and the dull creaking of the open doors, all was profoundly quiet; indeed these sounds, like the ticking of the death-watch in the night, only made the silence they invaded deeper and more apparent. But quiet or noisy it was all one to John. If a train of heavy artillery could have come up and commenced ball-practice outside the window, it would have been all the same to him. He was a long way beyond surprise. A ghost couldn't have overtaken him.

By and by he heard a footstep—a hurried and yet cautious footstep—coming on towards the house. It stopped, advanced again, then seemed to go quite round it. Having done that, it came beneath the window, and a head looked in.

It was strongly relieved against the darkness outside by the glare of the guttering candles. A pale, worn, withered face; the eyes—but that was owing to its gaunt condition—unnaturally large and bright; the hair a grizzled black. It gave a searching glance all round the room, and a deep voice said:

"Are you alone in this house?"

John made no sign, though the question was repeated twice, and he heard it distinctly. After a moment's pause, the man got in at the window. John was not at all surprised at this either. There had been so much getting in and out of window in the course of the last hour or so, that he had quite forgotten the door, and seemed to have lived among such exercises from infancy.

The man wore a large dark faded cloak, and a slouched hat; he walked up close to John, and looked at him. John returned the compliment with interest.

"How long have you been sitting thus?" said the man.

John considered, but nothing came of it.

"Which way have the party gone?"

Some wandering speculations relative to the fashion of the stranger's boots got into Mr. Willet's mind by some accident or other, but they got out again in a hurry, and left him in his former state.

"You would do well to speak," said the man, "you may keep a whole skin though you have nothing else left that can be hurt. Which way have the party gone?"

"That!" said John, finding his voice all at once, and nodding with perfect good faith—he couldn't point he was so tightly bound—in exactly the opposite direction to the right one.

"You lie!" said the man angrily, and with a threatening gesture. "I came that way. You would betray me."

It was so evident that John's imperturbability was not assumed, but was the result of the late proceedings under his roof, that the man stayed his hand in the very act of striking him, and turned away.

John looked after him without so much as a twitch in a single nerve of his face. He seized a glass, and holding it under one of the little casks until a few drops were collected, drank them greedily off; then dashing it down on the floor impatiently, he took the vessel in his hands and drained it into his throat.—Some scraps of bread and meat were scattered about, and on these he fell next, eating them with great voracity, and pausing every now and then to listen for some fancied noise outside. When he had refreshed himself in this manner with violent haste, and raised another barrel to his lips, he pulled his hat upon his brow as though he were about to leave the house, and turned to John.

"Where are your servants?"

Mr. Willet indistinctly remembered to have heard the rioters calling to them to throw the key of the room in which they were out of the window for their keeping. He therefore replied, "Locked up."

"Well for them if they remain quiet, and well for you if you do the like," said the man. "Now show me the way the party went."

This time Mr. Willet indicated it correctly. The man was hurrying to the door, when suddenly there came towards them on the wind, the loud and rapid tolling of an alarm bell, and then a bright and vivid glare streamed up, which illumined, not only the whole chamber, but all the country.

It was not the sudden change from darkness to this dreadful light, it was not the sound of distant shrieks and shouts of triumph, it was not this dread invasion of the serenity and peace of night, that drove the man back as though a thunderbolt had struck him. It was the bell. If the ghastliest shape the human mind has ever pictured in its wildest dreams had risen up before him, he could not have staggered backward from its touch as he did from the first sound of that loud iron voice. With eyes that started from his head, his limbs convulsed, his face most horrible to see, he raised one arm high up into the air, and holding something visionary back and down with his other hand, drove at it as though he held a knife and stabbed it to the heart. He clutched his hair, and stopped his ears, and travelled madly round and round; then gave a frightful cry, and with it rushed away: still, still the bell tolled on and seemed to follow him—louder and louder, hotter and hotter yet. The glare grew brighter, the roar of voices deeper, the crash of heavy bodies falling shook the air, bright streams of sparks rose up into the sky; but louder than them all—rising faster far to Heaven—a million times more fierce and furious, pouring forth dreadful secrets after its long silence—speaking the language of the dead—the bell—the bell!

What hunt of spectres could surpass that dread pursuit and flight! Had there been a legion of them on his back, he could have better borne it. They would have had a beginning and an end, but here all space was full—the one pursuing voice was every where; it sounded in the earth, the air; shook the long grass, and howled among the trembling trees. The echoes caught it up, the owls hooted as it flew upon the breeze, the nightingale was silent and hid herself among the thickest boughs—it seemed to goad and urge the angry fire, and lash it into madness. Every thing was steeped in one prevailing red; the glow was every where; nature was drenched in blood; still the remorseless crying of that awful voice—the bell, the bell!

It ceased; but not in his ears. The knell was at his heart; no work of man had ever voice like that which sounded there, and warned him that it cried unceasingly to Heaven. Who could hear that bell and not know what it said! There was murder in its every note—cruel, relentless, savage murder—the murder of a confiding man by one who held his every trust. Its ringing summoned phantoms from their graves. What face was that, in which a friendly smile changed to a look of half incredulous horror, which stiffened for a moment into one of pain, then changed again into an imploring glance at Heaven, and so fell idly down with upturned eyes, like the dead stags he had often peeped at when a little child: shrinking and shuddering—there was a dreadful thing to think of now!—and clinging to an apron as he looked! He sank down upon the ground, and grovelling down as if he would dig himself a place to hide in, covered his face and ears, but no, no, no—a hundred walls and roofs of brass would not shut out that bell, for in it spoke the wrathful voice of God, and from that the whole wide universe could not afford a refuge!

While he rushed up and down not knowing where to turn, and while he lay crouching there, the work went briskly on indeed. When they left the Maypole, the rioters formed into a solid body, and advanced at a quick pace to the Warren. Rumour of their approach having gone before, they found the garden doors fast closed, the windows made secure, and the house profoundly dark: not a light being visible in any portion of the building. After some fruitless ringing at the bells, and beating at the iron gates, they drew off a few paces to reconnoitre, and confer upon the course it would be best to take.

Very little conference was needed, when all were bent upon one desperate purpose, infuriated with liquor, and flushed with successful riot. The word being given to surround the house, some climbed the gates, or dropped into the shallow trench and scaled the garden wall, while others pulled down the solid iron fence, and while they made a breach to enter by, made deadly weapons of the bars. The house being completely encircled, a small number of men were despatched to break open a tool shed in the garden, and during their absence on this errand, the remainder contented themselves with knocking violently at the doors, and calling to those within, to come down and open them on peril of their lives.

No answer being returned to this repeated summons, and the detachment who had been sent away, coming back with an accession of pick axes, spades, and hoes, they together with those who had such arms already, or carried (as many did) axes, poles, and crow bars, struggled into the foremost rank, ready to beset the doors and windows. They had not at this time more than a dozen lighted torches among them, but when these preparations were completed, flaming links were distributed and passed from hand to hand with such rapidity, that in a minute's time at least two-thirds of the whole roaring mass, bore, each man in his hand, a blazing brand. Whirling these about their heads they raised a loud shout, and fell to work upon the doors and windows.

Amidst the clattering of heavy blows, the rattling of broken glass, the cries and execrations of the mob, and all the din and turmoil of the scene, Hugh and his friends kept together at the turret door where Mr. Haredale had last admitted him and old John Willet; and spent their united force on that. It was a strong old oaken door, guarded by good bolts and a heavy bar, but it soon went crashing in upon the narrow stairs behind, and made, as it were, a platform to facilitate their tearing up into the rooms above. Almost at the same moment, a dozen other points were forced, and at every one the crowd poured in like water.

A few armed servant-men were posted in the hall, and when the rioters forced an entrance there, they fired some half-a-dozen shots. But these taking no effect, and the concourse coming on like an army of devils, they only thought of consulting their own safety, and retreated, echoing their assailants' cries, and hoping in the confusion to be taken for rioters themselves, in which stratagem they succeeded, with the exception of one old man who was never heard of again, and was said to have had his brains beaten out with an iron bar (one of his fellows reported that he had seen the old man fall) and to have been afterwards burnt in the flames.

The besiegers being now in complete possession of the house, spread themselves over it from garret to cellar, and plied their demon labours fiercely. While some small parties kindled bonfires underneath the windows, others broke up the furniture and cast the fragments down to feed the flames below; where the apertures in the wall (windows no longer) were large enough, they hurled out tables, chests of drawers, beds, mirrors, pictures, and flung them whole into the fire; while every fresh addition to the blazing masses was received with shouts, and howls, and yells, which added new and dismal terrors to the conflagration. Those who had axes and had spent their fury on the moveables, chopped and tore down the doors and window frames, broke up the flooring, hewed away the rafters, and buried men who lingered in the upper rooms, in heaps of ruins. Some searched the drawers, the chests, the boxes, writing-desks, and closets, for jewels, plate, and money; while others, less mindful of gain and more mad for destruction, cast their whole contents into the court-yard without examination, and called to those below to heap them on the blaze. Men who had been into the cellars, and had staved the casks, rushed to and fro stark mad, setting fire to all they saw—often to the dresses of their own friends—and kindling the building in so many parts that some had no time for escape, and were seen with drooping hands and blackened faces hanging senseless on the window sills, to which they had crawled, until they were sucked and drawn into the burning gulf. The more the fire crackled and raged, the wilder and more cruel the men grew; as though moving in that element they became fiends, and changed their earthly nature for the qualities that give delight in hell.

The burning pile revealing rooms and passages red hot, through gaps made in the crumbling walls; the tributary fires that licked the outer bricks and stones, with their long forked tongues, and ran up to meet the glowing mass within; the shining of the flames upon the villains who looked on and fed them; the roaring of the angry blaze, so bright and high that it seemed in its rapacity to have swallowed up the very smoke; the living flakes the wind bore rapidly away and hurried on with, like a storm of fiery snow; the noiseless breaking of great beams of wood which fell like feathers on the heaps of ashes, and crumbled in the very act to sparks and powder; the lurid tinge that overspread the sky; and the darkness, very deep by contrast, which prevailed around; the exposure to the coarse, common gaze, of every little nook which usages of home had made a sacred place, and the destruction by rude hands of every little household favourite which old associations made a dear and precious thing—all this taking place; not among pitying looks and friendly murmurs of compassion, but brutal shouts and exultations, which seemed to make the very rats who stood by the old house too long, creatures with some claim upon the pity and regard of those its roof had sheltered—combined to form a scene never to be forgotten by those who saw it, and were not actors in the work, so long as life endured.

And who were they? The alarm-bell rang—and it was pulled by no faint or hesitating hands—for a long time; but not a soul was seen. Some of the insurgents said that when it ceased they heard the shrieks of women, and saw some garments fluttering in the air, as a party of men bore away no unresisting burdens. No one could say that this was true or false, in such an uproar, but where was Hugh? who among them had seen him, since the forcing of the doors? The cry spread through the body—Where was Hugh?

"Here!" he hoarsely cried, appearing from the darkness; out of breath, and blackened with the smoke. "We have done all we can; the fire is burning itself out; and even the corners where it hasn't spread, are nothing but heaps of ruins. Disperse my lads, while the coast's clear; get back by different ways; and meet as usual!" With that he disappeared again,—contrary to his wont, for he was always first to advance, and last to go away—leaving them to follow homewards as they would.

It was not an easy task to draw off such a throng. If Bedlam gates had been flung open wide, there would not have issued forth such maniacs as the frenzy of that night had made. There were men there who danced and trampled on the beds of flowers as though they trod down human enemies; and wrenched them from the stalks, like savages who twisted human necks. There were men who rushed up to the fire and paddled in it with their hands as if in water; and others who were restrained by force from plunging in it to gratify their deadly longing. On the skull of one drunken lad—not twenty, by his looks—who lay upon the ground with a bottle to his mouth, the lead from the roof came streaming down in a shower of liquid fire, white hot—melting his head like wax. When the scattered parties were collected, men,—living yet, but singed as with hot irons, were plucked out of the cellars, and carried off upon the shoulders of others, who strove to wake them as they went along, with ribald jokes, and left them dead in the passages of hospitals. But of all the howling throng not one learnt mercy from, or sickened at these sights; nor was the fierce, besotted, senseless rage of one man glutted.

Slowly, and in small clusters, with hoarse hurrahs and repetitions of their usual cry, the assembly dropped away. The last few red-eyed stragglers reeled after those who had gone before; the distant noise of men calling to each other, and whistling for others whom they missed, grew fainter and fainter; at length even these sounds died away, and silence reigned alone.

Silence indeed! The glare of the flames had sunk into a fitful flashing light, and the gentle stars, invisible till now, looked down upon the blackening. A dull smoke hung upon the ruin, as though to hide it from those eyes of Heaven; and the wind forbore to move it. Bare walls, roof open to the sky—chambers where the beloved, lately dead, had many and many a fair day risen to new life and energy—where so many dear ones had been sad and merry; which were connected with so many thoughts and hopes, regrets and changes—all gone—nothing left but a dull and dreary blank—a smouldering heap of dust and ashes—the silence and solitude of utter desolation.

CHAPTER THE FIFTY-SIXTH.

The Maypole cronies, little dreaming of the change so soon to come upon their favourite haunt, struck through the forest path upon their way to London: and avoiding the main road which was hot and dusty, kept to the bye paths and the fields. As they drew nearer to their destination, they began to make enquiries of the people whom they passed, concerning the riots, and the truth or falsehood of the stories they had heard. The answers went far beyond any intelligence that had spread to quiet Chigwell. One man told them that that afternoon the Guards, conveying to Newgate some rioters who had been re-examined, had been set upon by the mob and compelled to retreat; another, that the houses of two witnesses near Clare Market were about to be pulled down when he came away; another, that Sir George Saville's house in Leicester Fields was to be burned that night, and that it would go hard with Sir George if he fell into the people's hands, as it was he who had brought in the Catholic bill. All accounts agreed, that the mob were out, in stronger numbers and more numerous parties than had yet appeared; that the streets were unsafe; that no man's house or life was worth an hour's purchase; that the public consternation was increasing every moment; and that many families had already fled the city. One fellow who wore the popular colour, damned them for not having cockades in their hats, and bade them set a good watch to-morrow night upon the prison doors, for the locks would have a straining; another asked if they were fire proof, that they walked abroad without the distinguishing mark of all good and true men; and a third who rode on horseback and was quite alone, ordered them to throw, each man a shilling, in his hat, towards the support of the rioters. Although they were afraid to refuse compliance with this demand, and were much alarmed by these reports, they agreed, having come so far, to go forward, and see the real state of things with their own eyes. So they pushed on quicker, as men do who are excited by portentous news, and ruminating on what they had heard, spoke little to each other.

It was now night, and as they came nearer to the city they had dismal confirmation of this intelligence in three great fires all close together, which burnt fiercely and were gloomily reflected in the sky. Arriving in the immediate suburbs, they found that almost every house had chalked upon its door in large characters "No Popery," that the shops were shut, and that alarm and anxiety were depicted in every face they passed.

Noting these things with a degree of apprehension which neither of the three cared to impart in its full extent to his companions, they came to a turnpike gate, which was shut. They were passing through the turnstile on the path, when a horseman rode up from London at a hard gallop, and called to the toll-keeper in a voice of great agitation, to open quickly in the name of God.

The adjuration was so earnest and vehement, that the man with a lantern in his hand came running out, toll-keeper though he was, and was about to throw the gate open, when happening to look behind him, he exclaimed, "Good Heaven what's that! another fire!"

At this, the three turned their heads, and saw in the distance straight in the direction whence they had come, a broad sheet of flame, casting a threatening light upon the clouds, which glimmered as though the conflagration were behind them, and showed like a wrathful sunset.

"My mind misgives me," said the horseman, "that I know from what far building those flames come. Don't stand aghast my good fellow, open the gate!"

"Sir," cried the man, laying his hand upon his horse's bridle as he let him through. "I know you now sir, be advised by me—do not go on. I saw them pass and know what kind of men they are. You will be murdered."

"So be it!" said the horseman, looking intently towards the fire, and not at him who spoke.

"But sir—sir," cried the man, grasping at his rein more tightly yet, "if you do go on, wear the blue riband. Here sir," he added, taking one from his own hat, and speaking so earnestly that the tears stood in his eyes, "It's necessity not choice, that makes me wear it,—it's love of life and home sir. Wear it for this one night sir; only for this one night."

"Do!" cried the three friends pressing round his horse. "Mr. Haredale—worthy sir—good gentleman—pray be persuaded."

"Who's that!" cried Mr. Haredale stooping down to look, "Did I hear Daisy's voice!"

"You did sir," cried the little man, "Do be persuaded sir. This gentleman says very true. Your life may hang upon it."

"Are you," said Mr. Haredale abruptly, "afraid to come with me?"

"I sir!—N-n-no."

"Put that riband in your hat. If we meet the rioters, swear that I took you prisoner for wearing it. I will tell them so with my own lips; for as I hope for mercy when I die, I will take no quarter from them, nor shall they have quarter from me, if we come hand to hand to-night. Up here—behind me—quick! Clasp me tight round the body, and fear nothing."

In an instant they were riding away at full gallop, in a dense cloud of dust and speeding on like hunters in a dream.

It was well the good horse knew the road he traversed, for never once, no never once in all the journey, did Mr. Haredale cast his eyes upon the ground, or turn them for an instant, from the light towards which they sped so madly. Once he said in a low voice, "It is my house," but that was the only time he spoke. When they came to dark and doubtful places, he never forgot to put his hand upon the little man to hold him more securely on his seat, but he kept head erect and his eyes fixed on the fire, then, and always.

The road was dangerous enough, for they went the nearest way—headlong—far from the highway,—by lonely lanes and paths, where wagon wheels had worn deep ruts; where hedge and ditch hemmed in the narrow strip of ground; and tall trees arching overhead, made it profoundly dark. But on, on, on, with neither stop nor stumble, till they reached the Maypole door, and could plainly see that the fire began to fade, as if for want of fuel.

"Down for one moment—for but one moment," said Mr. Haredale, helping Daisy to the ground, and following himself, "Willet—Willet where are my niece and servants—Willet!"

Crying out to him distractedly, he rushed into the bar. The landlord bound and fastened to his chair; the place dismantled, stripped, and pulled about his ears;—nobody could have taken shelter here.

He was a strong man, accustomed to restrain himself, and suppress his strong emotions; but this preparation for what was to follow—though he had seen that fire burning, and knew that his house must be razed to the ground—was more than he could bear. He covered his face with his hands for a moment, and turned away his head.

"Johnny, Johnny," said Solomon—and the simple-hearted fellow cried outright, and wrung his hands. "Oh dear, old Johnny, here's a change! That the Maypole bar should come to this, and we should live to see it! The old Warren too, Johnny—Mr. Haredale—oh, Johnny, what a piteous sight this is!"

Pointing to Mr. Haredale as he said these words, little Solomon Daisy put his elbows on the back of Mr. Willet's chair, and fairly blubbered on his shoulder.

While Solomon was speaking, old John sat, mute as a stock-fish, staring at him with an unearthly glare, and displaying, by every possible symptom, entire and most comple unconsciousness. But when Solomon was silent again, John followed with his great round eyes the direction of his look, and did appear to have some dawning, distant notion that somebody had come to see him.

"You know us, don't you, Johnny?" said the little clerk, rapping himself on the breast, "Daisy you know—Chigwell Church—bell-ringer—little desk on Sundays—eh, Johnny?"

Mr. Willet reflected for a few moments, and then muttered, as it were, mechanically: "Let us sing to the praise and glory of—"

"Yes, to be sure," cried the little man, hastily; "that's it—that's me, Johnny. You're all right now, an't you? Say you're all right, Johnny."

"All right?" pondered Mr. Willet, as if that were a matter entirely between himself and his conscience. "All right? Ah?"

"They haven't been misusing you with sticks, or pokers, or any other blunt instruments, have they, Johnny?" asked Solomon, with a very anxious glance at Mr. Willet's head. "They didn't beat you, did they?"

John knitted his brow; looked downwards, as if mentally engaged in some arithmetical calculation; then upwards, as if the total wouldn't come at his call; then at Solomon Daisy, from his eyebrow to his shoe-buckle; then very slowly round the bar; and then a great, round, leaden-looking, and not-at-all-transparent tear came rolling out of each eye, and he said, as he shook his head:

"If they'd only had the goodness to murder me, I'd have thanked 'em kindly."

"No, no, don't say that Johnny," whimpered his little friend. "It's very—very bad, but not quite so bad as that. No, no!"

"Lookee here, sir!" cried John, turning his rueful eyes on Mr. Haredale, who had dropped on one knee, and was hastily beginning to untie his bonds. "Lookee here, sir! The very Maypole—the old dumb Maypole—stares in at the winder, as if it said, 'John Willet, John Willet, let's go and pitch ourselves in the nighest pool of water as is deep enough to hold us; for our day is over!'"

"Don't, Johnny, don't," cried his friend: no less affected by this mournful effort of Mr. Willet's imagination, than by the sepulchral tone in which he had spoken for the Maypole. "Please don't, Johnny!"

"Your loss is great, and your misfortune a heavy one," said Mr. Haredale, looking restlessly towards the door: "and this is not a time to comfort you. If it were, I am in no condition to do so. Before I leave you, tell me one thing, and try to tell me truly and plainly, I implore you. Have you seen or heard of Emma?"

"No!" said Mr. Willet.

"Nor any one, but these blood-hounds?"

"No!"

"They rode away, I trust in Heaven, before these dreadful scenes began," said Mr. Haredale, who, between his agitation, his eagerness to mount his horse again, and the dexterity with which the cords were tied, had scarcely yet undone one knot. "A knife, Daisy."

"You didn't," said John, looking about, as though he had lost his pocket-handkerchief, or some such slight article—"either of you, gentlemen—see a—a coffin any wheres, did you?"

"Willet!" cried Mr. Haredale. Solomon dropped the knife, and instantly becoming limp from head to foot, exclaimed "Good gracious!"

"—Because," said John, not at all regarding them, "a dead man called a little time ago, on his way yonder. I could have told you what name was on the plate, if he had brought his coffin with him, and left it behind. If he didn't, it don't signify."

His landlord, who had listened to these words with breathless attention, started that moment to his feet; and, without a word, drew Solomon Daisy to the door, mounted his horse, took him up behind again, and flew rather than galloped towards the pile of ruins, which that day's sun had shone upon, a stately house. Mr. Willet stared after them, listened, looked down upon himself, to make quite sure that he was still unbound, and without any manifestation of impatience, disappointment, or surprise, gently relapsed into the condition from which he had so imperfectly recovered.

Mr. Haredale tied his horse to the trunk of a tree, and grasping his companion's arm, stole softly along the footpath, and into what had been the garden of his house. He stopped for an instant to look upon its smoking walls, and at the stars that shone through roof and floor upon the heap of crumbling ashes. Solomon glanced timidly in his face, but his lips were tightly pressed together, a resolute and stern expression sat upon his brow, and not a tear, a look, or gesture indicating grief escaped him.

He drew his sword; felt for a moment in his breast, as though he carried other arms about him; then grasping Solomon by the wrist again, went with a cautious step all round the house. He looked into every door-way and gap in the wall; retraced his steps at every rustling of the air among the leaves; and searched in every shadowed nook with outstretched hands. Thus they made the circuit of the building: but they returned to the spot from which they had set out, without encountering any human being, or finding the least trace of any concealed straggler.

After a short pause, Mr. Haredale shouted twice or thrice; then cried aloud, "Is there any one in hiding here, who knows my voice? There is nothing to fear now. If any of my people are near, I entreat them to answer!" He called them all by name; his voice was echoed in many mournful tones; then all was silent as before.

They were standing near the foot of the turret, where the alarm-bell hung. The fire had raged there, and the floors had been sawn, and hewn, and beaten down, besides. It was open to the night; but a part of the staircase still remained, winding upwards from a great mound of dust and cinders. Fragments of the jagged and broken steps offered an insecure and giddy footing here and there, and then were lost again behind protruding angles of the wall, or in the deep shadows cast upon it by other portions of the ruin; for by this time the moon had risen, and shone brightly.

As they stood here, listening to the echoes as they died away, and hoping in vain to hear a voice they knew, some of the ashes in this turret slipped and rolled down. Startled by the least noise in that melancholy place, Solomon looked up at his companion's face, and saw that he had turned towards the spot, and that he watched and listened keenly.

He covered the little man's mouth with his hand, and looked again. Instantly, with kindling eyes, he bade him on his life keep still, and neither speak nor move. Then holding his breath and stooping down, he stole into the turret, with his drawn sword in his hand, and disappeared.

Terrified to be left there by himself, under such desolate circumstances, and after all he had seen and heard that night, Solomon would have followed; but there had been something in Mr. Haredale's manner and his look, the recollection of which held him spell-bound. He stood rooted to the spot, and scarcely venturing to breathe, looked up with mingled fear and wonder.

Again the ashes slipped and rolled—very, very softly—again—and then again, as though they crumbled underneath the tread of a stealthy foot. And now a figure was dimly visible, climbing very softly, and often stopping to look down: now it pursued its difficult way, and now it was hidden from the view again.

It emerged once more into the shadowy and uncertain light—higher now, but not much, for the way was steep and toilsome, and its progress very slow. What phantom of the brain did he pursue? and why did he look down so constantly? He knew he was alone. Surely his mind was not affected by that night's loss and agony. He was not about to throw himself headlong from the summit of the tottering wall. Solomon turned sick, and clasped his hands. His limbs trembled beneath him, and a cold sweat broke out upon his pallid face.

If he complied with Mr. Haredale's last injunction now, it was because he had not the power to speak or move. He strained his gaze, and fixed it on a patch of moonlight, into which, if he continued to ascend, he must soon emerge. When he appeared there, he would try to call to him.

Again the ashes slipped and crumbled; some stones rolled down, and fell with a dull heavy sound upon the ground below. He kept his eyes upon the piece of moonlight. The figure was coming on, for its shadow was already thrown upon the wall. Now it appeared—and now looked round at him—and now—

The horror-stricken clerk uttered a scream that pierced the air, and cried, "The ghost again! The ghost!"

Long before the echo of that cry had died away, another form rushed out into the light, flung itself upon the foremost one, knelt down upon its breast, and clutched its throat with both hands.

"Villain!" cried Mr. Haredale, in a terrible voice—for it was he. "Dead and buried, as all men supposed, through your infernal arts, but reserved by Heaven for this. At last—at last—I have you. You, whose hands are red with my brother's blood, and that of his faithful servant, shed to conceal your own atrocious guilt. You, Rudge, double murderer and monster, I arrest you in the name of God, who has delivered you into my hands. Nay, though you had the strength of twenty men," he added, as he writhed and struggled, "you could not escape me, or loosen my grasp to-night."

THE MATE'S LAMENT.

I'm thirty four,—a trifle more,—
  Mate of the "Lower Deck;"
And there, mid scrubs and washing-tubs,
  I'm buried to the neck.

On Afric's coast I've had my roast,
  In craft of every rate;
Mid slaves and knaves, and waves and graves,
  I've serv'd too long a Mate.

What more annoys—I've seen mere boys,
  Whom oft I've cobb'd for jaw,
In a few years mount o'er my ears,
  Commanding ships of war.

Of course Lord Minto oft looks into
  Your news of sea and state;
These lines he'll note, and then promote "An old deserving Mate."

POPULATION OF PARIS.

DURING the first six months of the present year there were born in Paris 10,500 legitimate children; 4,735 illegitimate children; the lifeless bodies of 150 persons were deposited at the Morgue; there were 4,400 marriages celebrated; and 12,660 individuals had paid the debt of nature.

SKETCH OF COLONEL CROCKETT.

"Among the slain there was one who, surrounded by a heap of the fallen enemy, displayed, even in death, the freshness of the hunter's aspect, and whose eccentricities, real or reputed, have familiarised England with his name—David Crockett of Tennessee, a charactor such as could only have been produced and perfected within the limits of his own country.

"The whole man, physical and mental, was of frontier growth. His playthings from infancy were the axe and the rifle. Few among his youthful companions displayed more activity and strength; none aimed his piece with a steadier hand or truer eye. In the metaphorical eulogy of the western woodsmen, he was more than 'a horse,'—he was a 'steamboat.' During the war of 1812, David took up arms for his country, and fought bravely, though no admirer of parade or drill. After the war he turned to industrious pursuits, and was a successful hunter and thriving planter. Hospitality kept cheerful watch at his door, and the wayfarer was ever welcome to a plentiful meal, and a glass of 'old Monongahela.'

"The ambition to be politically distinguished, which prevails wherever free institutions are established, is, perhaps, a more active passion in new states than in old. Crockett did not escape the general mania for public life. His conscience told him that he was an honest man, and rumour and the newspapers strangely lied if there were many of the same stamp in the great house at Washington. Reforms were wanting—there was no question of that—but means were essential to an end, and sound reforms demanded clean-handed legislators. David felt that he had a call. He had mastered the 'varmint' of the woods—'coon,' bear, and panther—and why should he not 'use up' the prowlers that preyed upon the commonwealth?—The great Tennessee hunter determined to 'run for Congress."

"The stump of a tree is frequently the rostrum of a western orator; hence the name of 'stump-speeches' has been given in the states to those morsels of eloquence which are seasoned and sauced exclusively for the popular palate. Possessed of robust health and powerful lungs, backed by never-faltering perseverance, Crockett was a giant on the stump. If poor in classical lore, he was affluent in the figures and phraseology of life in the West. After a long and arduous struggle, he was chosen a member of Congress for Tennessee.

"His career as a patriotic legislator disappointed his hopes, and fell far short of his electioneering promises. When he entered Congress he imagined that his prowess as a hunter and a wrestler would inspire his opponents with awe, and enable him to shoulder the state wagon out of the ruts by a few prompt and dexterous heaves; but he found difficulties at Washington which he never contemplated when an aspirant for representative honours. The first thing, he said, that 'bothered' him were the Congressional rules and orders, and 'what those rascally things were made for he could not reckon, for they did no good.' If he happened to damage these rules and orders, and then got in a 'fair track,' his tongue did not wag so glibly as it used to do on the stump, and he frequently found himself short of breath and his knees weak when he attempted to harangue the House. He could not understand this, but he found it was so day after day. He often looked round to see if there were any man bigger and stronger than himself to produce this quaking, for, until then, none but a stronger man than himself could shake his nerve. His visions of reform, one after another, vanished, for he could not make the members listen to his reasoning. He began to suspect that he had different work to do than when he used to go 'a gunning.' Often as he might hit a political wild cat, the 'crittur' held out, as if it had nine times the nine lives attributed to grimalkin.

"Many an odd saying and grotesque story was fathered on 'Colonel Crockett,' whose raciness of speech and manners was, however, spoiled by mixing in political society. He lost the wild originality of frontier, without acquiring the polish or sprightliness of city life. Still, Washington had its attractions, and he was anxious to retain his place in the legislature; but he must have his own way, and would not submit to be trammelled; the consequence of which was that his constituents chose a more pliable candidate. This was a heavy blow to David, who had been for years a 'lion,' and to whom excitement of some kind was indispensable. Disgusted with politics and irritated by public ingratitude, military renown acquired fresh attractions in his eyes. At this time Texas had raised the standard of resistance against military usurpation. To the cause of Texan liberty he resolved to devote himself, and, shouldering his rifle, he started for the Sabine, and arrived at Nacogdoches, accompanied by several volunteers, in the commencement of the war."—Kennedy's Texas.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS ON THE GANGES.

Every thing is strange to him: groves of palm-trees meet his eye on every hand; he sees the footprints of the tiger upon the mud deposited by the last high tide; jackals meet him on his walk, and hardly move out of his track; and monkies mimic the cries of dying innocence in the adjoining copse: he sees the alligator basking upon the sand-bank like a log of wood; vultures and adjutants flapping each other with their wings as they float by him rafted on a dead Hindo; vampire-bats skim silently through the evening air in search of prey; fire-flies glimmer and gyrate among the blossom-laden forest trees; his ear is assailed and stunned by the noise, the buzz, and hum, and hiss, and clatter of ten thousand insects. The native tomtom sounds from the bazaar of a neighbouring village. The houses are mere wigwams, shrouded in most luxuriant vegetation. The people are almost naked, or clothed in muslin robes, with silver rings upon their ankles and their arms, their fingers and their toes, and golden ornaments in their ears and their noses. He is agreeably surprised to find them so fair; and more so to find them more handsome and with more regular and finer turned features than his own countrymen; graceful in their gait, easy and polite in their manners, and in their intercourse highly polished and civilised; speaking an unknown language, and yet making themselves understood; kneeling in prayer along the highways, regardless of the turmoil around them, or pouring out libations into the sacred stream.—Dr. M'Cosh.

CHAPTER CII.—Ciudad Rodrigo.

While such were the scenes passing round me, of my own part in them I absolutely knew nothing; for, until the moment that the glancing bayonets of the light division came rushing on the foe, and the loud, long cheer of victory burst above us, I felt like one in a trance. Then I leaned against an angle of the rampart, overpowered and exhausted; a bayonet wound, which some soldier of our own ranks had given me when mounting the breach, pained me somewhat; my uniform was actually torn to rags; my head bare; of my sword, the hilt and four inches of the blade alone remained, while my left hand firmly grasped the rammer of a cannon, but why or wherefore I could not even guess. As thus I stood, the unceasing tide of soldiery pressed on; fresh divisions came pouring in, eager for plunder, and thirsting for the spoil. The dead and the dying were alike trampled beneath the feet of that remorseless mass, who, actuated by vengeance and by rapine, sprang fiercely up the breach.

Weak and exhausted, faint from my wound, and overcome by my exertions, I sank among the crumbling ruin. The loud shouts which arose from the town, mingled with cries and screams, told the work of pillage was begun; while still a dropping musketry could be heard on the distant rampart, where even yet the French made resistance. At last even this was hushed, but to it succeeded the far more horrifying sounds of rapine and of murder; the forked flames of burning houses rose here and there amid the black darkness of the night; and through the crackling of the timbers, and the falling crash of roofs, the heart-rending shriek of agony rent the very air. Officers pressed forward, but in vain were their efforts to restrain their men: the savage cruelty of the moment knew no bounds of restraint. More than one gallant fellow perished in his fruitless endeavour to enforce obedience; and the most awful denunciations were now uttered against those whom at any other time they dared not mutter before.

Thus passed the long night: far more terrible to me than all the dangers of the storm itself, with all its death and destruction-dealing around it. I know not if I slept; if so, the horrors on every side were pictured in my dreams; and, when the gray dawn was breaking, the cries from the doomed city were still ringing in my ears. Close around me the scene was still and silent; the wounded had been removed during the night, but the thickly-packed dead lay side by side where they fell. It was a fearful sight to see them, as, blood-stained and naked (for already the camp-followers had stripped the bodies) they covered the entire breach. From the rampart to the ditch, the ranks lay where they had stood in life: a faint phosphoric flame flickered above their ghastly corses, making even death still more horrible. I was gazing steadfastly, with all that stupid intensity which imperfect senses and exhausted faculties possess, when the sounds of voices near aroused me.

"Bring him along: this way, Bob. Over the breach with the scoundrel, into the fosse."

"He shall die no soldier's death, by heaven!" cried another and a deeper voice, "if I lay his skull open with my axe."

"O mercy, mercy! as you hope for"—

"Traitor! don't dare to mutter here!" As the last words were spoken, four infantry soldiers, reeling from drunkenness, dragged forward a pale and haggard wretch, whose limbs trailed behind him like those of palsy; his uniform was that of a French chasseur, but his voice bespoke him English.

"Kneel down there, and die like a man! You were one, once!"

"Not so, Bill: never. Fix bayonets, boys! That's right! Now take the word from me."

"Oh forgive me! for the love of heaven forgive me!" screamed the voice of the victim; but his last accents ended in a death-cry, for, as he spoke, the bayonets flashed for an instant in the air, and the next were plunged into his body. Twice I had essayed to speak, but my voice, hoarse from shouting, came not; and I could but look upon this terrible murder with staring eyes and burning brain. At last, speech came, as if wrest by the very excess of my agony, and I muttered aloud, "O God!" The words were not well spoken, when the muskets were brought to the shoulders, and, reeking with the blood of the murdered man, their savage faces scowled at me as I lay.

A short and heartfelt prayer burst from my lips, and I was still. The leader of the party called out, "Be steady! and together. One, two! Ground arms, boys! Ground arms!" roared he in a voice of thunder; "it's the captain himself." Down went the muskets with a crash; while, springing toward me, the fellows caught me in their arms, and with one jerk mounted me upon their shoulders—the cheer that accompanied the sudden movement seeming like the yell of maniacs. "Ha, ha, ha! we have him now," sang their wild voices: as, with blood-stained hands and infuriated features, they bore me down the rampart. My sensations of disgust and repugnance to the party seemed at once to have evidenced themselves, for the corporal, turning abruptly round, called out:

"Don't pity him, captain; the scoundrel was a deserter; he escaped from the picket two nights ago, and brought information of all our plans to the enemy."

"Ay," cried another, "and what's worse, he fired through an embrasure near the breach, for two hours, upon his own regiment. It was there we found him: this way, lads."

So saying, they turned short from the walls, and dashed down a dark and narrow lane, into the town. My struggles to get free were perfectly ineffectual, and to my entreaties they were totally indifferent.

In this way, therefore, we made our way into the Plaza, where some hundred soldiers, of different regiments, were bivouacked. A shout of recognition welcomed the fellows as they came; while, suddenly a party of eighty-eight men, springing from the ground, rushed forward with drawn bayonets, calling out, "Give him up, this minute, or by the Father of Moses! we'll make short work of ye."

The order was made by men who seemed well disposed to execute it; and I was accordingly grounded with a shock and a rapidity that savoured much more of ready compliance than any respect for my individual comfort. A roar of laughter rang through the motley mass, and every powder-stained face around me seemed convulsed with merriment. As I sat passively upon the ground, looking ruefully about.

whether my gestures or my words increased the absurdity of my appearance, it is hard to say; but certainly the laughter increased at each moment, and the drunken wretches danced around me in ecstasy.

"Where is your major? Major O'Shaughnessy, lads," said I.

"He's in the church, with the general, your honour," said the sergeant of the regiment; upon whom the mention of his officer's name seemed at once to have a sobering influence. Assisting me rise, (for I was weak as a child,) he led me through the dense crowd, who, such is the influence of example, now formed into line, and, as well as their state permitted, gave me a military salute as I passed.

"Follow me, sir," said the sergeant; "this little dark street to the left will take us to the private door of the chapel."

"Wherefore are they there, sergeant?"

"There's a general of division mortally wounded."

"You did not hear his name?"

"No, sir. All I know is, he was one of the storming party at the lesser breach."

A cold, sickening shudder came over me; I dare not ask further, but pressed on, with anxious steps, toward the chapel.

"There, sir; yonder where you see that light; that's the door."

So saying, the sergeant stopped suddenly and placed his hand to his cap. I saw at once that he was sufficiently aware of his condition, not to desire to appear before his officers; so, hurriedly thanking him, I walked forward.

"Halt there! and give the countersign," cried a sentinel who, with fixed bayonet, stood before the door.

"I am an officer," said I, endeavouring to pass in.

"Stand back; stand back," said the harsh voice of the Highlander, for such he was.

"Is Major O'Shaughnessy in the church?"

"I dinna ken," was the short, rough answer.

"Who is the officer so badly wounded?"

"I dinna ken," repeated he, as gruffly as before; while he added in a louder key, "Stand back, I tell ye, mun: dinna ye see the staff coming!"

I turned round hastily, and at the same instant several officers, who apparently from precaution had dismounted at the end of the street, were seen approaching. They came hurriedly forward, but without speaking. He who was in advance of the party wore a short, blue cape, over an undress uniform: the rest were in full regimentals. I had scarcely time to throw a passing glance upon him, when the officer I have mentioned as coming first called out, in a stern voice,—

"Who are you, sir?"

I started at the sounds: it was not the first time those accents had been heard by me.

"Captain O'Malley, Fourteenth Light Dragoons."

"What brings you here, sir? Your regiment is at———"

"I have been employed as acting aid-de-camp to General Crawford," said I, hesitatingly.

"Is that your staff uniform?" said he, as with compressed brow and stern look he fixed his eyes upon my coat. Before I had time to reply, or indeed before I well knew how to do so, a gruff voice, from behind, called out:

"Damn me! if that ain't the fellow that led the stormers through a broken embrasure. I say, my lord, that's the yeoman I was telling you of. Is it not so, sir?" continued he, turning toward me.

"Yes, sir; I led a party of the eighty-eighth at the breach."

"And devilish well you did it, too!" added Picton, for it was he who recognised me. "I saw him, my lord, spring down from the parapet upon a French gunner, and break his sword as he cleft his helmet in two. Yes, yes; I shall not forget in a hurry, how you laid about you with the rammer of the gun: by Jove that's it he has in his hand."

While Picton ran thus hurriedly on, Lord Wellington's calm but stern features never changed their expression. The looks of those around were bent upon me with interest, and even admiration; but his evinced nothing of either.

Reverting at once to my absence from my post, he asked me—

"Did you obtain leave for a particular service, sir?"

"No, my lord. It was simply from an accidental circumstance, that"———

"Then, report yourself at your quarters as under arrest."

"But, my lord," said Picton. Lord Wellington waited not for the explanation, but walked firmly forward, and strode into the church. The staff followed in silence, Picton turning one look of kindness on me as he went, as though to say, "I'll not forget you."

"The devil take it," cried I, as I found myself once more alone, "but I am unlucky. What would turn out with other men the very basis of their fortune, is ever with me the source of ill luck."

It was evident, from Picton's account, that I had distinguished myself in the breach; and yet nothing was more clear than that my conduct had displeased the commander-in-chief. Picturing him ever to my mind's eye as the beau ideal of a military leader, by some fatality of fortune I was continually incurring his displeasure, for whose praise I would have risked my life. And this confounded costume—what, in the name of every absurdity, could ever have persuaded me to put it on? What signifies it, though a man should cover himself with glory, if in the end he is to be laughed at! Well, well! it matters not much, now my soldiering's over. And yet I could have wished that the last act of my campaigning had brought with it pleasanter recollections."

"As thus I ruminated, the click of the soldier's musket near, aroused me: Picton was passing out. A shade of gloom and desperation was visible upon his features, and his lip trembled as he muttered some sentences to himself.

"Ha! Captain ——— I forgot the name. Yes—Captain O'Malley, you are released from arrest. General Crawford has spoken very well of you, and Lord Wellington has heard the circumstances of your case."

"Is it General Crawford, then, that is wounded?" said I, eagerly.

Picton paused for a moment, while, with an effort, he controlled his features into their stern and impassive expression, he then added hurriedly, and almost harshly—

"Yes, sir; badly wounded; through the arm, and in the lung. He mentioned you to the notice of the commander-in-chief, and your application for leave is granted; in fact, you are to have the distinguished honour of carrying back despatches. There, now; you had better join your brigade."

"Could I not see my general once more? It may be for the last time."

"No, sir," sternly replied Picton. "Lord Wellington believes you under arrest. It is as well he should suppose you obeyed his orders."

There was a tone of sarcasm in these words that prevented my reply; and, muttering my gratitude for his well-timed and kindly interference in my behalf, I bowed deeply, and turned away.

"I say, sir," said Picton, as he returned toward the church, "should any thing befall——that is, if, unfortunately, circumstances should make you in want and desirous of a staff appointment, remember that you are known to General Picton."

Downcast and depressed, by the news of my poor general, I wended my way, with slow and uncertain steps, toward the rampart. A cold, wintry sky, and a sharp, bracing air, made my wound, slight as it was, more painful, and I endeavored to reach the reserves, where I knew the hospital-staff had established, for the present, their quarters. I had not gone far when, from a marauding party, I learned that my man, Mike, was in search of me through the plain. A report of my death had reached him, and the poor fellow was half distracted.

Longing anxiously to allay his fears on my account, which I well knew might lead him into any act of folly or insanity, I pressed forward; beside, shall I confess it, that amid the manifold thoughts of sorrow and affliction which weighed me down, I could not divest myself of the feeling, that so long as I wore my present absurd costume, I could be nothing but an object of laughter and ridicule to all who met me.

I had not long to look for my worthy follower, for I soon beheld him cantering about the plain. A loud shout brought him beside me; and truly the poor fellow's delight was great and sincere. With a thousand protestations of his satisfaction, and reiterated assurances of what he would not have done to the French prisoners, if any thing had happened to me, we took our way together toward the camp.

CHAPTER CIV.—The Despatch.

I was preparing to visit the town on the following morning, when my attention was attracted by a dialogue which took place beneath my window.

"I say, my good friend," cried a mounted orderly to Mike, who was busily employed in brushing a jacket; "I say, are you Captain O'Malley's man?"

"The least taste in life o' that same," replied he, with a half jocular expression.

"Well then," said the other, "take up these letters to your master. Be alive, my fine fellow, for they are despatches, and I must have a written return for them."

"Won't ye get off, and take a drop of somethin' refreshing; the air is cowld this morning."

"I can't stay, my good friend, but thank you all the same; so be alive, will you?"

"Arrah! there's no hurry in life. Sure it's an invitation to dinner to Lord Wellington, or a tea-party at Sir Denny's; sure my master's bothered with them every day o' th' week; that's the misfortune of being an agreeable creature; and I'd be led into dissipation myself, if I wasn't raal prudent."

"Well, come along, take these letters, for I must be off; my time is short."

"That's more nor your nose is, honey," said Mike, evidently piqued at the little effort his advances had produced upon the Englishman. "Give them here," continued he, while he turned the various papers in every direction, affecting to read their addresses.

"There's nothing for me here, I see. Did none o' the generals ask after me?"

"You are a queer one," said the dragoon, not a little puzzled what to make of him.

Mike meanwhile thrust the papers carelessly into his pocket, and strode into the house, whistling a quick step as he went, with the air of a man perfectly devoid of care or occupation. The next moment, however, he appeared at my door, wiping his forehead with the back of his hand, and apparently breathless with haste.

"Despatches, Misther Charles—Despatches from Lord Wellington. The orderly is waiting below for a return."

"Tell him he shall have it in one moment," replied I; "and now bring me a light."

Before I had broken the seal of the envelope, Mike was once more at the porch.

"My masther is writing a few lines to say he'll do it. Don't be talking of it," added he, dropping his voice; "but they want him to take another fortress."

What turn the dialogue subsequently took, I cannot say, for I was entirely occupied by a letter which accompanied the despatches; it ran as follows:

"Dear Sir,—The commander-in-chief has been kind enough to accord you the leave of absence you applied for, and takes the opportunity of your return to England, to send you the accompanying letters for his Royal Highness the Duke of York. To his approval of your conduct in the assault of last night, you owe this distinguished mark of Lord Wellington's favor, which I hope will be duly appreciated by you, and serve to increase your zeal for that service in which you have already distinguished yourself.

"Believe me that I am most happy in being made the medium of this communication, and have the honour to be Very truly, yours,

"Quarter-General. PICTON.

"Ciudad Rodrigo, Jan. 1812."

I read and re-read this note again and again.—Every line was conned over by me, and every phrase weighed and balanced in my mind. Nothing could be more gratifying, nothing more satisfactory to my feelings, and I would not have exchanged its possession for the brevet of a lieutenant-colonel.

"Halloo, orderly," cried I from the window, as I hurriedly sealed my few words of acknowledgment, "take this note back to General Picton, and here's a guinea for yourself." So saying I pitched into his ready hand one of the very few which remained to me in the world. "This is indeed good news," said I to myself; "this is indeed a moment of unmixed happiness."

As I closed the window, I could hear Mike pronouncing a glowing eulogium upon my liberality, from which he could not, however, help in some degree detracting, as he added, "But the devil thank him after all; sure it's himself has the illigant fortune and the fine place of it."

Scarcely were the last sounds of the retiring horseman dying away in the distance, when Mike's meditations took another form, and he muttered between his teeth—"Oh! holy Agatha! a guinea, a raal guinea to a thief of a dragoon that come with the letter, and here am I wearing a picture of the holy family for a back to my waistcoat, all out of economy; and sure, God knows, but maybe they'll take their dealing trick out of me in purgatory for this hereafter; and faith, it's a beautiful pair of breeches I'd have had, if I wasn't ashamed to put the twelve disciples on my legs."

While Mike ran on at this rate, my eyes fell upon a few lines of postscript in Picton's letter, which I had not previously noticed.

"The official despatches of the storming are of course intrusted to senior officers, but I need scarcely remind you, that it will be a polite and a proper attention to his Royal Highness, to present your letters with as little delay as possible. Not a moment is to be lost on your landing in England."

"Mike," cried I, "how look the cattle for a journey?"

"The chestnut is a little low in flesh, but in great wind, your honor; and the black mare is jumping like a filly."

"And Badger?" said I.

"Howld him, if you can, that's all; but it's murthering work this, carrying despatches day after day."

"This time, however, Mike, we must not grumble."

"Maybe it isn't far."

"Why, as to that, I shall not promise much. I'm bound for England, Mickey."

"For England!"

"Yes, Mike, and for Ireland."

"For Ireland! Whoop!" shouted he, as he shied his cap into one corner of the room, the jacket he was brushing into the other, and began dancing round the table with no bad imitation of an Indian war dance.

"How I'll dance like a fairy
To see ould Dunleary,
And think twice ere I leave it, to be a dragoon."

"Oh! blessed hour! isn't it beautiful to think of the illuminations, and dinners, and speeches, and shaking of hands, huzzaing, and hip, hipping. Maybe there won't be pictures of us in all the shops—Misther Charles and his man Misther Free. Maybe they won't make plays out of us; myself dressed in the gray coat with the red cuffs, the cords, the tops, and the Caroline hat a little cocked, with the phiz in the side of it." Here he made a sign with his expanded fingers to represent a cockade, which he designated by this word. "I think I see myself dining with the Corporation, and the Lord Mayor of Dublin getting up to propose the health of the hero of El Boden, Misther Free! and three times three, hurrah! hurrah! hurrah! Musha, but its dry I am gettin' with the thoughts of the punch and the poteen negus."

"If you go on at this rate, we're not likely to be soon at our journey's end; so be alive now, pack up my kit; I shall start by twelve o'clock."

With one spring Mike cleared the stairs, and, overthrowing every thing and every body in his way, hurried toward the stable, chanting at the top of his voice the very poetical strain he had indulged me with a few minutes before.

My preparations were rapidly made: a hurried few lines of leavetaking to the good fellows I had lived so much with and felt so strongly attached to, with a firm assurance that I should join them again ere long, was all that my time permitted. To Power I wrote more at length, detailing the circumstances which my own letters informed me of, and also those which invited me to return home. This done, I lost not another moment, but set out upon my journey.

CHAPTER CV.—The Leave.

After an hour's sharp riding we reached the Aguada, where the river was yet fordable; crossing this, we mounted the Sierra by a narrow and winding pass which leads through the mountains toward Almeida. Here I turned once more to cast a last and farewell look at the scene of our late encounter. It was but a few hours that I had stood almost on the same spot, and yet how altered was all around. The wide plain, then bustling with all the life and animation of a large army, was now nearly deserted; some dismounted guns, some broken up and dismantled batteries, around which a few sentinels seemed to loiter rather than to keep guard; a strong detachment of infantry could be seen wending their way toward the fortress, and a confused mass of camp followers, sutlers, and peasants, following their steps for protection against the pillagers and the still ruder assaults of their own guerillas. The fortress too, was changed indeed. Those mighty walls before whose steep sides the bravest fell back baffled and beaten, were now a mass of ruin and decay; the muleteer could be seen driving his mule along through the rugged ascent of that breach, to win whose top the best blood of Albion's chivalry was shed; and the peasant child looked timidly from those dark enclosures into the deep fosse below, where perished hundreds of our best and bravest. The air was calm, clear, and unclouded; no smoke obscured the transparent atmosphere; the cannon had ceased; and the voices that rang so late in accents of triumphant victory were stilled in death. Every thing, indeed, had undergone a mighty change; but nothing brought the altered fortunes of the scene so vividly to my mind as when I remembered that when last I had seen those walls, the dark shako of the French grenadiers peered above their battlements, and now the gay tartan of the Highlander fluttered above them, and the red flag of England waved boldly in the breeze.

Up to that moment my sensations were those of unmixed pleasure: the thought of my home, my friends, my country, the feeling that I was returning with the bronze of the battle upon my cheek, and the voice of praise still ringing in my heart; these were proud thoughts, and my bosom heaved short and quickly, as I revolved them; but as I turned my gaze for the last time toward the gallant army I was leaving, a pang of self-reproach shot through me, and I could not help feeling how far less worthily was I acting in yielding to the impulse of my wishes, than had I remained to share the fortunes of the campaign.

So powerfully did these sensations possess me that I sat motionless for some time, uncertain whether to proceed; forgetting that I was the bearer of important information, I only remembered that by my own desire I was there; my reason but half convinced me that the part I had adopted was right and honourable, and more than once my resolution to proceed hung in the balance. It was just at this critical moment of my doubts, when Mike, who had been hitherto behind, came up.

"Is it the upper road, sir!" said he, pointing to a steep and rugged path, which led by a zigzag ascent toward the crest of the mountain.

I nodded in reply, when he added:

"Doesn't this remind your honour of Sleibh More above the Shannon, where we used to be grouse shooting? and there's the keeper's house in the valley; and that might be your uncle, the master himself, waving his hat to you."

Had he known the state of my conflicting feelings at the moment, he could not more readily have decided this doubt. I turned abruptly away, put spurs to my horse, and dashed up the steep pass at a pace which evidently surprised, and as evidently displeased my follower.

How natural it is even to experience a reaction of depression and lowness after the first burst of unexpected joy; the moment of happiness is scarce experienced ere come the doubts of its reality, the fears for its continuance; the higher the state of pleasurable excitement, the more painful and the more pressing the anxieties that await on it; the tension of delighted feelings cannot last, and our over-wrought faculties seek repose in regrets. Happy he who can so temper his enjoyments as to view them in their shadows as in their sunshine: he may not, it is true, behold the landscape and the blaze of its noonday brightness; but he need not fear the thunder-cloud nor the hurricane. The calm autumn of his bliss, if it dazzle not in its brilliancy, will not any more be shrouded in darkness and in gloom.

My first burst of pleasure over, the thought of my uncle's changed fortunes pressed deeply on my heart, and a hundred plans suggested themselves in turn to my mind to relieve his present embarrassments; but I knew how impracticable they would all prove when opposed by his prejudices. To sell the old home of his forefathers, to wander from the roof which had sheltered his name for generations, he would never consent to; the law might by force expel him, and drive him a wanderer and an exile, but of his own free will the thing was hopeless. Considine too would encourage rather than repress such feelings; his feudalism would lead him to any lengths, and in defence of what he would esteem a right, he would as soon shoot a sheriff as a snipe, and, old as he was, ask for no better amusement than to arm the whole tenantry and give battle to the king's troops on the wide plain of Scariff. Amid such conflicting thoughts, I travelled on moodily and in silence to the palpable astonishment of Mike, who could not help regarding me as one from whom fortune met the most ungrateful returns. At every new turn of the road he would endeavour to attract my attention by the objects around; no white turreted château, no tapered spire in the distance escaped him; he kept up a constant ripple of half muttered praise and censure upon all he saw, and instituted unceasing comparisons between the country and his own, in which I am bound to say, Ireland rarely, if ever, had to complain of his patriotism.

When we arrived at Almeida, I learned that the Medea sloop of war was lying off Oporto, and expected to sail for England in a few days. The opportunity was not to be neglected; the official despatches I was aware would be sent through Lisbon, where the Gordon frigate was in waiting to convey them; but, should I be fortunate enough to reach Oporto in time, I had little doubt of arriving in England with the first intelligence of the fall of Ciudad Rodrigo. Reducing my luggage, therefore, to the smallest possible compass, and having provided myself with a juvenile guide for the pass of La Regna, I threw myself, without undressing, upon the bed, and waited anxiously for the break of day to resume my journey.

As I ruminated over the prospect my return presented, I suddenly remembered Frank Webber's letter, which I had hastily thrust into a portfolio without reading, so occupied was I by Considine's epistle; with a little searching I discovered it, and, trimming my lamp, as I felt no inclination to sleep, I proceeded to the examination of what seemed a more than usually voluminous epistle. It contained four closely written pages, accompanied by something like a plan in an engineering sketch. My curiosity becoming further stimulated by this, I sat down to peruse it. It began thus:

"Official Despatch of Lieutenant-General Francis Webber, to Lord Castlereagh; detailing the assault and capture of the old pump, in Trinity College, Dublin, on the night of the second of December, eighteen hundred and eleven, with returns of killed, wounded, and missing; with other information from the seat of war.

"Head-quarters, No. 2, Old Square.

"My Lord,

In compliance with the instructions contained in your lordship's despatch, of the twenty-first ultimo, I concentrated the force under my command, and, assembling the generals of division, made known my intentions in the following general order:

"A. G. O.

"The following troops will, this evening, assemble at head-quarters, and, having partaken of a sufficient dinner for the next two days, with punch for four, will hold themselves in readiness to march, in the following order:

"Harry Nesbitt's brigade of incorrigibles will form a blockading force, in the line extending from the vice-provost's house to the library. The light division, under Mark Waller, will skirmish from the gate toward the middle of the square, obstructing the march of the cuirassiers of the guard, which, under the command of old Duncan, the porter, are expected to move in that direction. Two columns of attack will be formed by the senior sophisters of the old guard, and a forlorn hope of the 'cautioned' men at the last four examinations, will form, under the orders of Timothy O'Rourke, beneath the shadow of the dining-hall.

"At the signal of the dean's bell the stormers will move forward. A cheer from the united corps will then announce the moment of attack.

"The word for the night will be, 'May the devil admire me!'

"The commander of the forces desires that the different corps should be as strong as possible, and expects that no man will remain, on any pretence whatever, in the rear, with the lush. During the main assault, Cecil Cavendish will make a feint upon the provost's windows, to be converted into a real attack if the ladies scream.

"General Order,

"The Commissary-General Foley will supply the following articles for the use of the troops:—Two hams, eight pair of chickens, the same to be roasted; a deviled turkey; sixteen lobsters; eight hundred of oysters, with a proportionate quantity of cold sherry and hot punch.

"The army will get drunk by ten o'clock to-night.

"Having made these dispositions, my lord, I proceeded to mislead the enemy as to our intentions, in suffering my servant to be taken with an intercepted despatch. This, being a prescription by Doctor Colles, would convey to the dean's mind that I am still upon the sick list. This being done, and four canisters of Dartford gunpowder being procured on tick, our military chest being in a deplorable condition, I waited for the moment of attack.

"A heavy rain, accompanied with a frightful hurricane, prevailed during the entire day, rendering the march of the troops who came from the neighbourhood of Merrion-square and Fitzwilliam-street a service of considerable fatigue. The outlaying pickets in College-green being induced probably by the inclemency of the season, were rather tipsy on joining, and, having engaged in a skirmish with old M'Calister, tying his red uniform over his head, the moment of attack was precipitated, and we moved to the trenches by half-past nine o'clock.

"Nothing could be more orderly, nothing more perfect than the march of the troops. As we approached the corner of the commons' hall a skirmish on the rear apprised us that our intentions had become known; and I soon learned from my aid-de-camp, Bob Moore, that the attack was made by a strong column of the enemy, under command of Old Fitzgerald.

"Perpendicular (as your lordship is aware he is styled by the army) came on in a determined manner, and before many minutes had elapsed had taken several prisoners, among others Tom Drummond—Long Tom—who, having fallen on all fours, was mistaken for a long eighteen. The success, however, was but momentary; Nesbitt's brigade attacked them in flank, rescued the prisoners, extinguished the dean's lantern, and, having beaten back the heavy porters, took Perpendicular himself prisoner.

"An express from the left informed me that the attack upon the provost's house had proved equally successful: there wasn't a whole pane of glass in the front, and from a footman who deserted it was learned that Mrs. Hutchinson was in hysterics.

"While I was reading this despatch, a strong feeling of the line toward the right announced that something was taking place in that direction. Bob Moore, who rode by on Drummond's back, hurriedly informed me that Williams had put the lighted end of his cigar to one of the fuses, but the powder, being wet, did not explode, notwithstanding his efforts to effect it. Upon this I hastened to the front, where I found the individual in question kneeling upon the ground, and endeavouring, as far as punch would permit him, to kindle a flame at the portfire. Before I could interfere, the spark had caught; a loud, hissing noise followed; the different magazines successively became ignited, and at length the fire reached the great four-pound charge.

"I cannot convey to your lordship, by any words of mine, an idea of this terrible explosion; the blazing splinters were hurled into the air and fell in fiery masses on every side from the park to King William; Ivey, the bell-ringer, was precipitated from the scaffold beside the bell, and fell headlong into the mud beneath; the surrounding buildings trembled at the shock; the windows were shattered, and in fact a scene of perfect devastation ensued on all sides.

"When the smoke cleared away I rose from my recumbent position, and perceived with delight that not a vestige of the pump remained. The old iron handle was imbedded in the wall of the dining-hall, and its round knob stood out like the end of a queue.

"Our loss was, of course, considerable; and, ordering the wounded to the rear, I proceeded to make an orderly and regular retreat. At this time, however, the enemy had assembled in force. Two battalions of porters, led on by Dr. Dobbin, charged us on the flank; a heavy brigade poured down upon us from the battery, and, but for the exertions of Harry Nesbitt, our communication with our reserves must have been cut off. Cecil Cavendish also came up; for, although beaten in his great attack, the forces under his command had penetrated by the kitchen windows, and carried off a considerable quantity of cold meat.

"Concentrating the different corps, I made an echellon movement upon the chapel, to permit of the light division coming up. This they did in a few moments, informing me that they had left Perpendicular in the haha, which, as your lordship is aware, is a fosse of the very greenest and most stagnant nature. We now made good our retreat upon number two, carrying our wounded with us: the plunder we also secured, but we kicked the prisoners and suffered them to escape.

"Thus terminated, my lord, one of the brightest achievements of the under-graduate career. I enclose a list of the wounded, as also an account of the various articles returned in the commissary-general's list.

"Harry Nesbitt; severely wounded; no coat nor hat; a black eye; left shoe missing.

"Cecil Cavendish; face severely scratched; supposed to have received his wound in the attack upon the kitchen.

"Tom Drummond; not recognisable by his friends; his features resembling a transparency disfigured by the smoke of the preceding night's illumination.

"Bob Moore; slightly wounded.

"I would beg particularly to recommend all these officers to your lordship's notice: indeed the conduct of Moore, in kicking the dean's lantern out of the porter's hand, was marked by great promptitude and decision. This officer will present to H. R. H. the following trophies, taken from the enemy. The dean's cap and tassel; the key of his chamber; Dr

Dobbin's wig and bands; four porters' helmets, and a book on the cellar.

"I have the honour to remain, My Lord, &c.

"G. O. "————————"

"The commander of the forces returns his thanks to the various officers and soldiers employed in the late assault, for their persevering, gallantry, and courage. The splendour of the achievement can only be equalled by the humanity and good conduct of the troops. It only remains for me to add, that the less they say about the transaction, and the sooner they are severally confined to their beds with symptoms of contagious fever, the better.

"Meanwhile, to concert upon the future measures of the campaign, the army will sup to-night at Morisson's."

Here ended this precious epistle, rendering one fact sufficiently evident—that, however, my worthy friend advanced in years, he had not grown in wisdom.

While ruminating upon the strange infatuation which could persuade a gifted and an able man to lavish upon dissipation and reckless absurdity the talents that must, if well directed, raise him to eminence and distinction, a few lines of a newspaper paragraph fell from the paper I was reading. It ran thus:

"LATE OUTRAGE IN TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN.

"We have great pleasure in stating that the serious disturbance which took place with the walls of our university a few evenings since, was in no wise attributable to the conduct of the students. A party of ill-disposed townspeople were, it would appear, the instigators and perpetrators of the outrage. That their object was the total destruction of our venerated university there can be but little doubt. Fortunately, however, they did not calculate upon the esprit de corps of the students, a body of whom, under the direction of Mr. Webber, successfully opposed the assailants, and finally drove them from the walls.

"It is, we understand, the intention of the board to confer some mark of approbation upon Mr. Webber, who, independently of this, has strong claims upon their notice, his collegiate success pointing him out as the most extraordinary man of his day."

"This, my dear Charley, will give you some faint conception of one of the most brilliant exploits of modern days. The bulletin, believe me, is not Napoleonised into any bombastic extravagance of success. The thing was splendid: from the brilliant firework of the old pump itself to the figure of Perpendicular dripping with duckweed, like an insane river god, it was unequalled. Our fellows behaved like trumps; and, to do them justice, so did the enemy. But unfortunately, notwithstanding this, and the plausible paragraphs of the morning papers, I have been summoned before the board for Tuesday next.

"Meanwhile, I employ myself in throwing off a shower of small squibs for the journals, so that if the board deal not mercifully with me, I may meet with sympathy from the public. I have just despatched a little editorial bit for The Times, calling, in terms of parental tenderness, upon the university to say—

"'How long will the extraordinary excesses of a learned functionary be suffered to disgrace college? Is Dr. * * * * to be permitted to exhibit an example of more riotous insubordination than would be endured in an undergraduate? More on this subject hereafter.'

"'Saunders's Newsletter.—Doctor Barret appeared at the head police office, before Alderman Darley, to make oath that neither he nor Catty were concerned in the late outrage upon the pump,' &c. &c.

"Paragraphs like those are flying about every provincial paper of the empire. People shake their heads when they speak of the university, and respectable females rather cross over by King William and the bank than pass near its precincts.

"Tuesday Evening.

"Would you believe it, they've expelled me! Address your next letter as usual, for they havn't got rid of me yet.

Yours, F. W."

So, I shall find him at his old quarters, thought I, and evidently not much altered since we parted. It was not without a feeling of (I trust pardonable) pride, that I thought over my own case in the interval. My three years of campaigning life had given me some insight into the world, and some knowledge of myself, and conferred upon me a boon, of which I know not the equal; that while yet young, and upon the very threshold of life, I should have tasted the enthusiastic pleasures of a soldier's fortune, and braved the dangers and difficulties of a campaign at a time when, under other auspices, I might have wasted my years in unprofitable idleness or careless dissipation.

CHAPTER CVI.—LONDON.

TWELVE hours after my arrival in England, I entered London. I cannot attempt to record the sensations which thronged my mind, as the din and tumult of that mighty city awoke me from a sound sleep I had fallen into in the corner of the chaise. The seemingly interminable lines of lamp-light, the crash of carriages, the glare of the shops, the buzz of voices, made up a chaotic mass of sights and sounds, leaving my efforts at thought in vain and fruitless.

Obedient to my instructions, I lost not a moment in my preparations to deliver my despatches. Having dressed myself in the full uniform of my corps, I drove to the horse-guards. It was now nine o'clock, and I learned that his Royal Highness had gone to dinner at Carlton House. In a few words which I spoke with the aid-de-camp, I discovered that no information of the fall of Ciudad Rodrigo had yet reached England. The greatest anxiety prevailed as to the events of the Peninsula, from which no despatches had been received for several weeks past.

To Carlton House I accordingly bent my steps, without any precise determination how I should proceed when there, not knowing how far etiquette might be an obstacle to the accomplishment of my mission. The news of which I was the bearer was however of two important a character to permit me to hesitate, and I presented myself to the aid-de-camp in waiting, simply stating that I was entrusted with important letters to his Royal Highness, the purport of which did not admit of delay.

"They have not gone to dinner yet," lisped out the aid-de-camp, "and if you would permit me to deliver the letters——."

"Mine are despatches," said I, somewhat proudly, and in no wise disposed to cede to another the honour of personally delivering them into the hands of the duke.

"Then you had better present yourself at the levee to-morrow morning," replied he carelessly, while he turned into one of the window recesses, and resumed the conversation with one of the gentlemen in waiting.

I stood for some moments uncertain and undecided; reluctant on the one part to relinquish my claim as the bearer of despatches, and equally unwilling to defer the delivery till the following day.

Adopting the former alternative, I took my paper from my sabretash, and was about to place them in the hands of the aid-de-camp, when the folding doors at the end of the apartment suddenly flew open, and a large and handsome man, with a high bold forehead, entered hastily.

The different persons in waiting sprung from their lounging attitudes upon the sofas, and bowed respectfully as he passed on toward another door. His dress was a plain blue coat, buttoned to the collar, and his only decoration, a brilliant star upon the breast. There was that air, however, of high birth and bearing about him, that left no doubt upon my mind he was of the blood royal.

As the aid-de-camp to whom I had been speaking opened the door for him to pass out, I could hear some words in a low voice, in which the phrases of "letters of importance and your Royal Highness," occurred. The individual addressed, turned suddenly about, and casting a rapid glance around the room, without deigning a word in reply, walked straight up to where I was standing.

"Despatches for me, sir," said he shortly, taking, as he spoke, the packet from my hand.

"For his Royal Highness, the commander-in-chief," said I, bowing respectfully, and still uncertain in whose presence I was standing. He broke the seal without answering, and, as his eye caught the first lines of despatch, broke out with an exclamation of—

"Ha! peninsular news! When did you arrive, sir?"

"An hour since, sir."

"And these letters are from"—

"General Picton, your Royal Highness."

"How glorious—how splendidly done!" muttered he to himself, as he ran his eye over the letter.

"Are you Captain O'Malley, whose name is mentioned here so favourably?"

I bowed deeply in reply.

"You are most highly spoken of, and it will give me sincere pleasure to recommend you to the notice of the Prince Regent. But stay a moment." So saying, hurriedly he passed from the room, leaving me overwhelmed at the suddenness of the incident, and a mark of no small astonishment to the different persons in waiting, who had hitherto no other idea, but that my despatches were from Hounslow or Knight's bridge.

"Captain O'Malley," said an officer covered with decorations, and whose slightly foreign accent bespoke the Hanoverian, "his Royal Highness requests you will accompany me." The door opened as he spoke, and I found myself in a most splendidly lit-up apartment; the walls covered with pictures, and the ceiling divided into panels, resplendent with the richest gilding. A group of persons in court-dresses, were conversing in a low tone as we entered, but suddenly ceased, and, saluting my conductor respectfully, made way for us to pass on. The folding-doors again opened as we approached, and we found ourselves in a long gallery, whose sumptuous furniture and costly decorations, shone beneath the rich tints of a massive lustre of ruby glass, diffusing a glow resembling the most gorgeous sunset. Here also some persons in handsome uniform were conversing, one of whom accosted my companion by the title of "Baron," nodding familiarly as he muttered a few words in German; he passed forward, and the next moment the doors were thrown suddenly wide, and we entered the drawing-room.

The buzz of voices and the sound of laughter reassured me as I came forward, and, before I had well time to think where and why I was there, the Duke of York advanced toward me, with a smile of peculiar sweetness in its expression, and said, as he turned toward one side—

"Your Royal Highness—Captain O'Malley!"

As he spoke, the prince moved forward, and bowed slightly.

"You've brought us capital news, Mr. O'Malley. May I beg, if you're not too much tired, you'll join us at dinner. I am most anxious to learn the particulars of the assault."

As I bowed my acknowledgments to the gracious invitation, he continued—

"Are you acquainted with your countryman—but of course you can scarcely be—you began too early as a soldier. So let me present you to my friend, Mr. Burke," a middle-aged man, whose broad white forehead and deep-set eyes evinced the character of features that were otherwise not remarkable in expression, bowed somewhat stiffly.

Before he had concluded a somewhat laboured compliment to me, we were joined by a third person, whose strikingly handsome features were lit up with an expression of the most animated kind. He accosted the prince with an air of easy familiarity, and while he led him from the group, appeared to be relating some anecdote, which actually convulsed his Royal Highness with laughter.

Before I had time or opportunity to enquire who the individual could be, dinner was announced, and the wide folding-doors being thrown open, displayed the magnificent dining-room of Carlton-house, in all the blaze and splendour of its magnificence.

The sudden change, from the rough vicissitudes of campaigning-life, to all the luxury and voluptuous elegance of a brilliant court, created too much confusion in my mind to permit of my impressions being the most accurate or most collected. The splendour of the scene, the rank, but, even more, the talent of individuals by whom I was surrounded, had all their full effect upon me; and, although I found, from the tone of the conversation about, how immeasurably I was their inferior, yet, by a delicate and courteous interest in the scene of which I had lately partaken, they took away the awkwardness which, in some degree, was inseparable from the novelty of my position among them.

Conversing about the Peninsula with a degree of knowledge which I could in no wise comprehend from those not engaged in the war, they appeared perfectly acquainted with all the details of the campaign; and I heard on every side of me anecdotes and stories which I scarcely believed known beyond the precincts of a regiment. The prince himself, the grace and charm of whose narrative talents have never been excelled, was particularly conspicuous, and I could not help feeling struck with his admirable imitations of voice and manner; the most accomplished actor could not have personated the cannie calculating spirit of the Scot, nor the rollicking recklessness of the Irishman, with more tact and finesse. But far above all this shone the person I have already alluded to as speaking to his Royal Highness in the drawing-room; combining the happiest conversational eloquence, with a quick, ready, and brilliant fancy. He threw from him in all the careless profusion of boundless resource, a shower of pointed and epigrammatic witticisms; now, illustrating a really difficult subject by one happy touch, as the blaze of the lightning will light up the whole surface of the dark landscape beneath it; now, turning the force of an adversary's argument by some fallacious but unanswerable jest; accompanying the whole by those fascinations of voice, look, gesture, and manner which have made those who once have seen, never able to forget, Brinsley Sheridan.

I am not able, were I even disposed, to record more particularly the details of that most brilliant evening of my life. On every side of me I heard the names of those whose fame as statesmen, or whose repute as men of letters, was ringing throughout Europe; they were then, too, not in the easy indolence of ordinary life, but displaying with their utmost effort those powers of wit, fancy, imagination, and eloquence, which had won for them elsewhere their high and exalted position. The masculine understanding and powerful intellect of ——— vied with the brilliant and dazzling conceptions of Sheridan. The easy bonhomie and English heartiness of Fox contrasted with the cutting sarcasm and sharp raillery of Erskine. While contending the palm with each himself, the Prince evinced powers of mind and eloquent facilities of expression that, in any walk of life, must have made their possessor a most distinguished man. Politics, war, women, literature, the turf, the navy, the opposition, architecture, the drama, were all discussed with a degree of information and knowledge that proved to me how much of real acquirements can be obtained by those whose exalted station surrounds them with the collective intellect of a nation. As for myself, the time flew past unconsciously. So brilliant a display of all that was courtly and fascinating in manner and all that was brilliant in genius, was so novel to me, that I really felt like one entranced. To this hour my impression, however confused in details, is as vivid as though that evening were but yesternight; and although since that period I have enjoyed numerous opportunities of meeting with the great and the gifted, yet I treasure the memory of that night as by far the most delightful of my whole life.

While I abstain from any mention of the many incidents of the evening, I cannot pass over one, which, occurring to myself, is valuable but as showing, by one slight and passing trait, the amiable and kind feeling of one, whose memory is hallowed in the service.

A little lower than myself, on the opposite side of the table, I perceived an old military acquaintance whom I had first met in Lisbon; he was then in Sir Charles Stewart's staff, and we met almost daily. Wishing to commend myself to his recollection, I endeavoured for some time to catch his eye, but in vain; at last, when I thought I had succeeded, I called to him—

"I say, Fred, a glass of wine with you."

When suddenly the Duke of York, who was speaking to Lord ———, turned quickly around, and, taking the decanter in his hand, replied—

"With pleasure, O'Malley; what shall it be, my boy?"

I shall never forget the manly good humour in his look, as he sat waiting for my answer. He had taken my speech as addressed to himself, and concluding that, from fatigue, the novelty of the scene, &c., I was not over collected, vouchsafed in this kind way to receive it.

"So," said he, as I stammered out my explanation, "I was deceived; however, don't cheat me out of my glass of wine. Let us have it now."

With this little anecdote, whose truth I vouch for, I shall conclude. More than one now living was a witness to it, and my only regret, in the mention of it, is my inability to convey the readiness with which he seized the moment of apparent difficulty, to throw the protection of his kind and warm-hearted nature over the apparent folly of a boy.

It was late when the party broke up, and, as I took my leave of the prince, he once more expressed himself in gracious terms toward me, and gave me personally an invitation to breakfast at Hounslow, on the following Saturday.

CHAPTER CVI.—The Bell at Bristol.

On the morning after my dinner at Carlton House, I found my breakfast-table covered with cards and invitations. The news of the storming of Ciudad Rodrigo was published in all the morning papers, and my own humble name in letters three feet long was exhibited in placards throughout the city. Less to this circumstance, however, than to the kind and gracious notice of the Prince, was I indebted for the attentions which were shown me on all sides; and indeed so flattering was the reception I met with, and so overwhelming the civility showered on me from all sides, that it required no small effort on my part not to believe myself as much a hero as they would make me. An eternal round of dinners, balls, breakfasts, and entertainments filled up the entire week. I was included in every invitation to Carlton House, and never appeared without receiving from his Royal Highness the most striking marks of attention. Captivating as all this undoubtedly was, and fascinating as I felt in being the lion of London, the courted and sought after by the high, the titled, and the talented of the great city of the universe, yet amid all the splendour and seduction of that new world, my heart instinctively turned from the glare and brilliancy of gorgeous saloons—from the soft looks and softer voices of beauty—from the words of praise, as they fell from the lips of those whose notice was fame itself, to my humble home amid the mountains of the west. Delighted and charmed as I felt by that tribute of flattery which associated my name with one of the most brilliant actions of my country, yet hitherto I had experienced no touch of home or fatherland. England was to me as the high and powerful head of my home, whose greatness and whose glory shed a halo far and near, from the proudest to the humblest of those that call themselves Britons; but Ireland was the land of my birth—the land of my earliest ties, my dearest associations—the kind mother whose breath had fanned my brow in infancy; and for her in my manhood my heart beat with every throb of filial affection. Need I say, then, how ardently I longed to turn homeward, for, independent of all else, I could not avoid some self-reproach on thinking what might be the condition of those I prized the most on earth, when, at that very moment I was engaging in all the voluptuous abandonment and all the fascinating excesses of a life of pleasure. I wrote several letters home, but received no answer; nor did I, in the whole round of London society, meet with a single person who could give me information of my family or my friends. The Easter recess had sent the different members of parliament to their homes; and thus, within a comparatively short distance of all I cared for, I could learn nothing of their fate.

The invitations of the Prince Regent, which were, of course, to be regarded as commands, still detained me in London; and I knew not in what manner to escape from the fresh engagements which each day heaped upon me. In my anxiety upon the subject, I communicated my wishes to a friend on the duke's staff, and the following morning as I presented myself at his levee, he called me toward him and addressed me—

"What leave have you got, Captain O'Malley?"

"Three months, your Royal Highness."

"Do you desire an unattached troop? for, if so, an opportunity occurs just at this moment?"

"I thank you most sincerely, sir, for your condescension in thinking of me; but my wish is, to join my regiment at the expiration of my leave."

"Why, I thought they told me you wanted to spend some time in Ireland?"

"Only sufficient to see my friends, your Royal Highness. That done, I'd rather join my regiment immediately."

"Ah! that alters the case; so then, probably, you'd like to leave us at once. I see how it is: you've been staying here against your will all this while. Then, don't say a word. I'll make your excuses at Carlton House; and, the better to cover your retreat, I'll employ you on service. Here, Gordon, let Captain O'Malley have the despatches for Sir Henry Howard at Cork." As he said this, he turned toward me with an air of affected sternness in his manner, and continued; "I expect, Captain O'Malley, that you will deliver the despatches entrusted to your care without a moment's loss of time. You will leave London within an hour. The instructions for your journey will be sent to your hotel. And now," said he, again changing his voice to its natural tone of kindness and courtesy, "and now, my boy, good-bye, and a safe journey to you. These letters will pay your expenses, and the occasion save you all the worry of leave-taking."

I stood confused and speechless, unable to utter a single word of gratitude for such unexpected kindness. The duke saw at once my difficulty, and, as he shook me warmly by the hand, added, in a laughing tone—

"Don't wait now. You mustn't forget that your despatches are pressing."

I bowed deeply, attempted a few words of acknowledgment, hesitated, blundered, and broke down; and at last got out of the room, heaven knows how! and found myself running toward Long's at the top of my speed. Within that same hour I was rattling along toward Bristol as fast as four posters could brave the pavement, thinking with ecstasy over the pleasures of my reception in England, but, far more than all, of the kindness evinced toward me by him who, in every feeling of his nature, and every feature of his deportment, was "every inch a prince."

However astonished I had been at the warmth by which I was treated in London, I was still less prepared for the enthusiasm which greeted me in every town through which I passed. There was not a village where we stopped to change horses whose inhabitants did not simultaneously pour forth to welcome me with every demonstration of delight. That the fact of four horses and a yellow chaise should have elicited such testimonies of satisfaction, was somewhat difficult to conceive; and, even had the important news that I was the bearer of despatches been telegraphed from London by successive postboys, still the extraordinary excitement was unaccountable. It was only on reaching Bristol that I learned to what circumstance my popularity was owing. My friend Mike, in humble imitation of election practices, had posted a large placard on the back of the chaise, announcing, in letters of portentous length, something like the following:

"Bloody news! Fall of Ciudad Rodrigo—five thousand prisoners two hundred pieces of cannon taken—account of the siege and the assault, with a letter from Captain O'Malley, who led the stormers!"

This veracious and satisfactory statement, aided by Mike's personal exertions, and an unwearied performance on the trumpet he had taken from the French dragoon, had roused the population of every hamlet, and made our journey from London to Bristol one scene of uproar, noise, and confusion. All my attempts to suppress Mike's oratory or music were perfectly unavailing. In fact, he had pledged my health so many times during the day—he had drunk so many toasts to the success of the British arms—so many to the English nation—so many in honour of Ireland—and so many in honour of Mickey Free himself, that all respect for my authority was lost in his enthusiasm for my greatness, and his shouts became wilder, and the blasts from the trumpet more fearful and incoherent; and finally, on the last stage of our journey, having exhausted as it were every tribute of his lungs, he seemed (if I were to judge by the evidence of my ears) to be performing something very like a hornpipe on the roof of the chaise.

Happily for me there is a limit to all human efforts, and even his powers at length succumbed; so that, when we arrived at Bristol, I persuaded him to go to bed, and I once more was left to the enjoyment of some quiet. To fill up the few hours which intervened before bed-time, I strolled into the coffee-room. The English look of every one, and every thing around, had still its charm for me; and I was contemplating, with no small admiration, that air of neatness and propriety so observant from the bright-faced clock, that ticked unweariedly from the mantel-piece, to the trim waiter himself, with noiseless step, and that mixed look of vigilance and vacancy. The perfect stillness struck me, save when a deep voice called for "another brandy and water," and some more modestly-toned request would utter a desire for "more cream." The absorbed attention of each man, in the folds of his voluminous newspaper, scarcely deigning a glance at the new-comer who entered, were all in keeping; giving, in their solemnity and gravity, a character of almost religious seriousness, to what, in any other land, would be a scene of riotous noise and discordant tumult. I was watching all these with a more than common interest, when the door opened, and the waiter entered with a large placard. He was followed by another with a ladder, by whose assistance he succeeded in attaching the large square of paper to the wall, above the fire-place. Every one about rose up, curious to ascertain what was going forward; and I, myself, joined in the crowd around the fire. The first glance of the announcement showed me what it meant: and it was with a strange mixture of shame and confusion I read:

"Fall of Ciudad Rodrigo; with a full and detailed account of the storming of the great breach—capture of the enemy's cannon, &c.—by Michael Free, Fourteenth Light Dragoons."

Leaving the many around me busied in conjecturing who the aforesaid Mr. Free might be, and what peculiar opportunities he might have enjoyed for his report, I hurried from the room and called the waiter.

"What's the meaning of the announcement you've just put up in the coffee-room! where did it come from?"

"Most important news, sir; exclusively in the columns of the Bristol Telegraph: the gentleman has just arrived——"

"Who, pray? what gentleman?"

"Mr. Free, sir, No. 13—large bed room—blue damask—supper for one—oyters—a devil—brandy and water—mulled port."

"What the devil do you mean? is the fellow at supper?"

Somewhat shocked at the tone I ventured to assume toward the illustrious narrator, the waiter merely bowed his reply.

"Show me to his room," said I; "I should like to see him."

"Follow me, if you please, sir—this way—what name shall I say, sir?"

"You need not mind announcing me—I'm an old acquaintance—just show me the room."

"I beg pardon, sir, but Mr. Meekins, the editor of the Telegraph, is engaged with him at present; and positive orders are given not to suffer any interruption."

"No matter: do as I bid you. Is that it? Oh! I hear his voice. There, that will do. You may go down stairs, I'll introduce myself."

So saying, and slipping a crown into the waiter's hand, I proceeded cautiously toward the door, and opened it stealthily. My caution was, however, needless; for a large screen was drawn across this part of the room, completely concealing the door; closing which behind me, I took my place beneath the shelter of this ambuscade, determined on no account to be perceived by the parties.

Seated in a large arm-chair, a smoking tumbler of mulled port before him, sat my friend Mike, dressed in my full regimentals, even to the helmet, which, unfortunately however, for the effect, he had put on back foremost; a short "dudeen" graced his lip, and the trumpet, so frequently alluded to, lay near him.

Opposite him sat a short, puny, round-faced little gentleman, with rolling eyes and a turned-up nose. Numerous sheets of paper, pens, &c., lay scattered about; and he evinced, by his air and gesture, the most marked and eager attention to Mr. Free's narrative, whose frequent interruptions, caused by the drink and oysters, were viewed with no small impatience by the anxious editor.

"You must remember, captain, time's passing; the placards are all out; must be at press before one o'clock to-night, the morning edition is every thing with us. You were at the first parallel, I think."

"Devil a one o' me knows. Just ring that bell near you; them's elegant oysters; and you're not taking your drop of liquor; here's a toast for you—'May——' whoop—raal Carlingford's, upon my conscience. See now, if I won't hit the little black chap up there, the first shot."

Scarcely were the words spoken, when a little painted bust of Shakspeare fell in fragments on the floor as an oyster-shell laid him low.

A faint effort at a laugh at the eccentricities of his friend, was all the poor editor could accomplish, while Mike's triumph knew no bounds.

"Didn't I tell you?" But come now, are you ready! give the pen a drink, if you won't take one yourself."

"I'm ready, quite ready," responded the editor.

"Faith, and it's more nor I am. See now, here it is: The night was murthering dark: you could not see a stim."

"Not see a—a what?"

"A stim, bad luck to you; don't you know English? Hand me the hot water. Have you that down yet?"

"Yes. Pray proceed."

"The fifth division was orthered up, bekase they were fighting chaps; the eighty-eighth was among them; the Rangers—oh! upon my soul, we must drink the Rangers. Here, devil a one o' me will go on till we give them all the honours—hip—begin."

"Hip," sighed the luckless editor, as he rose from his chair, obedient to the command.

"Hurra—hurra—hurra! Well done! there's stuff in you yet, ould foolscap! the little bottle's empty—ring again, if you plase."

"Oh, Father Magan,
Was a beautiful man,
But a bit of a rogue, a bit of a rogue.
He was just six feet high,
Had a cast in his eye,
And an illigint brogue, an illigint brogue.

"He was born in Killarney,
And reared up in Blarney"—

"Arrah, don't be looking miserable and dissolate, that way. Sure I'm only screwing myself up for you; besides, you can print the song as you like: its a sweet tune—'Teddy you Gander.'"

"Really, Mr. Free, I see no prospect of our ever getting done."

"The saints in heaven forbid," interrupted Mike, piously; "the evening's young, and drink plenty; here now, make ready!"

The editor once more made a gesture of preparation.

"Well, as I was saying," resumed Mike, "it was pitch dark when the columns moved up, and a cold raw night with a little thin rain falling. Have you that down?"

"Yes. Pray go on."

"Well, just as it might be here at the corner of the trench I met Doctor Quill. 'They're waiting for you, Misther Free,' says he, 'down there. Picton's asking for you.' 'Faith and you must wait,' says I, 'for I'm terrible dry.' With that he pulled out his canteen and mixed me a little brandy and water. 'Are you taking it without a toast?' says Doctor Maurice. 'Never fear,' says I. 'Here's Mary Brady'"—

"But my dear sir," interposed Mr. Meekins, "pray do remember this is somewhat irrelevant. In fifteen minutes it will be twelve o'clock."

"I know it, ould boy, I know it. I see what you're at. You were going to observe how much better we'd be for a broiled bone."

"Nothing of the kind, I assure you. For heaven's sake no more eating and drinking."

"No more eating nor drinking! Why not? You've a nice notion of a convivial evening. Faith we'll have the broiled bone sure enough, and, what's more, a half gallon of the strongest punch they can make us; an' I hope that, grave as you are, you'll favour the company with a song."

"Really, Mr. Free"—

"Arrah! none of your blarney. Don't be misthering me. Call me Mickey, or Mickey Free, if you like better."

"I protest," said the editor, with dismay, "that here we are two hours at work, and we haven't got to the foot of the great breach."

"And wasn't the army three months and a half in just getting that far, with a battering train, and mortars, and the finest troops ever were seen? and there you sit, a little fat creature, with your pen in your hand, grumbling that you can't do more than the whole British army. Take care you don't provoke me to beat you; for I am quiet till I'm roused. But, by the Rock o' Cashel"—

Here he grasped a bass trumpet with an energy that made the editor spring from his chair.

"For mercy's sake, Mr. Free"—

"Well, I won't; but sit down there, and don't be bothering me about sieges, and battles, and things you know nothing about."

"I protest," rejoined Mr. Meekins, "that, had you not sent to my office intimating your wish to communicate an account of the siege, I never should have thought of intruding myself upon you. And now, since you appear indisposed to afford the information in question, if you will permit me, I wish you a very good night."

"Faith, and so you shall, and help me to pass one too; for not a step out o' that chair shall you take till morning. Do ye think I am going to be left here by myself, all alone?"

"I must observe," said Mr. Meekins—

"To be sure, to be sure," said Mickey; "I see what you mean. You're not the best of company, it's true; but at a pinch like this— There now, take your liquor."

"Once for all, sir," said the editor, "I would beg you to recollect that, on the faith of your message to me, I have announced an account of the storming of Ciudad Rodrigo for our morning edition. Are you prepared, may I ask, for the consequences of my disappointing ten thousand readers?"

"It's little I care for one of them. I never knew much of reading myself."

"If you think to make a jest of me," interposed Mr. Meekins, reddening with passion—

"A jest of you! Troth it's little fun I can get out of you; you're as tiresome a creature as ever I spent an evening with. See now, I told you before not to provoke me: we'll have a little more drink; ring the bell: who knows which will turn out better by-and-by?"

As Mike rose at these words to summon the waiter, Mr. Meekins seized the opportunity to make his escape. Scarcely had he reached the door, however, when he was perceived by Mickey, who hurled the trumpet at him with all his force, when he uttered a shout that nearly left the poor editor lifeless with terror. This time, happily, Mr. Free's aim failed him, and, before he could arrest the progress of his victim, he had gained the corridor, and, with one bound, cleared the first flight of the staircase, his pace increasing every moment as Mike's denunciations grew louder and louder, till at last, as he reached the street, Mr. Free's delight overcame his indignation, and he threw himself upon a chair and laughed immoderately.

"Oh, may I never! if I didn't frighten the editor. The little spalpeen couldn't eat his oysters and take his punch like a man. But sure if he didn't, there's more left for his betters." So saying, he filled himself a goblet and drank it off. "Mr. Free, we won't say much for your inclinations, for maybe they are not the best; but here's bad luck to the fellow that doesn't think you good company; and here," added he, again filling his glass, "and here's may the devil take editors and authors, and compositors, that won't let us alone, but must be taking our lives, and our songs, and our little devilments, that belongs to one's own family, and tell them all over the world. A lazy set of thieves you are, every one of you; spending your time inventing lies, devil a more nor less; and here"—this time he filled again—"and here's a hot corner and Kilkenny coals, that's half sulphur, to the villain"—

For what particular class of offenders Mike's penal code was now devised, I was not destined to learn; for, overcome by punch and indignation, he gave one loud whoop, and measured his length upon the floor. Having committed him to the care of the waiters, from whom I learned more fully the particulars of his acquaintance with Mr. Meekins, I enjoined them, strictly, not to mention that I knew any thing of the matter; and betook myself to my bed, sincerely rejoicing that in a few hours more Mike would be again in that land where even his eccentricities and excesses would be viewed with a favourable and forgiving eye.

CHAPTER CVIII.—Ireland.

"You'd better call your master up," said the skipper to Mickey Free, on the second evening after our departure from Bristol; "he said he'd like to have a look at the coast."

The words were overheard by me, as I lay between sleeping and waking in the cabin of the packet, and, without waiting for a second invitation, I rushed upon deck. The sun was setting, and one vast surface of yellow golden light played upon the water, as it rippled beneath a gentle gale. The white foam curled at our prow, and the rushing sound told the speed we were going at. The little craft was staggering under every sheet of her canvass, and her spars creaked as her white sails bent before the breeze. Before us, but to my landsman's eyes scarcely perceptible, was the ill-defined outlines of cloudy darkness they called land, and which I continued to gaze at with a strange sense of interest, while I heard the names of certain well-known headlands assigned to apparently mere masses of fog-bank and vapour.

He who has never been separated in early years, while yet the budding affections of his heart are tender shoots, from the land of his birth and of his home, knows nothing of the throng of sensations that crowd upon him as he nears the shore of his country. The names, familiar as household words, come with a train of long buried thoughts; the feeling of attachment to all we call our own—that patriotism of the heart—stirs strongly within him, as the mingled thrills of hope and fear alternately move him to joy or sadness.

Hard as are the worldly struggles between the daily cares of him who carves out his own career and fortune, yet he has never experienced the darkest poverty of fate who has not felt what it is to be a wanderer, without a country to lay claim to. Of all the desolations that visit us, this is the gloomiest and the worst. The outcast from the land of his fathers, whose voice must never be heard within the walls where his infancy was nurtured, nor his step be free upon the mountains where he gambolled in his youth, this is indeed wretchedness. The instinct of country grows and strengthens with our years; the joys of early life are linked with it; the hopes of age point toward it; and he who knows not the thrill of ecstasy some well-remembered, long-lost-sight-of place can bring to his heart when returning after years of absence, is ignorant of one of the purest sources of happiness of our nature.

With what a yearning of the heart, then, did I look upon the dim and misty cliffs, that mighty framework of my island home, their stern sides lashed by the blue waters of the ocean, and their summits lost within the clouds. With what an easy and natural transition did my mind turn from the wild mountains and the green valleys to their hardy sons, who toiled beneath the burning sun of the Peninsula! and how, as some twinkling light of the distant shore would catch my eye, did I wonder within myself whether beside that hearth and board there might not sit some, whose thoughts were wandering over the sea beside the bold steps of El Rodon, or the death-strown plain of Talavera! their memories calling upon some trait of him who was the idol of his home; whose closing lids some fond mother has watched over; above whose peaceful slumber her prayers have fallen; but whose narrow bed was now beneath the breach of Badajos, and his sleep the sleep that knows not waking.

I know not if in my sad and sorrowing spirit I did not envy him who thus had met a soldier's fate—for what of promise had my own!

My hopes of being in any way instrumental to my poor uncle's happiness grew hourly less. His prejudices were deeply rooted and of long standing; to have asked him to surrender any of what he looked upon as the prerogatives of his house and name, would be to risk the loss of his esteem. What then remained for me? Was I to watch, day by day and hour by hour, the falling ruin of our fortunes? Was I to involve myself in the petty warfare of unavailing resistance to the law? and could I stand aloof from my best, my truest, my earliest friend, and see him, alone and unaided, oppose his weak and final struggle to the unrelenting career of persecution? Between these two alternatives the former could be my only choice; and what a choice!

Oh, how I thought over the wild heroism of the battle-field, the reckless fury of the charge, the crash, the death-cry, and the sad picture of the morrow, when all was past, and a soldier's glory alone remained to shed its high halo over the faults and the follies of the dead.

As night fell, the twinkling of the distant light-houses—some throwing a column of light from the very verge of the horizon, others shining brightly, like stars, from some lofty promontory—marked the different outlines of the coast, and conveyed to me the memory of that broken and wild mountain tract that forms the bulwark of the green isle against the waves of the Atlantic. Alone and silently I trod the deck, now turning to look toward the shore, where I thought I could detect the position of some well-known headland, now straining my eyes seaward to watch some bright and flitting star, as it rose from or emerged beneath the foaming water, denoting the track of the swift pilot-boat, or the hardy lugger of the fisherman; while the shrill whistle of the floating sea-gull was the only sound, save the rushing waves that broke in spray upon our quarter.

What is it that so inevitably inspires sad and impressive thoughts, as we walk the deck of some little craft, in the silence of the night's dark hours? No sense of danger near, we hold on our course swiftly and steadily, cleaving the dark waves, and bending gracefully beneath the freshening breeze. Yet still the motion which, in the bright sunshine of the noonday tells of joy and gladness, brings now no touch of pleasure to our hearts. The dark and frowning sky, the boundless expanse of gloomy water, spread like some gigantic pall around us, and our thoughts either turn back upon the saddest features of the past, or look forward to the future with a sickly hope that all may not be as we fear it.

Mine were indeed the gloomiest, and the selfishness alone of the thought prevented me from wishing that, like many another, I had fallen by a soldier's death on the plains of the Peninsula!

As the night wore on, I wrapped myself in my cloak and lay down beneath the bulwark. The whole of my past life came in review before me, and I thought over my first meeting with Lucy Dashwood; the thrill of boyish admiration gliding into love; the hopes, the fears, that stirred my heart; the firm resolve to merit her affection, which made me a soldier. Alas! how little thought she of him to whose whole life she had been a guide-star and a beacon! And, as I thought over the hard-fought fields, the long, fatiguing marches, the nights around the watch-fires, and felt how, in the whirl and enthusiasm of a soldier's life, the cares and sorrows of every-day existence are forgotten, I shuddered to reflect upon the career that might now open before me. To abandon, perhaps for ever, the glorious path I had been pursuing, for a life of indolence and weariness, and my name, that had already, by the chance of some fortunate circumstances, began to be mentioned with a testimony of approval, should be lost in oblivion, or remembered but as that of one whose early promise was not borne out by deeds of his manhood.

As day broke, overcome by watching, I slept; but was soon awoke by the stir and bustle around me. The breeze had freshened, and we were running under a reefed mainsail and foresail; and, as the little craft was bounded above the blue water, the white foam crested above her prow, and ran in boiling rivulets along toward the after-deck. The tramp of the seamen, the hoarse voice of the captain, the shrill cry of the sea birds, betokened, however, nothing of dread or danger; and listlessly I leant upon my elbow, and asked what was going forward.

"Nothing, sir, only making ready to drop our anchor."

"Are we so near shore, then?" said I.

"You've only to round that point, to windward, and give a clear run into Cork harbor."

I sprang at once to my legs: the land-fog prevented my seeing any thing whatever; but I thought that in the breeze, fresh and balmy as it blew, I could feel the wind of shore.

"At last," said I, "at last!" as I stepped into the little wherry which shot alongside of us, and we glided into the still basin of Cove. How I remember every white-walled cottage, and the beetling cliffs, and that bold headland beside which the valley opens, with its dark green woods; and then Spike island; and what a stir is yonder, early as it is; the men-of-war tenders seem alive with people, while still the little village is sunk in slumbers, not a smoke-wreath rising from its silent hearths: every plash of the oars in the calm water, as I neared the land, every chance word of the bronzed and hardy fisherman told upon my heart. I felt it was my home.

"Isn't it beautiful, sir; isn't it elegant?" said a voice behind me, which there could be little doubt in my detecting, although I had not seen the individual since I left England.

"Is not what beautiful?" replied I, rather harshly in the interruption of my own thoughts.

"Ireland, to be sure; and long life to her!" cried he, with a cheer, that soon found its responsive echoes in the hearts of our sailors, who seconded the sentiment with all their energy.

"How am I to get up to Cork, lads?" said I; "I am pressed for time, and must get forward.

"We'll row your honour the whole way, av it's plazing to you."

"Why, thank you, I'd rather find some quicker mode of proceeding."

"Maybe you'd have a chaise; there's an elegant one at M'Cassidy's."

"Sure the blind mare's in foal," said the bow oar; "the devil a step she can go out of a walk; so, your honor, take Tim Riley's car, and you'll get up cheap. Not that you care for money; but he's going up at eight o'clock with two young ladies."

"Oh! begorra," said the other, "and so he is; and faix ye might do worse—they're nice craytures."

"Well," said I, "your advice seems good; but perhaps they might object to my company."

"I've no fear; they're always with the officers. Sure the Miss Dalrymple's——"

"The Miss Dalrymple's! push ahead, boys; it must be later than I thought; we must get the chaise; I can't wait."

Ten minutes more brought us to land.

* * * * * * *

My arrangements were soon made, and as my impatience to press forward became greater the nearer I drew to my destination, I lost not a moment.

The yellow chaise—sole glory of Cove—was brought forth at my request; and by good fortune, four posters who had been down the preceding evening from Cork to some gentleman's seat near, were about to return. These were also pressed into my service; and just as the first early riser of the little village was drawing his curtain to take a half-closed-eye glance upon the breaking morning, I rattled forth upon my journey at a pace which, could I only have secured its continuance must soon have terminated my weary way.

Beautiful as the whole line of the country is, I was totally unconscious of it; and even Mike's conversational powers, divided as they were between myself and the two postilions, were fruitless in arousing me from the deep pre-occupation of my mind by thoughts of home.

It was, then, with some astonishment I heard the boy upon the wheeler ask whither he should drive me to.

"Tell his honour to wake up; we're in Cork now."

"In Cork! impossible already."

"Faith, may be so; but it's Cork sure enough."

"Drive to the 'George;' it's not far from the commander-in-chief's quarters."

"'Tis five minutes' walk sir; you'll be there before they're put to again."

"Horses for Fermoy!" shouted out the postilions, as we tore up to the door in a gallop. I sprang out, and by the assistance of the waiter, discovered Sir Henry Moreton's quarters, to whom my despatches were addressed. Having delivered them into the hands of an aid-de-camp, who sat bolt upright in his bed, rubbing his eyes to appear awake, I again hurried down stairs, and, throwing myself into the chaise, continued my journey.

"Them's beautiful streets, any how!" said Mike, "av they wasn't kept so dirty, and the houses so dark, and the pavement bad. That's Mr. Beamish, that fine house there, with the brass rapper and the green lamp beside it; and there's the hospital—faix and there's the place we beat the police, when I was here before; and the house with the sign of the highlander's thrown down; and what's the big building there, with the stone posts at the door?"

"The bank, sir," said the postilion with a most deferential air, as Mike addressed him.

"What bank, acushla?"

"Not a one of me knows, sir; but they call it the bank, tho' it's only an empty house."

"Cary and Moore's bank, perhaps," said I; having heard that in days long past some such names had failed in Cork for a large amount.

"So it is; your honour's right," cried the postilion; while Mike, standing up on the box, and menacing the house with his clenched fist, shouted out at the very top of his voice:

"Oh, bad luck to your cobwebbed windows and iron railings! sure it's my father's son ought to hate the sight of you."

"I hope, Mike, your father never trusted his property in such hands?"

"I don't suspect he did, your honour; he never put much belief in the banks; but the house cost him dear enough without that."

As I could not help feeling some curiosity in this matter, I pressed Mickey for an explanation.

"But maybe it's not Cary and Moore's, after all; and I'm, maybe, cursing decent people."

Having re-assured his mind, by telling him that the reservation he made by the doubt would tell in their favour should he prove mistaken, he afforded me the following information:

"When my father—the heavens be his bed—was in the 'Cork' they put him one night on guard at that same big house you just passed—av it was the same; but if it wasn't that it was another; and it was a beautiful fine night in August, and the moon up, and plenty of people walking about, and all kinds of fun and devilment going on—drinking and dancing, and every thing.

"Well, my father was stuck up there, with his musket, to walk up and down, and not say, 'God save you kindly,' or the time of day, or any thing but just march as if he was in the barrack-yard; and by reason of his being the man he was he didn't like it half, but kept cursing and swearing to himself like mad when he saw pleasant fellows and pretty girls going by, laughing and joking.

"'Good evening, Mickey,' says one; 'fine sport ye have all to yourself, with your long feather in your cap.'

"'Arrah look how proud he is,' says another, 'with his head up as if he didn't see a body.'

"'Shoulder too!' cried a drunken chap, with a shovel in his hand: they all began laughing away at my father.

"'Let the decent man alone,' said an old fellow in a wig; 'isn't he guarding the bank, wid all the money in it?'

"'Faix he isn't,' says another; 'for there's none left.'

"'What's that you're saying?' says my father.

"'Just that the bank's broke, devil a more,' says he.

"'And there's no goold in it?' says my father.

"'Devil a guinea.'

"'Nor silver?'

"'No, nor silver, nor as much as sixpence, either.'

"'Didn't ye hear, that all day yesterday, when people was coming in with their notes, the chaps there were heating the guineas in a frying-pan, pretending they were making them as fast as they could; and sure, when they had a batch red-hot they spread them out to cool; and what betune the hating and cooling, and the burning the fingers counting them, they kept the bank open to three o'clock, and then they ran away.'

"'Is it truth yer telling?' says my father.

"'Sorra word o'lie in it! myself had two and fourpence of their notes.'

"'And so they're broke,' says my father; 'and nothing left.'

"'Not a brass farthen.'

"'And what am I staying here for, I wonder, if there's nothing to guard?'"

THE SETTLER ON THE FRONTIER.

"That portion of the monied aristocracy of Europe, who in sumptuous drawing-rooms and spacious halls indulge in the luxury of ostentatious sympathy for all races but their own, do not appreciate the character and situation of the Anglo-American, who has made his home in solitudes unbroken by any human sound, save the whoop of an invisible foe. Accustomed to hear him denounced as a man-slayer and a land-robber, they take no thought of the spirit which has impelled him onward, the qualities he is constrained to display, and the social ameliorations of which he is the pioneer. He loves the wilderness for the independence it confers—for the sovereignty which it enables him to wield by dint of his personal energies. The forest is subject to his axe—its inhabitants to his rifle. Had the same man drawn his first breath in the land of his forefathers, he might have been a stunted and starving hand-loom weaver, or, at the best, a labourer, faring sumptuously, with a wife and six children, on an uncertain weekly stipend of eight British shillings. In the grand old woods where rises the smoke of his log-house, he is lord of an untrammelled mind and iron frame. The roof that shelters his little ones is the work of his own hands; the venison that smokes upon the board, and the deer-skin that furnishes his hunting gear, are the spoil of his practised eye and untiring step. Alone he ventures on the Indian's hunting-ground, and, in defiance of the law of the Red Man, bears away a share of the prey. Perhaps the chase absorbs too much of his time—perhaps he falls a victim to the jealousy of the savage—still his career has not been in vain;—he has made a lodgment in the waste, he has opened a track for the van-guard of civilisation, the ranks of which will expand for the reception of his posterity. In a few years, where the short, sharp crack of the out-settler's rifle startled the silence of the pine forest, the voice of Christian worship is heard in the language of Old England; institutions kindred to our own predominate; industry, in its varied branches, prospers; and a fresh accession is made to the extending empire of morality and knowledge."—Kennedy's Texas.

MARQUINEZ AND LA COLLEGIALA.

A ROMANTIC INCIDENT OF THE PENINSULAR WAR.

THE small town of Ayllon in Old Castile is picturesquely situated at the foot of a ridge of mountains of the same name, and at about half-a-dozen leagues to the left of the camino real from Burgos to Madrid. Although dignified by the name of a villa, or town, and containing a population of five hundred vecinos,* at the period we are referring to, it bore more resemblance to an overgrown country village, both by the character of its houses and the occupations of their inhabitants. The former were rudely constructed of mis-shapen and irregularly sized blocks of stone, hewn from the adjacent mountains, the interstices being filled up with a coarse cement. They were for the most part covered with thatch, although here and there a roof formed of black and red tiles, arranged in alternate lines, varied the uniformity of the layers of straw, to which the weather and the smoke of the wood fires had imparted a dingy grayish hue. According to Spanish custom, every dwelling had a clumsy but solid and spacious balcony running round the upper windows. These balconies were sheltered from the rain either by a wooden roof or by a projection of the thatch and rafters, and in the summer and autumn were usually strewed with the golden pods of the Indian corn and the juicy scarlet fruit of the tomata, placed there to dry and to ripen in the sunbeams.

The inhabitants of Ayllon were principally peasants, who gained their living by the cultivation of the fields which surrounded the town; and in time of peace this resource was sufficient for the ample supply of their scanty wants and unambitious desires; but the war, which was so heavy a scourge for the Peninsula, did not spare this quiet corner of Castile. On the contrary, the position of the town rendered it a favourite resort of the guerillas, who from that point had the double facility of pouncing on whatever passed along the high-road, and of retreating to the mountains when troops were sent against them. Thus it not unfrequently happened that the unfortunate Ayllonese, after emptying their granaries and wine stores for the benefit of the Spanish troops, were visited, a few hours afterwards, by a column of French, who stripped them of what little they had reserved for their own support, accompanying their extortions by the ample measure of ill treatment they considered themselves justified in bestowing on those who had so recently sheltered their foes. Between friends and enemies the peasants were impoverished, their houses dismantled and pillaged, their fields trampled and laid waste.

It was on an autumn morning of the year 181–, that a large number of cavalry soldiers were grooming their horses in the streets of Ayllon. Some ill-clothed but hardy-looking infantry men were grouped about the doors of the houses, busily engaged in furbishing their arms, whilst here and there, at the corners of the streets, or in open spaces between the houses, a few greasy-looking individuals were superintending the preparations of the rancho,* a strong smelling anomalous sort of mess, contained in large iron kettles suspended over smoky fires of green wood. Cavalry, infantry, and cooks were laughing, joking, singing, and talking with the gayety characteristic of the Spanish soldier, and which scarcely ever abandons him even in the most difficult and unfavourable circumstances.

The horses had been cleaned and returned to their stables; the muskets burnished till they shone again; the rations cooked and eaten. It was past noon, and the rays of an October sun, which in Castile is often hotter than a July sun in our more temperate climate, had driven the soldiery to seek shade and coolness where best it might be found. Some were sharing the litter of their horses, others were stretched under trees and hedges in the outskirts of the town, whilst the most weary or the least difficult lay wrapped in their cloaks on either side of the street. A deep silence had succeeded to the previous noise. It was the hour of the siesta.

Two o'clock had chimed from the church tower of Ayllon, and had been repeated by the clocks of the neighbouring convents and villages, when a battalion of infantry entered the principal street, and advanced at a rapid pace towards the open square in the centre of the town, where it halted and formed up. A body of cavalry which followed separated into small parties, and dispersed in various directions. More infantry arrived, and proceeded by detachments to occupy the stables and houses in which the troops were quartered, and from which they ejected the original occupants. On the first arrival of the new comers, the guerillas, who were lying sleeping about the streets, had started up in alarm; but on recognising the gray uniforms and painted shakoes of the regiment of Arlanza, and the blue pelisses of the hussars, under the orders of the Cura Merino, they for the most part resumed their recumbent position, with all the nonchalance of those Neapolitan lazzaroni for whom the dolce far niente is the sum and substance of human happiness. The less indolent remained staring at the troops as they marched by; and even when they saw them entering the stables and barracks they manifested no surprise, unsuspicious of any hostile intention on the part of men fighting for the same cause as themselves, and with whom they were accustomed to fraternise. Those who were sleeping in the houses and stables, were scarcely well awaked before they

* The Spaniards have a somewhat loose manner of calculating the population of their town and villages by vecinos, or heads of families, literally, neighbours. They multiply the number of vecinos by four and a half, and that is supposed to give the number of inhabitants.

* The rancho, or mess of the Spanish soldiery, is generally composed of fat pork, garlic, and rice or dry beans, according as the one or the other may have been issued for rations: the whole being plentifully seasoned with red pepper, and boiled so as to form a sort of thick pottage. The manner in which this is eaten is somewhat original. Each company is divided into messes of twenty or thirty men, and each mess forms a circle round the vessel in which their dinner has been cooked, every man with his bread and a large wooden spoon in his hand. They tell off by fours, and a non-commissioned officer calls out "El uno," No. 1. The five or six men who have told off No. 1 take a pace to the front, dip their spoon in the kettle and resume their place in the circle. "El dos," No. 2, is next called, and performs the same manœuvre. After No. 4, the turn of No. 1 comes again, and so on till the pot is emptied and the bellies of the soldiers more or less filled.

were thrust into the street. The whole proceeding was so rapid on the part of the Cura's soldiers, and so unlooked for by those quartered in the town, that in less than ten minutes fifteen hundred men found themselves unarmed and defenceless, whilst their horses, weapons, and accoutrements were in possession of Merino's followers. So complete was the surprise, and so trifling the resistance offered, that not a life was lost, scarcely a man wounded, on either side.

Whilst the astonished guerillas were asking one another what could be the meaning of this extraordinary conduct of Merino, that chief himself appeared, surrounded by several officers, and followed by a strong escort of cavalry. He galloped through the main street, and, halting in the plaza, received the reports of the officers who had been entrusted with the execution of the coup-de-main that had just been accomplished; then, turning to a group of the disarmed who were standing by, he enquired for Colonel Principe. Before he had received a reply, a man rushed, bareheaded, and with a drawn sabre in his hand, from the door of a neighbouring house. He stopped when he found himself face to face with the Cura, and, in a voice almost inarticulate from passion, demanded by what authority the latter had disarmed his men and taken possession of their quarters.

"By my own authority, Tomas Principe," coolly replied Merino. "Your band is one of those which do more harm to the peasant than the enemy. When they march, their progress is marked by rapine and violence; and, if they now and then distinguish themselves by their gallantry in the field, they take care to counterbalance its merit by daily robberies and unlawful acts. Your horses and arms I have taken for my soldiers, and by this time your men are informed that they are disbanded and may return to their homes."

Merino had scarcely finished his sentence when Principe, who literally foamed at the mouth with rage, made a dash at the imperturbable priest, and dealt him a blow which would probably have brought the career of that celebrated member of the church militant to a premature termination, had it not been intercepted by the swords of some of the Cura's officers. Several of the escort pressed forward, and the unlucky guerilla was overpowered and deprived of his sabre. The scuffle was scarcely over when Marquinez, the friend and lieutenant of Principe, appeared, followed by some officers and a few men of his corps. He was a handsome, soldierly-looking man, in the prime of life, with a highly intelligent countenance; and, instead of showing the same excitement and headlong fury as his commandant, he saluted Merino with urbanity, and addressed him in a somewhat ironical tone. The Cura repeated what he had already said to Principe as to his reasons for disarming the partida.

"I am well aware, Senor Cura," said Marquinez, "that some of your followers, weary of lurking in mountain caverns, have preferred leaders under whom they were sure to meet with opportunities of displaying their courage in the plain, and of revenging themselves on the invaders of their country. It is probably to prevent further defection, and to remount your cavalry, that you have thus treacherously surprised and disarmed men, who, had they been aware of your intention, would have given ample occupation to you and the whole of your forces. You have, for the moment, deprived your country of two thousand defenders, the least worthy of whom is a better man than ever crossed your saddle. We shall not attempt a resistance which now would be absurd, but you will have to answer to the Junta of Cadiz for your treason."

The Cura smiled scornfully, but made no reply. Marquinez, after gazing steadfastly at him for a moment, turned upon his heel; and leading, or rather dragging along, Principe by the arm, left the plaza. The same day Merino marched out of Ayllon, taking with them nearly a thousand horses, and a large number of muskets, sabres, and other arms.

Marquinez and Principe had been Serjeants in the Spanish regiment of Bourbon. They were of humble extraction, and Marquinez had, in his youth, been a barber at Madrid. Both men of great intrepidity, and of some military talent, whose qualifications availed them little at a period when wealth and family interest were the surest, if not the only stepping stones to advancement in the Spanish army, and our two sargentos instruidos left the service with the humble chevrons which their merits had procured them soon after their arrival under the colours, but which they had no hope of exchanging for the epaulette of a commissioned officer. At the commencement of the Peninsular war, they joined a party of guerillas, of which they soon became the leaders, and Principe, although inferior in talent and education to his brother serjeant, was the first in command. At the period that Merino disarmed them in the manner we have described, the partida had acquired considerable celebrity, and although not so well disciplined as the troops of the Cura, had committed no excesses to justify the step taken by the latter. Merino was jealous of their success, and annoyed at the desertion of his men, many of whom had recently left his standard to joined that of Principe. As Marquinez had predicted, however, the Regency was excessively angry at the unauthorised and unwarrantable conduct of the guerilla priest, in which it was evident that he had consulted his own interest more than that of the service, or of the country. A severe reprimand was addressed to him; but the war was raging in all its fury, the Junta had its hands full, and Merino was too valuable a partizan to be dispensed with, or even disgusted. Moreover, the mischief done was soon repaired, in great part, by the activity of Marquinez. After the guerilla corps was disbanded by the Cura, the two adventurers who had headed it found themselves with a mere handful of followers, the remainder either having been sent to their villages, or having joined Merino. Principe and Marquinez agreed to separate, and to reorganise two bands, instead of the one which they had hitherto commanded. Principe was only moderately successful; the free corps which he raised never amounted to above six or eight hundred men; but Marquinez, putting out all his energy, before long found himself at the head of a strong body of cavalry, well mounted and equipped; and he took the field with renewed confidence, and this time with the sole command.

In one of the first expeditions which he undertook, after this resurrection of his partida, he encountered three hundred Westphalian cavalry in the French service, whom he totally defeated, after fighting for a whole morning, and losing a large number of men and horses. The Westphalians were returning from a reconnoissance, in which they had made several prisoners, and amongst others, a lady of a good family of Sahagun, and wife of a captain in the Spanish army. This woman, during the few days which the insecurity of the roads compelled her to pass in the society of Marquinez, became violently enamoured of that officer, and finally abandoned her husband and children to follow him in his adventurous course of life. Endowed with masculine courage, strong minded, and possessed of greater physical strength than is usual in her sex, she did not hesitate to assume the costume of a hussar, and to fight by the side of the dashing guerilla to whom she had attached herself. She soon became well known in the district which was the scene of operations of Marquinez's troops, by the appellation of La Collegiala, a name given to her from the circumstance of her youth having been spent in a college, which exists at Valladolid, for the education of the female children of noble families. She had already been engaged in several skirmishes, and had displayed a degree of courage which had gained for her the rank of an officer, and the respect and admiration of the hardy soldiers amongst whom she lived, when an opportunity occurred of proving her devotion and attachment to the man for whom she had sacrificed her fair fame and her domestic ties.

It was in the early part of the month of March. A succession of heavy rains had nearly suspended all military operations in the plains of Valladolid and Palencia. Marquinez's hussars, at this time nearly two thousand in number, were in cantoments in some small villages a few leagues to the right of the high-road from Burgos to Valladolid, and were awaiting the return of fine weather to recommence the campaign. The activity and intrepidity of their leader had caused him to become a formidable opponent to the French generals, who were anxious to rid themselves of nearly the only chief who ventured to attack them on equal terms in the plain, and frequently came off the conqueror. For Marquinez, disdaining the more cautious system of mountain warfare adopted by other guerilla leaders, had not raised any infantry, but kept the open country with his light cavalry. Several of the French moveable columns had been roughly handled by him, and their dragoons sabred and put to the route by vigorous charges headed by the intrepid guerilla.

During the few weeks that Marquinez was compelled to remain inactive, the French caused his position to be reconnoitred by their spies, and devised a plan for seizing his person. The villages and hamlets in which the cavalry were quartered were spread over a considerable extent of country. So large a number of horses would hardly have found sufficient forage or stabling had they been all concentrated on one point; and as the roads were cut up and the fields sodden by the rain, there was no apprehension entertained of any rapid march or surprise on the part of the French, who had their advanced posts in the neighbourhood of Valladolid. Two of the numerous villages occupied by the hussars were nearly a league in advance of the others, and placed on either skirt of a large oak wood. The road from one to the other of these cantonments described a curve round the front of the wood, and at a central point was crossed by a track which, in one direction, led in amongst the trees, and in the other joined at a distance of a mile or two a country road leading to Valladolid. It was at this spot that it was proposed to surprise Marquinez, who, with the Collegiala and a hundred horse, had taken up his quarters in the village on the right of the wood.

About dusk, on a stormy evening, Marquinez, attended by an aide-de-camp, was returning to his quarters, after having visited several of the cantonments. On arriving at the part of the road described above he found his further progress impeded by a tree which had fallen across the narrow way in such a manner that its branches, covered with dead leaves, and matted with ivy, formed a sort of hedge too high for the horses to leap, and too strong for them to break through. The two horsemen dismounted, and began to open themselves a passage by lopping the boughs with their sabres, when their arms were suddenly seized from behind, and before they could turn their heads they were surrounded by a dozen dismounted dragoons, whose numbers quickly overcoming all resistance, the Spaniards were thrown down and pinioned. A troop of French cavalry emerged from the wood, the men who had effected the capture remounted, and Marquinez and his aide-de-camp, being bound to their saddles and placed between four dragoons, with their carbines unslung and ready for action, the whole party started off at a sharp trot in the direction of Valladolid. The only witness of the affair was a peasant belonging to the village in which Marquinez had his quarters, and who was about a hundred yards behind that chief at the moment he dismounted. His first movement, when he saw the French, was to throw himself on the ground behind some bushes, and as soon as the last of the troopers had disappeared, he left his place of concealment, and hastened to give the alarm.

To support the troop of dragoons that had been sent on this hazardous expedition, two battalions and a squadron of French had advanced seven or eight leagues from their own lines, and had taken up a position in a hamlet at about the same distance from Marquinez's cantonments. It was an hour before midnight when the party which had formed the ambuscade joined the main body, after a rapid march over detestable roads and a heavy country. The horses were knocked up, and unable to proceed without a few hours' repose. Their captain having reported this to the commanding officer, at the same time that he announced to him the successful issue of the enterprise, received orders to refresh his men and horses, and to hold himself in readiness to march an hour before daybreak. Meantime the prisoners were placed in a room on the ground floor of the house in which the French colonel was lodged. The door of their temporary prison opened on a large corridor, then used as a guard-room, and the small unglazed aperture which gave light to the apartment, was traversed by three massive iron bars, placed parallel to each other, and firmly rivetted into the stone wall. For additional security, and to preclude all possibility of escape, a sentry was placed in a sort of garden on which the window looked out.

The young officer who had been taken at the same time as Marquinez, weary with the day's exertions, soon fell asleep in one of the three or four rickety chairs which composed nearly the whole furniture of the room. His chief did not seem inclined to follow his example, but paced up and down, apparently wrapt in thought. His monotonous promenade had lasted nearly an hour, when he thought he heard his name pronounced. He started and listened, but no sound reached his ears save the measured step of the sentinel under his window, and the burden of an old French chanson a boire, which one of the men on guard was trolling out, with a voice more remarkable for power than melody. Marquinez threw himself into a chair, and attributing to an excited imagination the words which he had fancied he heard, appeared disposed to imitate his aide-de-camp, who was forgetting in sleep the dangers of his position, and the probable death that awaited him. The eyes of the captive guerilla were beginning to close, and his head to sink upon his breast, when the same voice as before broke the silence. "Marquinez!" was repeated in a loud whisper. The word was accompanied by a noise such as is produced by a slight blow of iron against iron. This time it was no delusion of a heated brain. Marquinez rushed to the window, and looked out as well as the grating would permit. All was still. The night was raw and wintry, and it was only at rare intervals that the watery rays of the moon obtained a passage through some break in the heavy mantle of clouds which covered the sky. The infantry soldier on sentry had reached the limit of his walk, and was turning to retrace his steps. When he arrived under the window, he allowed the bayonet on the end of his musket to fall lightly against the bars through which Marquinez was looking, and in a voice which seemed familiar to the ears of the latter, he asked, in Spanish,

"Estas solo? Are you alone."

"Villaverde is with me, and asleep," was the reply.

"My bayonet is unfixed. Take it, and force the grating."

Marquinez seized the proffered weapon, which was only stuck on the end of the ramrod, and using the greatest possible care to avoid noise, he began to pick out the cement and the small iron wedges by which the bars were fastened into the walls. It was necessary to take out all the three bars, for otherwise the opening would be too small to allow the body of a man to pass; and with no better tool than a bayonet, the task was not an easy one. At the end of half an hour, however, two of the bars had given way, and the prisoner had begun to work at the third, when the sentry, who, during this time had continued his walk without appearing to pay any attention to what was going on in the prison, rapidly approached the window, and, in the low hurried tone in which he had before spoken, exclaimed—

"The relief is at hand; hasten, or all is lost!" At the same moment Marquinez heard in the distance the qui vive of a French soldier challenging the guard which was relieving the various sentries placed round the temporary quarters of the troops.

It is no disparagement to the often proved courage of Marquinez, to say, that in this agitating moment his heart beat with unusual quickness, whilst big drops of perspiration covered his forehead. His hand, however, lost none of its steadiness, and he plied his bayonet with redoubled vigour, but with less caution than before. Fragments of stone flew from the wall as he struck and delved with desperate violence. He fixed the sharp end of his weapon under the bar, and prizing as with a lever, endeavoured to force it out, when the bayonet, already bent by the unusual purpose to which it was applied, broke off short, and the point remained in the wall. At the same instant Villaverde, awakened by the noise, which had fortunately not reached the ears of the soldiers in the guard-room, stood by the side of his chief, and in an instant comprehended their position. Our two guerillas seized the iron bar, which was all that intervened between them and liberty—between an untimely death and a life of freedom and enjoyment. They tugged and wrenched at the fatal obstacle, which shook but would not give way; the heavy tread of the Frenchmen had become audible, when, by an almost superhuman effort, the iron was torn from its place, and with the violence of the shock the two men reeled back into the centre of the room. Instantly recovering themselves, they darted through the window, and stood before their deliverer, who threw down his musket, and tossing off his shako, a profusion of dark ringlets fell upon his shoulders, and Marquinez recognised with astonishment the handsome features of La Collegiala. She was pale as death, but had lost none of her presence of mind. "Por aqui!" cried she, and as the relief turned the angle of the house, and entered the garden, the three fugitives bounded over a low fence, and disappeared in the obscurity. A moment afterwards, the guard, surprised at not being challenged by the man whom they were approaching to relieve, halted under the window, expecting to find that sleep had overtaken the negligent sentry. No sentry was there, but at a few paces distant, a dead soldier, stripped of his greatcoat and shako, was lying with his face against the ground. The long rank grass on which he was extended was wet with blood. He had received a stab in the back which had pierced through to his heart.

In less than an hour after Marquinez was carried off by the French, La Collegiala had set out with a squadron in order to rescue him. This force, which included every man in the cantonment, was deemed sufficient, the peasant having reported the captors as not exceeding fifty in number. La Collegiala made sure of overtaking them before they reached Valladolid, to which city, from the road they had taken, she had no doubt they would proceed. After four or five hours' hard riding, the Spaniards had gained considerably on those they were in pursuit of, when they met with some muleteers, who informed them that they were not above ten minutes in rear of the French, but that the latter must have already joined the main body, whose advanced posts were about a mile off. This was a crushing blow to the hopes of La Collegiala. A moment's reflection, however, was sufficient for her to take her resolution. She struck off the road, and after a few minutes' march across the country, halted, and formed up the squadron in a ploughed field. Then, stripping off her richly-furred pelisse and embroidered forage cap, she replaced them by a coarse woollen jacket and felt hat, which she had procured from one of the muleteers. Favoured by the darkness of the night, she passed unobserved through the French pickets, and attracted by the lights in the windows of the guard room and of the colonel's quarters, she directed her steps to the very garden on which Marquinez's prison looked out. Concealed amongst some shrubs, she heard the orders given the sentry; and convinced that the prisoner whom he was directed to guard could be no other than Marquinez himself, she immediately formed a plan for his rescue, the partial success of which we have already seen.

The fugitives were not fifty yards from the village when they heard the French drums beat to arms. The troops turned out in an instant; a body of cavalry was sent to patrol the road, whilst parties of infantry hastened in all directions to endeavour to intercept the flight of the prisoners. Amidst the din and confusion, the voice of the French colonel might be heard, exciting his men by the promise of large rewards for the recapture of the notable partizan who had thus eluded his vigilance. Meantime, Marquinez and his aide-de-camp, guided by La Collegiala, laboured through the heavy ground; now falling into ditches, now stumbling over stumps of trees and other objects which their haste and the darkness prevented them from seeing. They fortunately passed the pickets before the intelligence of their escape had reached those advanced posts, the officers in command of which, hearing the drums beat to arms, and not knowing the nature of the alarm, kept their men together, instead of extending them right and left, which would probably have insured the taking of the three Spaniards. At length, covered with mud and panting for breath, Marquinez and his companion reached the squadron, which was still formed up in the field where La Collegiala had left it. Two men dismounted; Marquinez and Villaverde sprang into their saddles, and the little party of hussars moved off across the country in good order, and as fast as the heavy ground would permit. At the same instant they heard the clatter of the horses' hoofs of the French dragoons as they galloped along the road, which ran about half musket-shot to the left of their own line of march. This, however, caused no uneasiness to Marquinez, who knew that the enemy's cavalry, unacquainted with the country, would not venture to leave the road, and he was sure of being able to keep well ahead of the infantry, who, in their turn, could not prudently advance too far from the main body. He reckoned, therefore, of being soon out of the reach of the enemy, when the march of the Spaniards was suddenly arrested by a broad and deep water-course, with high and perpendicular banks. In vain did they ride up and down, and lose some minutes in endeavouring to find a place at which to pass this new obstacle to their progress. The French infantry were approaching; the torches which they carried showing like so many crimson spots through the thick mist arising from the wet and marshy ground. Already the officers might be heard directing the search, and giving orders to their men. The only remaining chance was to return to the high road before they were perceived by the infantry, and trust to a bold charge to break through the dragoons, which were in their front. The road was soon gained, and the hussars crossed the wooden bridge which was there thrown over the water-course, which gave out a hollow sound under their horses' feet. The infantry heard the noise, but paid no attention to it, taking the Spaniards for another patrol sent out from the village. The same mistake was made by the dragoons, whom Marquinez overtook a few hundred yards further, in a wide part of the road. The officer in command had slackened his pace when he heard other cavalry approaching, thinking it might probably bring some order; but not for a moment supposing that an enemy had got between him and the head quarters he had so recently left. He was awakened from his security by the voice of Marquinez. "A ellos!" shouted the guerilla, and his men rushed sabre in hand upon the French, who, taken by surprise, were thrown one upon the other, and a dozen of them cut off their horses before they had made the slightest resistance. A panic seized the remainder, who, being prevented by the darkness from distinguishing the number of their opponents, imagined themselves betrayed, and surrounded by a very superior force. The greater part leaped their horses over the hedges and low stone walls on either side of the road, and fled in every direction. Some few threw down their arms, and begged for quarter; but the guerillas were not in a merciful mood, and prisoners would have been an incumbrance on the long march they had before them. The pursued became in their turn the pursuers, and Marquinez had to exert his authority to prevent his soldiers from dispersing in chase of the runaways, a chase that would probably have led some of them into the middle of the French infantry.

Marquinez reached his cantonment at daybreak, and at the same hour the French commenced their march back to Valladolid, not a little crest fallen at the events of the night.

A few days after the incident we have related, the approach of spring enabled Marquinez to take the field. After one of the first skirmishes shared in by his troops, two or three men deserted to him from the French, and by their own desire were incorporated into a squadron of hussars. One of these men, a German, made himself particularly remarked by smart and soldierly bearing, and by his hatred of the French, whom he constantly execrated, declaring that his sincerest wish was to revenge on them some part of the ill treatment he had received at their hands. Effectively, in one or two affairs, he displayed so much courage and blood-thirstiness that he attracted the notice of Marquinez, who attached him to his person as an orderly. The zeal of the deserter redoubled, and he exhibited that boundless devotion to his general so naturally felt by every brave soldier for an indulgent master and gallant chief.

It was some months later that the hussars of Marquinez, being in the neighbourhood of Palencia, their leader had occasion to visit that town, and he set out, attended only by his German orderly. At a certain distance from the above named place, and when the road, running between two hills, is shaded by a row of large beech trees, the travellers came to one of those ancient fountains, not uncommon in Spain, and which seem to have been erected with the double object of administering to the thirst of the wayfarer, and of inviting him to solicit, by prayer, a blessing on his journey. On the upper part of a mossy and time-worn slab of gray stone, placed perpendicularly against the rocky bank which bordered the road, was rudely sculptured in relievo a representation of the Virgin Mary holding the infant Jesus in her arms. From a broken wooden spout, which protruded from the same stone at the height of a man from the ground, gushed forth a stream of water of crystal clearness, which fell bubbling and sparkling into a granite trough below, while the vicinity of the fountain had encouraged the growth of a profusion of hedge flowers, which decked the banks and sides of the road, and perfumed the air with their wild and delicious fragrance.

At this cool and pleasant spot, a sort of oasis on the hot sandy road along which he had been riding—Marquinez drew rein, and loosening his horse's breastplate, allowed the animal to plunge his mouth and nostrils in the trough. Whilst his charger was drinking—an operation rendered somewhat difficult by his large and severe bit—the orderly continued to move forward, until he had greatly diminished the distance usually kept between an officer and his attendant. When he arrived within a couple of paces of the fountain, he silently drew a pistol from his holster, took a deliberate aim at the head of Marquinez, and pulled the trigger. The bullet split the skull of the unfortunate Spaniard, who first fell forward on his horse's neck, and then rolled to the ground, striking in his fall against the stone basin, which was sprinkled with his blood. The assassin sprang from his saddle, and stood over his victim with a sharp short dagger in his hand. He had no occasion to use it. The teeth of the gucrilla chieftain were set firmly against each other, and a slight froth stood upon his lips. The independence of Spain had lost one of its most gallant defenders.

When the news of this cowardly deed reached Marquinez's comrades, the latter did not hesitate to attribute it to the French general Boyer, from whose column the German had deserted. It would be unjust, however, to lay the instigation of so foul a murder at the door of a brave officer without some better proof than mere suspicions. One thing is certain—that when the murderer, after some hairbreadth escapes, succeeded in rejoining the French, he received an officer's commission, as a reward for having rid them of so troublesome and active an enemy.

Shortly after Marquinez's death, La Collegiala, with thirty or forty men, deserted to Valladolid, then held by the French. Those who knew her best, were unable to discover or imagine any possible reason for so extraordinary an act. Some few, indeed, supposed that she had taken this step as the only means by which she could hope to find an opportunity of revenging the death of her lover; and they predicted that many days would not elapse ere La Collegiala would return to the Spanish lines with the blood of Marquinez's assassin on her knife blade. If this supposition was the correct one, if such was the motive which induced her to abandon the cause of her country, she was unable to accomplish her design; for, a few days after her desertion, the order came from Napoleon to send back to France all the foreign troops in the French service, for the purpose of their being disbanded. Italians, Poles and Germans, were all sent across the frontier, and with them marched the murderer of Marquinez.

La Collegiala continued with the French, and commanded, with the rank of captain, a band of about a hundred irregular cavalry, composed of the men who had deserted with her, and of others who subsequently came over. On the evacuation of Spain by the French troops, which occurred soon afterwards, she accompanied them, and remained in France till an amnesty was published, of which she took advantage, and returned to her own country. Bidding adieu to her masculine dress and habits, she became exceedingly devout, and gave up the whole of her time to religious exercises and the education of her children—a more praiseworthy than poetical termination to the career of the adventurous amazon who had shared the hardships and perils of Marquinez the guerilla.

FURZE.

When first the stranger* saw thy golden bloom
O'er sandy hill and barren plain extending,
Filling the air with faintly rich perfume,
With breath of thyme and heathbell sweetly blending,
He knelt; and, in the fulness of delight,
Bless'd God that earth could show so fair a sight.

And thou art lovely when the sun-light pure
Rests on thy yellow wreaths; which, closely twining,
Shed such a glory on the lonely moor,
That barren else, yet with their lustre shining,
It seems no more a stormy wilderness,
But some loved garden in its summer dress.

Oh! if earth's fading charms have power to raise
The heart in thrills of grateful joy to Heaven,
How shall resound unceasing songs of praise
From those to whose enraptured sight is given
That glorious world, where rays without a shade
Tint flow'rs of living gold that cannot fade!

SONNET,

INSCRIBED TO JOHN MILTON.

An organ pealing forth an anthem grand,
Whose tone can ravish at the simplest motion
Of its high master: or measureless ocean
Whose surges lave the shore of farthest land:
An old magician, at whose mystic wand
Upriseth visions from the fathomless caves
Of dim cloud-land: or a High Priest who paves
The way to heaven with a dear father's hand:—
Such was thy song, great Milton!—Yet soft as lute
Wind-waft at midnight o'er Venitian seas:
Sweet as the choir that hymneth in the breeze,
At whose blest harmony the soul is mute:—
But for fit simile might mankind pine—
Save princely Raphael, he who drew with pen like thine!

THE SPANISH GIPSIES.

The Zincali; or an Account of the Gipsies of Spain; with an Original Collection of their Songs and Poetry, and a Copious Dictionary of their Language. By George Borrow, late agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society in Spain. 2 vols. 12mo. London, 1841. Murray.

——"It would appear as though gipsies, both men and women, came into the world for no other end or purpose than to be thieves: their parents before them are thieves, they grow up among thieves, the art of thieving is their study, and they finish with being thieves, rogues, and robbers in every sense of the word; and the love and practice of theft are in their case a sort of inseparable accidents, ceasing only with death." Such is the sweeping judgment passed upon the Gitanos or gipsies of Spain by Cervantes, at the opening of his beautiful tale the Gitanilla. This censure, it is true, is not borne out in the progress of the story by the conduct of the fascinating heroine Preciosa, even though her fictitious grandmother is said to have instructed her "in all her gipsy tricks and devices for fraud and robbery:" but the graces and virtues of that all-accomplished fair one can hardly be alleged in their exculpation, since the denouement discovers her to be (like Victor Hugo's Esmeralda, of whom she is the prototype,) no true daughter of Egypt, but the stolen child of a Spanish grandee. Severe, however, as is the denunciation of Cervantes, it falls far short of the list of enormities attributed to the Gitános in the present work, by one who has enjoyed such opportunities of observing the manners, and scrutinising the feelings of that wild and singular race, as have rarely, if ever before, fallen to the lot of a *Busno or stranger, and whose devotion to Gitanismo could only be accounted for on the supposition of the gipsies themselves, by his soul having, in some previous state of beings, inhabited the corporeal tenement of one of their errate or blood. For twenty years, as he informs us, he has been in constant habits of familiar intercourse with the Roma,† "who are certainly," (as he naively observes,) "a very mysterious people, come from some distant land, no mortal knows why; and who made their first appearance in Europe at a dark period, when events were not so accurately recorded as at the present time."
